

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. VOL. CCLXII. [THIRD SERIES.]

ARMY—DEATHS BY SUNSTROKE AT ALDERSHOT.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked the Under Secretary of State for War as to a statement appearing in the morning papers that at the Review at Aldershot yesterday two men died from the effects of the heat, while two more were not expected to survive, and a number of others were admitted to the military hospitals suffering from the effects of the heat. He would be glad to hear any facts with regard to the matter, and any explanation of how it was that the troops were exposed several hours to the greatest heat of the day.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I regret to say that a certain number of men who took part in the Review at Aldershot yesterday were subsequently admitted to hospital suffering from the effects of the extreme heat, and no fewer than four have since died. This is a very sad occurrence. The Secretary of State for War, on hearing of it this morning, telegraphed to the General commanding at Aldershot for information. We have not yet received as full information as we could wish; but if my noble Friend will repeat his Question on Thursday I shall probably be able to answer it satisfactorily.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, I was actually present at Aldershot yesterday, and I had no idea that anything of the kind had occurred. I was so astonished when I heard of it, that I did not believe a word of it. When I came home from Aldershot, everybody said—"What a dreadful day you have had!" I said—"No; it was warm, but not unpleasantly warm." I asked my Staff, who gave the same answer. It certainly was a very hot day, but there was a very fair breeze on the hill, and it only became unpleasantly warm as I came towards London. I have certainly been out at field exercises 50 times on much hotter days, and I can assure your Lordships that there was nothing unusual in the weather, and as for falling out, I never saw so few men fall out on a field-day. There was no review at all; it was a simple field-day. The troops were ready to advance when I arrived, and the whole of the affair was over in a short time. There was no standing in the sun for a long period. The troops only marched past on their way home, and did not even come round again. I never was so surprised in my life, and I do not see how these accidents could be prevented.

LUNACY DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND)

BILL.—(No. 108.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that the aim of the Bill was to amend a state of matters created by the Prisons Act of 1877. Previous to that time power to alter the lunacy districts was vested in the Commissioners of Lunacy, who were able to act on receiving an application through the local Prison Board. The Prisons Act, by abolishing the local Prison Boards, deprived the Lunacy Commissioners of the initiative by which alone they were able to act. By this Bill the powers would be conferred on the Commissioners after the permission of the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been obtained.

The Earl of Morley

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>." —(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

SUMMARY PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND)

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 99.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH asked for an explanation of the 4th clause of the Bill, which provided that a table of fees in Schedule A and no other higher fees would be allowed on taxation. A subsequent clause provided that the costs in a case under this Act should not exceed £1. How was that clause to be carried out when Schedule A provided a higher scale of fees, for if Schedule A fees were to be exacted under the Bill they would amount to a larger sum than £1. How, then, was this consistent with the other clause of the Bill that no more costs than £1 were to be exacted?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he could not answer the Question; but if their Lordships would allow the Bill to pass as it stood, he would undertake to get the explanation of that point when it came forward on the Report.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, he was satisfied with the promise of the noble Earl.

An Amendment made: The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

BURIAL GROUNDS (SCOTLAND) ACT,

1855, AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 131.)

(The Earl of Camperdown.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, its objects was to give to parochial authorities increased powers with regard to burial grounds or cemeteries in Scotland. At the present time, when a parochial authority wished to supply a burial ground they were obliged to set aside the half of the ground for the use of the poor. It was found, in practice, that the portion set aside for general use was all allocated before that reserved for the poor was used up. It then became necessary to purchase new ground, which had to be subdivided in the same proportion, notwithstanding that the ground of the poor was not nearly exhausted. The arrangement was needlessly expensive, and the proposal of the Bill was that, with the consent of the Sheriff, the parochial authorities should be allowed to allocate burial grounds for such purposes and in such proportions as might be found most convenient.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly.

TRIPOLI.

ADDRESS FOR PAPERS.

EARL DE LA WARR, in rising to ask a question of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs as to the alleged statement of M. Tissot, the French Ambassador at Constantinople, to the effect that instructions had been given to the general in command of the French troops to cross the Tunisian frontier into Tripoli, if necessary for the preservation of order; also if any information can be given with regard to the military organization which is stated to be taking place in Tripoli under the Turkish governor, Nasif Pacha, in consequence, as alleged, of the occupation of Tunis by the French; also to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for papers and correspondence relative to Tripoli? said, he felt that he ought to offer an apology for again bringing this question under the consideration of the House. His apology was the great urgency of the case, and the more than usual reserve on the part of Her Majesty's Government in withholding information, and in not giving the least information as to what would be their policy on a question which, he was sure, the noble Earl opposite would admit was one of a very grave nature. Arising on all sides were alarming indications of what might result in massacre and bloodshed, and what had begun in Tunis might not end there. Already we heard of a large mobilization of French troops, of the probable bombardment of Sfax, which was not very far distant from the Frontier of Tripoli, of the pillage of the town by the Natives, of British subjects being killed, of hundreds of Europeans, including British subjects, taking refuge on board ships, though no English ships of war were there; of the probable occupation by French troops of the town of Cables and of the Island of Djerba, near the extreme limit of the Frontier of Tunis adjoining Tripoli—these, and other rapidly progressing events, pointed most unmistakably to two things—the French occupation of Tripoli, or a rising among the Natives, which could only be repressed by military force. Granting, as he believed the noble Marquess below him (the Marquess of Salisbury) did, that there was a legitimate exercise of French influence in Tunis, of which this country need not be jealous—granting this, he would say that the question had now assumed a new phase, as the occupation by French troops of a portion of the territory of Tripoli might at any moment take place. It had been stated, and if incorrectly, he hoped the noble Earl opposite would say so, that the French troops had received instructions to cross the Tunisian Frontier into Tripoli, if necessary, for the preservation of order. Now, there was a very remarkable resemblance between this statement and what had occurred in connection with the crossing of the Frontier between Algeria and Tunis. A pretext was only wanting, and an Arab Tribe had only to be irritated, and the pretext was at hand. But what would be the consequences? Tripoli was an undoubted portion of the Ottoman Empire. It was protected by Treaties as fully as any other part of the Sultan's Dominions; and was it for a moment to be supposed that Turkey would allow French troops to enter any portion of the territory of Tripoli without the consent of the Sultan? He trusted that the noble Earl would tell their Lordships whether the Governor of Tripoli had not been making military preparations in the event of this emergency. Was it likely, he asked, that Italy could remain unmoved by events which were passing almost within sight of her own shores—events which must have a great influence upon her future prospects? This country had long been on friendly terms with the countries of Northern Africa, and they had placed confidence in England's good faith and in English influence; but their trust had been much shaken by recent events. He desired to give credit to Her Majesty's Government for their intention to serve the interests of this country, and he regretted to be obliged to differ from them upon this important question. He sincerely hoped, however, that they would be able to give some indication of the policy which would be pursued with regard to the daily increasing difficulties in the countries of Northern Africa.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, the recent complaint of the French with regard to the measures taken for the protection of Tripoli had no more foundation than the complaint of the wolf against the lamb. Tripoli was 12 degrees to the East of the Province of Oran, where the Algerine insurrection had taken place, and it was impossible for news to have been carried in that short space of time from Tripoli to near Oran through the Desert. There were, besides, no direct lines of communication between Tripoli and the district South of Oran, for in the Sahara the roads ran mostly North and South, and there were no lateral communications. The cause of the insurrection in Algeria was due to the French themselves, and to their conduct only, in invading Tunis, and to the excesses committed by some of their forces on entering the Regency of Tunis. Since that it was reported that the division of General Logerot, on its way back to Constantina, about 12 days ago, had burned the crops and date trees of the tribes, and carried off 18,000 cattle and 700 women, the women having been subsequently released. The French papers had also lately adopted a plan of writing of affairs which were totally distinct and geographically distant in the same paragraph, so as to mislead ignorant persons to imagine that they were connected with one another. Thus they had connected the Khroumirs with the slaughter of an expedition in the Sahara, and now they were mixing up a rising in Tunis with that in Oran. It had been stated that the French Government had entered into a Convention or understanding with the Spanish Government under which Spain was to occupy Morocco and France take Tripoli. He did not believe that such an understanding had been actually come to, but it was probable that it had been attempted; and he would ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he had any information on the subject? In the recent insurrection in the Province of Oran a large number of Spaniards had been killed and taken prisoners. From the accounts in the French papers it appeared that the civil and military authorities were mutually casting the blame upon one another for the neglect of proper precautions, which had rendered possible the loss of life which had occurred, and the feeling in Spain had been turned against the French on account of their neglect of their countrymen; and it was not to be feared that this unnecessary loss of life would lead the Spaniards to assist the French in their designs, since it was clear that the French alone were to blame for it. If the Government continued to be as inert as it had lately shown itself to be, more harm would be done, and a beginning on the part of the French would be made, when it would be more difficult to stop them than before they had entered upon a further course of aggression on Tripoli. Moreover, it was not Tripoli only that was threatened; the French papers were preparing the way for designs on Syria. He valued the friendship and goodwill of the French for this country as much as any man did; but the goodwill of Her Majesty's Indian Mussulman subjects, and the goodwill of the population of Western Asia, was equally valuable and necessary to this country, and Her Majesty's Government appeared to be quite indifferent to the loss of it. If Tripoli were interfered with by the French a very large British trade would be lost, for the trade with Central Africa went from Tripoli through Mourzuk, and not from Tunis, as had been stated on a former occasion. He therefore trusted that his noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs would take steps in conjunction with the Ottoman, Italian, and French Governments in order to prevent further aggressions.

Address for papers and correspondence relative to Tripoli.—(The Earl De La Warr.)

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am bound to say that the noble Earl opposite (Earl De La Warr) always gives me Notice of the numerous Questions which he is in the habit of addressing to me, which my noble Friend at the Table (Lord Stanley of Alderley) does not. I imagine that the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury), to whom the noble Earl referred, and all your Lordships agree with the Government that the cases of Tripoli and Tunis are of a perfectly distinct and separate character, and that any arrangements which may be arrived at in respect of Tunis are not in the slightest way applicable to Tripoli. I agree so far with the noble Earl; but I repudiate the noble Earl's interpretation of my great reticence about this matter. A Government is placed in great difficulty in regard to giving information, charged, as they are, with the affairs of the country in relation to foreign Powers, and is under a disadvantage in furnishing information to the public that depends upon the consent of foreign Governments. But no Government can be blamed for not giving information which they have not received, and, therefore, do not themselves possess. My noble Friend at the Table, who gave me no Notice of his Question, asks me to give him information as to what has happened between France and Spain with regard to the partition of Morocco. Now, all I can say is, that I have not heard a word of any Treaty concluded between France and Spain with regard to Morocco. I utterly disbelieve it; and it is, therefore, impossible for me to give any information about it. The noble Earl (Earl De La Warr) complains of my not having given information as to the first part of his statement in reference to M. Tissot. But I have to say that I have heard nothing about the military occupation of Tripoli. The only report we have heard was that on the 28th of last month a Turkish ship of war had arrived at the port with a Turkish General of Division on board and two battalions. That is the only report we have heard. The noble Earl moves for Papers. I shall be only too ready to accede to his request if he thinks they will be of the slightest importance to him.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in rising to present a Bill to amend the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts, and for other purposes, said, that the Bill was, in some respects, of considerable importance; but he hoped that it would not excite much difference of opinion. A number of changes were proposed, some of considerable magnitude, others comparatively simple. Their Lordships were aware that the High Court of Justice had contained three separate Divisions called respectively the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, and the Exchequer Divisions, and that these three Divisions had recently been consolidated. In consequence of that consolidation there was now but one Division on what was popularly called the Common Law side of the High Court, and one Lord Chief Justice. There had been five ex-officio Judges of the Court of Appeal—namely, the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, the Master of the Rolls, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and the Lord Chief Baron. Owing to the cessation of the two latter offices, the ex-officio Judges were now reduced to three. The Court of Appeal further consisted of six ordinary Judges; and a vacancy had lately taken place in that number by the loss of a Judge whose merits it would be very difficult to do justice to and impossible to exaggerate—Lord Justice James. He spoke from long knowledge, and an intimate personal friendship of many years; and he could not speak of his official services to the country without recollecting the generosity of his noble nature, which greatly endeared him to his numerous friends. But, speaking of him only as a Judge, he would say that the country had never been served by a Judge of higher character—of a sounder and more rapid discrimination; a more ardent love of justice as distinguished from technicalities; a more accurate knowledge of law, or a greater power of immediately applying that knowledge, with an uncommon share of common sense, to the determination of the cases which came before him. For several years those qualities had been exhibited by the late Lord Justice as a Vice Chancellor, and for more than 10 years in the Court of Appeal; and whatever arrangements might be made for filling the vacancy, it would be impossible for any man to bring to the fulfilment of the duties of the office higher qualifications, as a lawyer and a man, than those possessed by Lord Justice James. Now, with regard to the Court of Appeal, although the business of the Court had been ably administered, and arrears prevented from accumulating, yet it was of an arduous and important character, and it required strong Judges, as well as able Judges, to prevent it from falling into arrear. When the question arose what should be done to meet this state of things, it was impossible not to call to mind the proposals which had been made by the Judicature Commission. In their first Report, on which the Judicature Act of 1873 was mainly founded, they advised that the Master of the Rolls for the time being should be a Judge of Appeal only, and that there should be in the Court of Appeal three Judges of the Court of First Instance, annually selected by the Crown. This proposal was not followed in the Act of 1873, which provided for one Final Court of Appeal, comprehending all the judicial strength now distributed between the House of Lords, the Privy Council, and the present Court of Appeal as actually constituted. But that arrangement, as their Lordships were aware, was afterwards changed; and, in the Act of 1875, his noble and learned Friend (Earl Cairns) proposed to introduce into the Court of Appeal three Judges of First Instance—and, under extreme circumstances, it would have been possible to have four—affording temporary assistance. Now they had come to a time when the number of ex-officio Judges was reduced from five to three. What he asked their Lordships to do with regard to the constitution of the Court of Appeal was this—He proposed, in the first place, to take the opportunity of reverting to the recommendation of the Judicature Commission with regard to the position of the Master of the Rolls in connection with the Court of Appeal. Of the special qualifications of the Master of the Rolls he need not speak; they were well known and appreciated by the country at large. It was his proposal that the Master of the Rolls for the time being should be transferred to the Court of Appeal. The present Master of the Rolls was willing to undertake that position. Instead, therefore, of filling up the vacancy now existing among the ordinary Judges in the Court of Appeal, he proposed that the Master of the Rolls should take up the position which seemed more in accordance with the superior rank of his office than that of being one of a number of Judges of First Instance, sitting separately in different Courts of the Chancery Division. At the same time, the Master of the Rolls would continue to exercise all the duties of his office as Keeper of the Rolls, and would retain his present rank, salary, and official patronage. The Master of the Rolls, therefore, would be—he did not say transferred—but confined to the Court of Appeal; and, practically, that would make it unnecessary to fill up the present vacancy in that Court. Then he came to the consideration of the ex-officio Judges. There were now two less than had been contemplated, and if the Master of the Rolls was removed from the High Court, there would be three less. He proposed that the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division, who was not now an ex-officio Judge of the Court of Appeal, should, without any other change in his position, become such a Judge. He proposed, in the next place, that three other Judges should be annually selected from the Judges of the High Court of Justice, who might serve in the Court of Appeal when their other duties permitted. The question remained—in what way should those annual appointments be made? He did not propose that they should be nominated by the Crown. A more convenient mode of selection, he thought, might be found; they might be selected as the Election Judges were now chosen. The Judges of the High Court might meet together, and from year to year nominate for the succeeding year three of their body to serve in the Court of Appeal. They would not be called upon to do duty in the Court of Appeal, so as to interfere with their primary obligations as Judges of the High Court; they would be called upon to assist when the state of business in their own Courts admitted of that assistance being given. Provision was, of course, made for the appointment of a new Judge in the Chancery Division of the High Court, to take the place of the Master of the Rolls. These proposals would not subject the country to any substantial increase of expense. It was also sought to remove a doubt as to the effect of the Act of 1877, under which an additional Judge of First Instance was appointed for the Chancery Division of the High Court. The language of that Act did not make it absolutely clear whether it authorized an appointment on a single occasion only or an appointment from time to time. He proposed to remove that doubt, and to enable the power given by that Act to be exercised from time to time. Occasion had also been taken to alter, in some respects, the existing law as to appeals. By the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Acts certain appeals from the Divorce Court Judge were given to a Court which was called the Full Court for Matrimonial Causes. He had consulted with the learned Judge who presided over that Court, and found that he, as well as others, was of opinion that it would be desirable that that appeal, which was, practically, to that Judge himself, with the assistance of others, should no longer be to the full Court for Matrimonial Causes, but should, like all other cases, go to the Court of Appeal. He also proposed, very much at the instance of that eminent Judge, to correct what, in practice, had turned out to be an unsatisfactory provision in the same Acts, which gave the right to appeal from decrees for dissolution or nullity of marriage, not in the first instance when the decree nisi was given, but when it had been made absolute after a certain lapse of time, which, if no cause were shown in the meantime, was a matter of course. He proposed that, for the future, the appeal should be from the decree nisi, and there should not be a further appeal. With regard to the Acts which related to Parliamentary registration and elections, they had proceeded on the footing of giving final authority on matters of law to the Court to which Parliament had thought fit to intrust that class of cases. This was overlooked, or not sufficiently considered, when the Judicature Act of 1873 was passed; and no distinction was then made between orders on those subjects, and other orders of the High Court. It was now proposed to make the decision in such cases final and conclusive, unless the Court thought fit to give a right to appeal, in which case the Court of Appeal would have jurisdiction. The Bill also gave a power to regulate the holding of Assizes, which, having hitherto been limited to Winter Assizes only, would now extend to all Assizes, by which means it was hoped that an inconvenience, at present felt, would be mitigated. The measure likewise dealt with the power under the Act of 1875 for making rules to govern the practice of the High Court. It also contained a clause enabling the time of holding the Sessions of the Central Criminal Court to be fixed, not, as was now required by Act of Parliament, by eight Judges, but by four Judges of the Queen's Bench Division. It further contained provisions as to the appointment of officers of the Courts and the filling up of vacancies in the staff of all the Courts. There were various other minor provisions in the Bill, on which he need not now trouble their Lordships.

Bill to amend the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts; and for other purposes —Presented (The LORD CHANCELLOR).

EARL CAIRNS said, it became desirable to re-consider the question of the construction of the Appellate Court when it was deprived of two of its ex-officio members, the Lord Chief Baron and the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas. He agreed with his noble and learned Friend that the occurrence, so much to be lamented in regard to the Court of Appeal, of the death of Lord Justice James made it necessary to consider the constitution of that Court. In all that his noble and learned Friend had said about that very eminent man and his loss he wished to express his entire concurrence. He himself, like his noble and learned Friend, had known Lord Justice James for a very long time, and had been an observer of the manner in which he discharged his duties; and he must say that in his experience he had never seen a Judge who brought to the discharge of his duties a more admirable knowledge of the law which he had to administer, and a more admirable share of common sense—which, after all, was as great a quality for a Judge as a knowledge of the law—than the late Lord Justice James had always done. Turning to the Bill which his noble and learned Friend had presented to their Lordships, he did not desire to express any definite opinion as to some of the changes which were now proposed. He could only say he was glad that the Master of the Rolls was willing to preside in the Court of Appeal. With regard to future holders of the office of Master of the Rolls, he did not know what would be their position as regarded emoluments. The present Master of the Rolls received a higher salary than the Judges of the Court of Appeal. Of course, it was quite proper that the present Master of the Rolls should have that advantage continued to him; but, with regard to future holders of the office of Master of the Rolls, it appeared to him that it would be somewhat objectionable to have one Judge receiving a higher salary than that of the other Judges. He could not quite follow the noble and learned Lord as to the position of the new Judges to be selected annually from the rest of the Judges to be Judges of the Court of Appeal. He would, therefore, reserve any expression of opinion on that proposal until they had the Bill before them. All he would say was that the reason for having ex-officio Judges in the Appeal Court was that they should be independent of the Court below; but he did not see how that was to be secured by taking the Judges by election annually from the Court below. If it was necessary to strengthen the Court of Appeal he should prefer to do that by adding another Judge.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR was understood to say it was proposed that every future holder of the office of the Master of the Rolls should receive the same emoluments as the present Master of the Rolls, because the holder of that office had certain duties to perform with regard to the Record Office.

Bill read 1<sup>a</sup>; to be printed. (No. 147.)

UNITED STATES—ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

OBSERVATION.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am sure the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the noble and learned Earl opposite will forgive me for the irregularity of interposing in the Business of the House; but I wish to inform your Lordships that later telegrams which have been received this evening give a much more favourable account of the condition of the President of the United States than those received in the earlier part of the day.

Earl Cairns

THE GOVERNMENT AND THE LAND LEAGUE.

THE EARL OF ANNESLEY asked the Lord Privy Seal, Whether it was true that Mr. Farrell, the president of the Local Land League at Mullingar, who was confined in Galway Gaol under the provisions of the Coercion Act, and was lately liberated on a medical certificate, was still on the commission of the peace, and signed several commitments to gaol last week?

EARL SPENCER, in reply, said, that Mr. Farrell was still a magistrate, and he believed it was true that he was in the discharge of the duties of the office; but the Irish Government had brought the matter under the consideration of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he understood that Mr. Farrell was an official officer.

CENSUS OF ENGLAND AND WALES, 1881—PRELIMINARY REPORT.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD CARRINGTON: My Lords, the Census Act requires that the Preliminary Abstract of the Census taken on the 4th of April last should be laid before Parliament within three months after the 1st of June. It is satisfactory that the Registrar General has been able to complete this abstract at so early a date. This is not the time to go into particulars; but it may be interesting to know that the total population of England and Wales is now 25,968,286, being an increase since 1871 of 3,256,020. The rate of increase was higher than in any decennium since 1831-41. The birth-rate was unusually high, while the death-rate was still more unusually low. The higher birth-rate in 1871-81, as compared with 1861-71, implies the addition of 26,774 persons beyond the number according to the previous rate, while the lower death-rate implies that 299,385 persons survived, who, according to the previous rate, would have died—a result which seems to show that modern sanitary legislation has produced useful and important effects. It may be added that the population of the Metropolis is now 3,814,571, showing an increase of 560,311, while the population of the City of London has decreased by 24,414.

Preliminary Report and Tables of the Population and Houses enumerated in England and Wales and in the Islands in the British Seas on 4th April 1881: Presented (by command), and ordered to lie on the Table.

House adjourned at a quarter before Seven o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter before Five o'clock.

FRENCH COMMERCIAL TREATY.

PETITION FROM BRADFORD.

MR. MAC IVER said, he had been intrusted with a Petition to present from Bradford of a somewhat remarkable character. It was, in the main, a workmen's Petition; but it represented alike the demand of the employer and of those who wished for work and wages, but which they said were denied them by the pressure of unfair foreign competition with those industries on which the prosperity of Yorkshire depended. He was told that the Petition was nearly 250 yards long, and bore about 21,000 signatures, and that it had been signed in the streets of Bradford by persons of every shade of political opinion. He trusted the House would not turn a deaf ear to the cry for justice, which those who sent the Petition asked him to raise, humbly and respectfully, on their behalf. They saw no reason why French looms should be at work while theirs stood idle; and they asked that honourable House to renew no Treaty with France which allowed France to tax our manufactures, while we received theirs duty free to the displacement of our own industries.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must be quite aware that he is not entitled to debate a Petition.

MR. MAC IVER said, he did not wish to debate anything, but merely to urge the Prayer of the Petition. The Petitioners asked for equal treatment—for fair play. They saw no reason why the working men of France should receive the wages which ought to be spent in this country. They asked, therefore, that no Commercial Treaty with France should be entered into which had not been submitted for the approval and consent of that House; and, further, that no engagement should be entered into which should bind the country for more than 12 months, without an opportunity being afforded of retiring from such engagement if they found it did not suit them. He had no desire or right to enter into matters of argument. There was much, however, that he could wish to say—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must call on the hon. Member to confine himself to the Prayer of the Petition.

MR. MAC IVER said, he most heartily and cordially concurred in the Prayer of the Petition. The day had come when that House could no longer turn a deaf ear to the working population of these lands, or look on coldly while each industry was in turn destroyed. Why had not the people of Bradford intrusted the Petition to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Illingworth)? Because they wished to protest emphatically against such views as his, and because they no longer believed that a system of free imports and of restricted exports was entitled to be called Free Trade.

MR. CHILDERS: I rise to Order, Sir. A Petition cannot contain a protest.

MR. SPEAKER: I have already called to the hon. Member's attention twice the fact that he is not in Order.

MR. MAC IVER said, he begged humbly and respectfully to ask that the Petition be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Petition read; and ordered to lie upon the Table.

Q U E S T I O N S .

TUNIS—TREATIES OF 1662, 1716, AND 1875.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether in the Treaty between England and Tunis of October 5th 1662, there is not the following provision :—

whether the same stipulation does not occur in Article 8 of the Treaty of 13th August 1716 ; whether analogous provisions do not exist in the Treaties of other Powers, which are still in force ; and, whether in consequence the privilege of access to the Bey is not a privilege and immunity conferred by Treaty on Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General, and confirmed by Articles 11 and 5 of the Treaty of 1875 ?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Treaties of 1662 and 1716 were abrogated by the Treaty of 1875, which was substituted for all existing previous Treaties, and in which the Article in question was not repeated. I may, however, point out to the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) that even if this Article were still in force, it would give no “ privilege of access ” to the Consul any more than to any other British subject who might present himself before the Bey for the purpose of seeking justice ; and its effect is entirely annulled by the 24th Article of the Treaty of 1875.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the hon. Baronet had not stated whether analogous provisions did not exist in the Treaties of other Powers which were still in force.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I shall be glad if the hon. Member would state what those Treaties are. I have on four or five occasions informed the House that the most careful search has failed to find any Article of the kind in any Treaty, and Lord Granville has made a statement to this effect in “ another place.” That statement has been elaborately contradicted, especially in a letter in The Times ; but in none of these contradictions have Articles in Treaties been quoted to upset the statement.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— REMOVAL OF HEAD CONSTABLE FRAZER FROM BANBRIDGE.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Head Constable Frazer has been removed from Ban-bridge, after having been stationed there about one month, in consequence of the Roman Catholic priest of the parish having demanded that a head constable of his own persuasion should be sent in his place ; and, whether there would be any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Correspondence between the priest and the authorities ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the reason of the head constable's removal was this— Catholics and Protestants were about the same number in the district, and there appeared to have been some arrangement that if an officer was of one religion the head constable should be of the other. He could not say that he liked such an arrangement ; but he disliked still more the condition of things that seemed to make it necessary. The Government, however, thought it was better that it should be practically put in force ; and that was the reason why the head constable was removed. For his own convenience his removal was delayed for some months.

In reply to Mr. MACARTNEY,

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the removal was not occasioned by the interference of the Catholic priest ; but it was a fact that the priest reminded the Government of the arrangement made some time since.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, whether an equalization of the persuasions of magistrates would not still further get rid of the religious difficulty in Ireland ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should require Notice of the Question.

COURT OF SESSION (SCOTLAND)—AD- MISSION OF REPORTERS.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been directed to the circumstance that in two recent cases in the Court of Session the representatives of the press have been denied access to interlocutors issued by the Lord Ordinary ; and, whether the Clerks of the Court have power to prevent the judgments of the Lord Ordinary being made public ; and, if they have, whether he will take steps to deprive them of that power ?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN): Sir, it is quite clear that, in some form, the public are entitled to be put in possession of the opinions and decisions of the Judges of the Court of Session in contentious cases. In consequence of the difficulty referred to in the Question, the Lords Ordinary have resolved, in future, to deliver their judgments viva voce in open Court, instead of in writing; and the Press will, in future, have the same facilities for reporting the judgments in such cases as exist in the other Superior Courts of the United Kingdom.

INTERNATIONAL LAW — DETENTION OF BRITISH SUBJECTS ON A RUSSIAN WAR-SHIP.

MR. J. STEWART asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been directed to the circumstances under which, on the 25th ultimo, two British subjects were detained for one night on board the Russian war-ship "Peter the Great," then at anchor in the Clyde; and, if he can state whether such detention was justifiable and in accordance with International Law?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (MR. J. M'LAREN): Sir, in the case referred to, one of two boatmen hired by the Russian naval officers to take them on board their ship, being intoxicated, assaulted one of the officers without provocation, and attempted to prevent him going on board. The Russian commander had to send a launch after the boat to rescue the officer; and, as the hour was late, he detained the two boatmen over night and brought them before the police magistrate next morning, by whom Gemmell, the man who committed the assault, was tried and convicted. The Russian officer, in so doing, did not exceed the power which the law accords to every private citizen to arrest a person who commits a crime in his presence, and bring him before a magistrate with the least possible delay.

STATE OF IRELAND—REQUISITION OF HORSES AND CARS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (for Mr. HEALY) asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, in those cases where the Irish police have recently seized horses and cars by force, the Crown will, on a charge being duly preferred against them by the owners, undertake a prosecution; and, if not, if he would state why not; and, whether, if persons not policemen were similarly to impress horses, &c. the Law would be put in force against them, and what is the statute under which such powers are exercised, and whether they invest in each individual policeman in Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW), in reply, said, he presumed the case to which the Question of the hon. Member for Wexford (MR. HEALY) referred occurred a few days ago in the county of Louth. What happened was this. A party of Constabulary hired a number of cars to convey them six or seven miles. After proceeding part of the way some of the drivers refused to drive any further, and the police accordingly drove the cars themselves. He did not see any offence in that. It was quite true that there was no law authorizing the police to forcibly seize cars.

BULGARIA—PRINCE ALEXANDER OF BATTENBERG.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been directed to a conversation between Prince Alexander of Battenberg and a correspondent of the "Standard," in which the Prince is alleged to have said that "for the Great Powers, Bulgaria c'est mer" (meaning thereby apparently himself), and that when he asked the Emperors of Austria, Russia, and Germany, what he ought to do in consequence of having sworn to maintain a Constitution, which he terms a "half Republican Constitution," they each replied, "do what you like, but do not leave Bulgaria;" and if the Government have received any confirmation of the alleged conversation; whether Her Majesty's Government, as one of the Great Powers, accepts the assertion of the Prince that Bulgaria is a mere diplomatic expression, meaning neither the country nor its inhabitants, but Prince Alexander of Battenberg; whether communication has been received from any foreign Government leading to the conclusion that, in the event of the Bulgarians declining to grant to Prince Alexander a dictatorship, or seeking to hinder him from exercising such a dictatorship, a foreign occupation of Bulgaria would ensue; whether any complaint has been received respecting the manner in which the elections to the Grand National Assembly have been conducted; and whether, considering the great losses that have accrued to investors by lending money to foreign countries on imperfect security, Her Majesty's Government will make public the fact that, by the Articles 123—125 of the Constitution of Bulgaria, the Prince can under no circumstances decree a loan of above 1,000,000 francs, nor authorise expenditures from the public Treasury, which taken together shall exceed the sum of 300,000 francs, and that consequently, if he acquires dictatorial power by unconstitutional means, no loan incurred by him for more than 1,000,000 francs would be valid as against Bulgaria?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, we have not received any confirmation of the language alleged to have been used by Prince Alexander in the conversation referred to. The view of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the meaning of the term "Bulgaria" is that which may be drawn from a perusal of the Treaty of Berlin. We have not heard that any foreign occupation has been proposed or is probable. We have not, since the holding of the elections, received any complaint as to the manner in which they were conducted. The Constitution of Bulgaria has been laid before Parliament, and does not, therefore, seem to lack publicity.

ITALY—FRANCE AND TUNIS.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that the Italian Government have refused to recognise the French Protectorate in Tunis, and the appointment of Monsieur Roustan as intermediary for their official communications with the Government of the Bey; and, whether the Italian Government have more than once since the commencement of the French hostilities against Tunis pressed Her Majesty's Government to act in concert with them, particularly with respect to the appointment of Monsieur Roustan, and what answer Her Majesty's Government have made to those proposals?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, it is not the fact, so far as Her Majesty's Government are aware, that the Italian Government have refused to recognize the French Protectorate in Tunis, or the appointment of M. Roustan. The Italian Government have inquired of Her Majesty's Government, through the Italian Ambassador in London, what are the views of Her Majesty's Government on certain questions arising out of the position of France in Tunis, and Lord Granville has, in reply, informed his Excellency of the communications which Her Majesty's Ambassador in Paris has been instructed to make to the French Government on these questions.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The hon. Baronet has not answered the last part of my Question. Is it true that the Italian Government have more than once pressed Her Majesty's Government to act in concert with them, particularly with respect to the appointment of M. Roustan?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The Question will be best answered by the Papers before the House. No such phrase as "acting in concert" was used. Her Majesty's Government has been asked its opinion on certain points, and our opinion has been communicated to the Italian Government.

TUNIS—BRITISH COLONISTS AND TRADE.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he will lay upon the Table a Return showing the number of British Colonists, and the extent of British trade, at Susa, Monastir, Medhia, Sfax, and Gabes, in the territory of Tunis; also a Return giving the same information with respect to Tripoli and Bengazi?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I do not know whether the noble Lord has read the Reports furnished yearly by Her Majesty's Consular Officers in Tunis and Tripoli; but these give all the information which Her Majesty's Government are able to supply.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I would point out that my reason for asking the Question is, that the public might be made aware in a short and easy manner of our interests in North Africa?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I do not think, as regards the figures up to a recent period, that they could be laid before the public in a shorter form.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL gave Notice that, on an early occasion, he would move for those Returns.

TUNIS AND FRANCE—BOMBARDMENT OF SFAX.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he has reason to believe that the French Government have any intention to proceed to a bombardment of Sfax, or to take any hostile measures towards the town and people of Sfax; and, whether they will intimate to the French Government that any damage to British property arising out of such hostile measures will entitle the owners thereof to full compensation to be demanded by the Government?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, as a French Consul and several French naval officers appear to have been attacked and wounded at Sfax, it is possible that such measures as the noble Lord contemplates may be taken by France. It is not usual to make beforehand any such intimation as the noble Lord suggests; and if the occasion arises, Her Majesty's Government will, of course, strictly follow the precedents in similar cases of destruction of neutral property.

FRANCE AND TUNIS (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked leave to postpone the following Question which he had upon the Paper—namely, to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the public press, that M. Roustan directs not only the Foreign Office of Tunis but also all the Government Departments, and claims by the municipality and other bodies against Europeans are made by M. Roustan; whether he can inform the House what guarantees for the protection of British interests exist under such a system; and if he is aware that in one of the aforesaid capacities M. Roustan has adjudged a portion of ground adjoining the English Church, and secured in perpetuity to the British colony by an ancient deed of the Beys of Tunis, to a French subject who never set up any claim to the land prior to the French occupation?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I will ask the House to excuse me if I inform the noble Earl that I have already, on several occasions, stated to the House that questions arising out of the twofold nature of the functions discharged by M. Roustan were under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and were the subject of communications with the Government of France. These communications will be laid before Parliament. We have no information up to the present time as to M. Roustan having adjudged a portion of ground adjoining the English church to a French subject. I must be allowed to point out that a Question of this nature requires a search through the Papers in the French and Turkish Departments of the Foreign Office, and may require consultation with the Secretary of State and the Permanent Under Secretary. This Question was placed upon the Paper at the close of the Sitting of last night, and reached me for the first time at half-past 11 o'clock this morning. I may add that it is not always possible to accept, without inquiry, the statements of fact in the questions relating to Tunis of the noble Earl, for one which he put to me on Thursday last has been the subject of correspondence between myself and the principal gentleman named in it, and I am assured that, as far as he is concerned, there is no foundation for the statements referred to.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE: With reference to the remarks just made by the hon. Baronet, I beg to give Notice that I will repeat my Question of Thursday last, to which he has referred, and, on information subsequently received, I will make a statement which I am not without hope may induce him very considerably to modify the remarks he has made.

FRANCE AND TUNIS—REPORTED INSURRECTION.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If Her Majesty's Government, in consideration of the probability of the present serious insurrection caused by the French invasion spreading to the immediate neighbourhood of the city of Tunis, intend sending some ships of war to Goletta in place of those sent towards Tripoli in order to protect British subjects resident in Tunis and its neighbourhood?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Condor has been ordered back to Goletta. It is evident that the danger of which the noble Lord is apprehensive is not regarded as imminent, because the French have no ship at Tunis of a larger class than the Condor. The Fleet under Sir Beauchamp Seymour is cruising within four days' call, and, if further occasion arises, more iron-clads will be sent.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)
ACT, 1881—GUN LICENCES.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that over one hundred respectable farmers and others in the district of Newcastle West, county Limerick, have been waiting for a licence to carry arms for over a month, though they hold duly qualified recommendations; and, if so, will he inform the House why it is the resident magistrate does not perform this duty?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the resident magistrate in the district of Newcastle West informed him he was unable to give as much time to the examination of these applications for arms licences as was necessary in consequence of the disturbed state of his district. He had already granted 400 licences, and would attend to the other applications as soon as possible.

SOUTH AFRICA — THE TRANSVAAL WAR—THE PORTUGUESE CONSUL.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received an application from Mr. Forssman, Consul General for Portugal in the Transvaal, for compensation for losses and injuries incurred by him during the siege of Potchefstroom, and what is the amount of compensation which he claims?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received such an application as that to which my right hon. Friend has referred. The amount claimed by way of compensation is £219,000. Probably it would be premature, and not altogether decorous, for Her Majesty's Government to give any opinion as to the first impression which they formed with respect to the claim. Therefore, on that ground, I will withhold any such opinion. But the claim itself will have to be forwarded to the Commission to be duly examined by them.

Mr. Trevelyan

THE ROYAL PRINCES—FALSE
RUMOURS.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he has inquired into, and can give the House any information as to, the painful rumour circulated in London yesterday of a disaster to one of the Royal Princes?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am very glad to be able to state that we received a telegram to-day, a little before noon, from Lord Clanwilliam, the commander of the Bacchante, dated yesterday afternoon, from Melbourne, in answer to our inquiry. His telegram runs as follows:—"No. 16 received. No foundation whatsoever."

WAYS AND MEANS — REVENUE RE-TURNS—DECREASE IN THE EXCISE.

MR. LAING asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is in a position to afford the House any information which will explain the unfavourable account contained in the last Revenue Returns, as regards a considerable falling off in the Excise duties?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the general state of the Revenue is not very familiar to me; but as to the particular point of my hon. Friend's inquiry, I think I can give satisfactory information. The House will remember that, on examining the year's Returns of the Revenue, they could not but be struck with the ominous fact that there was a decrease of £420,000 odd on the Excise. Now, the reason of that decrease, which is the one and distinctly unfavourable and striking feature, is the different distribution of the Malt Duty and the Beer Duty over the four quarters of the year. The Beer Duty, according to the estimate which has been formed and according to experience, is receivable in the four quarters of the year in very nearly four equal portions; but the Malt Duty varies in the four quarters, according to normal experience, as much as from 14 per cent in one quarter to 40 per cent in another. There is no such inequality in the present case. If there had been, the discrepancy in the Excise would have been very much greater; but the difference in the present case is that 30 per cent of the Malt Duty was received in a normal quarter, in the three months ending the 2nd of June, and only 24 per cent of the Beer Duty. Now, when we remember that 1 per cent of duty amounts to £87,000, and that 6 per cent amounts to £512,000, it will be obvious to my hon. Friend that these figures dispose of the whole of the apparent decrease.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. STEVENSON said, that the first Order of the Day for Wednesday was the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill. He wished, therefore, to ask the Prime Minister whether, having regard to the general interest taken in that question out-of-doors, there was any hope that precedence would be given to the second reading of the measure with which he (Mr. Stevenson) was charged over the Land Law (Ireland) Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: No, Sir; no hope whatever.

THE NEW FRENCH GENERAL TARIFF. MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that after what had passed on the previous day on the subject, he rose with regret for the purpose of making an appeal to the Prime Minister for a translation in English of the Return of the French Tariff. In doing so, the House was aware that he was within the fact when he said there was no question at that moment which was more discussed, and more constantly in the mouth of every workman in every factory, workshop, and yard in the country than the question of their commercial relations with France. He was exceedingly sorry to make that appeal to the Prime Minister; but hon. Members on both sides of the House would be aware that he had in no way interrupted or interfered with the progress of the Business of the House. During the discussion on the Land Bill he had restrained his feelings. But the conduct of the Government in persistently withholding all or any information with respect to the French Tariff, and the position of this country in regard to its commercial relations with France—what he should call the persistent concealment on the part of the Government with regard to what was going on in reference to their Treaty relations with France—

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD rose to Order, and said there was no Question before the House.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he would conclude with a Motion. The conduct of the Government had made it absolutely necessary for him to take that step—[“Oh, oh!”]—and he would remind hon. Gentlemen opposite below the Gangway, who had not been so long in the House as himself, that he was only following the example of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who took the very step he (Viscount Sandon) was now obliged to take, of intruding the subject to the notice of the House from those very Benches when he was last in Opposition a few years ago. He would just ask them to remember why he was obliged to take that step. It was quite obvious from the answer that had been given by the Prime Minister that private Members had no chance of bringing forward any subject whatever; and yet the present subject, by general consent, was one which was exercising the great masses of the people very much more than the Irish Land Bill. He should, therefore, have been happy to obtain a discussion on the subject at half-past 12 at night, and should have been perfectly content to have divided the House on the subject at that late hour, not caring for a long discussion; but the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) had thought fit to take a course which, in former Sessions, was considered most unusual, and had prevented him proceeding with the Motion for a Return of the changes contemplated in their commercial relations with France. He (Viscount Sandon) was one of the last men to allude to former services; but he must just ask hon. Members to recollect that when he asked for a Return of this kind he did so, not in his personal capacity, but as one who had borne an important Office in the last Government, as President of the Board of Trade, and as one who, owing to his connection with the important port of Liverpool, had some right to assume that he knew something of the commercial feeling of this country, not only as to Chambers of Commerce—for he was happy to say he did not confine his inquiries to Chambers of Commerce—but among merchants and the great mass of men who gained their living by means of commerce. He believed it to be unprecedented to refuse a Return of this kind when asked for, and he was fully aware of the great responsibility of taking this step. The question, he would point out, was urgent; and it was urgent, because the commercial relations with France must be concluded within a very few weeks. Now, the House of Commons, the Prime Minister told them, was to adjourn about the 6th of August—just four weeks' time, and if the French Chambers prolonged the negotiations on the subject, they would only be prolonged, they were told, for three months, so that the country would have no opportunity whatever of expressing an opinion upon its great commercial relations with France in the few weeks that remained of the Session. He said that hon. Members on the opposite side of the House treated this subject as a light subject; but the constituencies did not think so, and he would recommend hon. Members to visit their constituents, and see what they thought about it. He thought he had established urgency; for the House was to be up in four weeks, and negotiations for the Treaty must proceed very shortly. Perhaps hon. Members thought he was making a good deal of a Return which they had not seen, or perhaps the Prime Minister had not seen, and if the right hon. Gentleman would allow him, he would make him a present of one. [Laughter.] Some hon. Members regarded that as a joke; but it was no joking matter. He (Viscount Sandon) observed the President of the Board of Trade regarded it as a joke; but the Return was a very serious thing. It was not his desire to have a general account; but what he requested was, that the people of this country should be put in possession of a statement of their former commercial position with France, and of the changes proposed to be introduced, so that they might compare the two. The Return he wished to have in English was in three columns. The first was the old Tariff, the second the commercial arrangements with France, under which we had worked some years under Cobden's negotiations and under the Most Favoured Nation Clause; and the third column gave the new Tariff as proposed by the French Chambers. It did not give that mysterious document which nobody was allowed to see but a few favoured members of the Chambers of Commerce; and it did not give what the hon. Baronet (Sir Charles W. Dilke) had called the tariff à discounter in the French terms which had been offered by the French Commissioners. There was a tendency to use French terms; but he thought that was a practice rather to be avoided in the House. He thought it was right to use English terms in this country. This Paper contained about 600 articles in print. It was not a very heavy book, but one of modest extent, consisting only of about 52 pages, and it would not be a matter of very heavy cost if given in English. He moved for the Returns in April in a very simple and natural manner, and as it was produced it showed the various facts in English. He therefore expected the Returns would be given in the same language; but, to his astonishment, when he was prepared to send them to some working-men's associations in Liverpool, who took a keen interest in this matter—[Ministerial laughter]*—*he was not at all ashamed to own that he had sent it to a working-men's association; he was saying that to his astonishment he found it to be in French, and that he would only make himself utterly absurd if he sent it to the working men in that language, with which they were not familiar. So the matter first came to his notice. After a while, hon. Members from other commercial constituencies said the same thing, when the constituencies asked for them. He had asked for an English translation; but it was refused, the Returns remaining in French; and that, he thought, was an unprecedented course for the Government to take at a time of great excitement on commercial matters. That was, however, a course reserved entirely for that most enlightened Liberal Government to adopt. Now, some of the supporters of the Government might regard that as a slight matter; but that it was not so would be apparent when he stated that the new Tariff increased by about 24 per cent the duties on the great bulk of the important articles of British manufacture; and, beyond that, converted to our detriment into specific duties the existing ad valorem duties, which appeared to have been raised. It also made a change in the classification, which the English people would have difficulty in understanding if information such as he asked for was persistently withheld, and which would increase the duties. Anybody who knew anything of commercial matters was aware that the change implied a great burden upon the British trader. It was a change which would also be very fatal to the English people. ["Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.] It might be said by some that the proposed changes would affect but few industries; but the contrary was the fact, as their influence on British industries would be widespread and most serious. If the House would allow him, he would show how multiform were the interests affected, and what the articles affected were. They were stone and slate, marble and stone, all minerals and stones, iron and steel, chemicals, soda, soap and starch, feathers and down, earthenware and china, glass and glass ware, prints and textiles, table-linen, hosiery, cotton, poplin, velvets, silk, tissue and fancy papers, skins and leather, furniture, carriages, musical instruments, guns, fowling-pieces, and breech-loading rough gun-barrels. These were but a selection of the articles upon which a seriously increased Tariff was proposed to be placed; and the selection he had given would show how widespread and serious were the changes which were proposed by our French neighbours. Surely by this time we could understand that the matter was a very important one. He would ask just one simple question, which perhaps would tend to bring this discussion to an issue. Why on earth should there be any concealment whatever on the part of the Government on a matter of such importance to the people of this country? If they did not want to have Returns, why did the Government grant it in French six weeks ago? But the Government did grant a Return, full of important particulars in three columns, showing the particular position of the country at this moment. It was important that the country should know what the position of the country was. The Return was granted without hesitation in French; what possible excuse could the Government have for not giving it in English? He was quite sure the position of right hon. Gentleman opposite was utterly and entirely untenable. It was almost like saying to a boy, who was growing up—"These books are only for grown-up people, so pray do not read them. When you are grown up you can read them." So this was saying to the working people—"When you know French, you can read it; it is not for the present working people, and you shall not read what your betters around you shall read." He would venture to remind the House, from his own knowledge, what was the feeling of the commercial class—working-men, manufacturers, shipping-people—with regard to the French Treaty. It was this, that they certainly ought not to have a worse French Treaty than the Cobden Treaty. That, he thought, was a universal feeling on both sides of the House. They could not afford to have a worse Treaty than the Cobden Treaty, and he believed that they ought to have, and might have by careful and prudent negotiations, a better Treaty. Hon. Gentlemen opposite, no doubt, might say that they ought to have confidence in Her Majesty's Government in this matter. But he (Viscount Sandon) did not wish to raise the matter as a question of confidence one way or the other. It was very much too serious a question in the interests of this country for that. In the interest of truth and facts, he must say that it had not been unobserved by those interested in these industries that in the division led by the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), both the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs voted against his Resolution—

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I stated at the time that the Government would vote for going into Committee of Supply, agreeing, as they did, with the terms of the hon. Member's Resolution, but thinking it undignified to pass such a Resolution while the negotiations were going on.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he wished to point out that the names which appeared in the Division List gave the impression that the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen to whom he had referred were not staunch, and the conduct of the President of the Board of Trade with regard to the Sugar Bounties had, he (Viscount Sandon) ventured to say, probably done more to shake the confidence of the working people of the country—[Cries of "No, no!"—]—he hoped he might be allowed to finish the sentence—had done, perhaps, more than was imagined to shake the confidence of the working people, not with regard to his economic views, but with regard to his sympathy towards those engaged in the sugar refining industries, as indicated by the tone of the letters signed by the Board of Trade. He would now run over the several reasons given by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade for refusing to give the information which they had a right to demand.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg the noble Viscount's pardon. The noble Viscount attributes to me a statement which I did not make at all, and in regard to which I have on more than one occasion endeavoured to correct him. I did not refuse the translation of this Return. I never have refused it. ["Oh!"] I merely asked the noble Viscount to wait the result of inquiries which I was making of the representatives of the commercial classes with regard to its utility.

VISCOUNT SANDON, continuing, said, the right hon. Gentleman seemed to forget that he was asked by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) to give this translation. He did not give it, and he repeatedly refused it. He declined to give it for the following reasons:—He said that it would cause a great deal of delay; but the real delay was in declining to give the Return, because if it had been put in hand three weeks ago, when the Question was asked, the translation would have been made and in the hands of the public by this time. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that "there was considerable difficulty in translation." He also said he was at a loss to find English equivalents for some of the French denominations. He (Viscount Sandon) thought that rather strengthened the reason why they should have the translation. The whole of the commercial community interested in the question of the French Commercial Treaty were told that the Government could not find in the Foreign Office, in the Board of Trade, or among the experts in London, men competent to find English equivalents for these French terms. One comfort was, however, given to them. They were assured that the working men—the artizans—the right hon. Gentleman

(Mr. Chamberlain) said so—were all acquainted with the French terms used. If that were so, it simplified the matter, for it would have been a very easy thing to have sent a Circular from the Board of Trade to the different centres of artizan population, asking the working men what was the meaning of the terms? That, he thought, threw some light on the negotiations which had been proceeding. It turned out that those grandees sitting in Whitehall did not understand the meaning of some of the terms they were discussing, and the whole subject was wrapped up in so much mystery, so much confusion, that he thought it would be best cleared up by the Prime Minister giving the Returns in English, so that the country might know exactly what the position was. There was one thing, however, which stopped the way. The President of the Board of Trade told them that the Return might be an expensive one. He (Viscount Sandon), however, could not think, when so much expense was being incurred in connection with the Commercial Treaty, that translating into English a little Return of 52 pages would be a very heavy burden even upon the exchequer of a Liberal Government. He was supposed to be crushed by the answer of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who said that they were discussing the French General Tariff in the Commission; but nobody supposed that they were discussing the French General Tariff, seeing that the Commissioners from France brought their terms in their hands. It was no answer whatever to his appeal to say they were not to know what the Cobden Tariff was, to enable them to compare it with the new French Tariff, because of this mysterious document which they were not allowed to see in the Chambers of Whitehall. He thought it was a great misfortune that the document should be communicated singly to the different manufacturers, so that each manufacturer separately should be made aware of the secret proposals of the French Government. He maintained that the country had a right to be made acquainted with the question of the French Tariff as a whole. Anybody who knew anything of the feelings of the industrial classes was aware that there was what might be called a great solidarity between them. They all felt that if one class of industry was injured, the others would ultimately suffer. He would conclude by again asking—What was the meaning of all that concealment? Why did not the Government at once give way? He had told the President of the Board of Trade that he should not be satisfied with the mere opinions of the Chambers of Commerce. He asked hon. Members opposite whether, if the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce said they did not care for a translation, he (Viscount Sandon), representing thousands of persons interested in trade and commerce, would be right in accepting that statement? He felt convinced that this affair had arisen from the want of experience—with which they had no right to find fault—of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. Nobody could suppose it was a grave fault; but, of course, they all knew that the right hon. Gentleman had not spent a great deal of time within those walls. He appealed to the Prime Minister, who appreciated deeply and truly the feelings of the masses of the industrial classes, and who knew how they liked to be taken into confidence in these matters, which affected their daily bread and daily life; and he asked him to take one of two courses—first, that he would instruct the Members of his Government to remove the block from the Motion which stood in his (Viscount Sandon's) name, if he put it on the Paper. He would then bring it on after half-past 12, when he would be content, sparing them another speech, to take the opinion of the House upon it; and if the House thought it was better that there should not be an English translation of these French Commercial Treaties, he would not say more about the matter. What, however, he would like better than that course would be for the Prime Minister to acknowledge that there had been a slight mistake, and to say that on the whole he thought it was better that an English translation should be at once laid on the Table. He would move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Viscount Sandon.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I have no complaint to make of either of the alternative proposals with which the noble

Viscount opposite (Viscount Sandon) has concluded his speech, as they are perfectly fair ones—that the Government should withdraw the expression of a desire made by my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Chamberlain) not to have an opportunity of discussing this Return before it was granted; and the other, that we should agree to withdraw any obstacle to the prosecution of the Motion of the noble Viscount, either at the proper hour of the evening, or, as he fairly says, at half-past 12, and allow him to take the judgment of the House upon it. I make no complaint of that proposition. I am very sorry that the noble Viscount, who is not accustomed to deal with a matter of this kind, should have introduced into the speech one or two points which require a little notice from me. He made it matter of complaint that when he appealed to me yesterday I was silent. The noble Viscount did appeal to me yesterday, and I was silent; but the reason was that I requested my right hon. Friend near me to speak on my behalf. The reason why I said nothing was because I knew nothing, a rule which, I think, perhaps, would be advantageous—namely, that those who know nothing of a subject should say less. I say so for myself, and perhaps other hon. Members may apply the remark to themselves. The noble Viscount quoted, as a precedent to the conduct of my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in having previously moved the adjournment of the House during the Question time. That precedent, in my opinion, is no precedent at all, as the cases are not in the slightest analogous. But I make no complaint whatever of the noble Viscount moving the adjournment of the House, because I think, under the circumstances in which he stands, he not having the means of bringing it forward in any other way, he has a perfect right to take this course—at all events, it is not my business to complain. I do, however, really feel somewhat disposed to regret that the noble Viscount should have assumed the patronage of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade for what he thinks his miscarriage in this matter, and thrown his shield over him, by referring to what he considers his inexperience in Office. My right hon. Friend has sat in this House for a not inconsiderable number of years, and has had an amount of practice in what may be called Public Business before entering this House, which is probably quite unequalled by that of any other hon. Member within the House. The noble Viscount must know that this kind of patronage, especially when offered across the Table, has really always the appearance of an intention to wound and hurt the feelings of those to whom it is directed. In these circumstances, I think that the tone of the noble Viscount's speech was most inappropriate and most unfortunate, and I trust the noble Viscount himself will a little regret it. I come now to the question itself. The noble Viscount asks what is the object of all this concealment on the part of the Government? Here, I must say, I am afraid we are all apt to be more tolerant of charges against our moral character than against our understanding, and I own I do feel very much hurt by the estimate the noble Viscount has formed of our understanding, when he actually conceives that we are capable of devising a plan to conceal information from the House and the public, by only publishing it in the French language. I think the estimate he forms of our motives in this matter is one he might apply to the lowest aborigines on the face of the earth, or, perhaps, even to go further back, to some of our ancestors anterior to the human race; and, even there, he might have detected a dawning of intelligence, such as if they had desired to conceal anything they would never have adopted this particular course. Now I come to the main matter—and I think I have come to it rather quicker than the noble Viscount—and, after consulting my right hon. Friend, I will take the shortest of the noble Viscount's suggestions, and for this reason—my right hon. Friend near me desired to secure an opportunity for discussing this Motion, because he thought it desirable to lay before the House the position of affairs. But to-day the question has been raised in a manner that seems to evoke a considerable amount of warmth, and that warmth is not an immaterial fact for us to weigh. I must say that if there is any one subject on which, more than another, we should be less anxious to practice concealment it would be the tendency to establish protective Tariffs, whether in France or any other foreign countries. That is a subject on which,

so far as we can prudently do it, it is our interest in the highest sense, and eminently conformable to the traditions of my right hon. Friend and all those who sit on this side of the House, that we should endeavour to enlist the English public upon our side. There are several modes of enlisting public opinion. Some of these modes may be prudent, and others less prudent. The noble Viscount has read out, amidst storms of indignant cheers from the opposite Benches, the extravagant rates of protective duty which the French, in the exercise of their discretion, have proposed to levy upon a multitude of English imported goods, of which the noble Viscount only gave us a very short statement. For my own part, I am delighted to find manifested upon the opposite side of the House so strong a sense of the inexpediency of a country resorting to such practices. I am all the more delighted at that manifestation of feeling on the part of hon. Members opposite because, unfortunately, it is not supposed to be expressive of the sentiment held by them; and I have seen in journals professing to represent their views, and I have read in speeches which have been delivered through the length and breadth of the country, lamentations over the unwisdom of this country in exposing its markets to be flooded by all sorts of manufactures, and, on the other hand, altogether commending the great prudence and wonderful forethought of other countries, France amongst them, for protecting their trade against the invasion of the stranger. My satisfaction at that expression of opinion on the part of hon. Members opposite is all the greater because I am sure they will admit that if these prohibitive duties are bad in the case of one country they must be equally bad in the case of all countries, and that will show that they have changed their minds as to the effect of them in this country. What I desire, however, to point out is that, although the expression of such sentiments on behalf of hon. Members opposite may have considerable effect in rousing and stirring up the public feeling of this country against protective Tariffs, the echo of those sentiments will go forth, and the speech of the noble Viscount will go forth, and be heard in France, and by the French public; and the consequence may be—I do not hesitate to say that probably it will be—to seriously increase the difficulties of carrying on the negotiations between the two countries. My frank opinion is, and I appeal to hon. Members on all sides of the House, to remember that, while it is desirable that the British public shall be thoroughly and completely informed as to what is going on, it is desirable that these matters shall not become the theme of a rather warm debate in this House at the present moment while negotiations are proceeding, but that the discussion in respect of them shall be postponed to a more convenient season. My right hon. Friend is quite ready to give an indication of his very sincere adhesion to that view by consenting at once to repress the desire he has felt for stating what he would call his case in favour of the Return; and, therefore, instead of agreeing to the suggestion of the noble Viscount that this debate shall be resumed at a late hour, I am willing to withdraw all opposition to the production of the Return. Her Majesty's Government feel that it is far better that they should remain, in some degree, misapprehended, and that their motives, not for refusing, but for postponing, the production of these Papers should be misunderstood, than that they should enter upon a debate on the subject at the present moment which may lead to misconstruction. No doubt the noble Viscount felt himself justified in bringing forward this question if he believed that the Government were shrouding themselves behind the impenetrable mysteries of the French language in order to gain their object of concealment. I am not, therefore, in any way finding fault with the noble Viscount; but I appeal to him, after the concession I have made, to withdraw his Motion for the adjournment of the House.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, he would answer the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman by doing his best to prevent the discussion from going any further. All he could say was that if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Chamberlain) thought that he (Viscount Sandon) had said anything personally discourteous towards him he begged to tender to him his most hearty apologies, because the last person towards whom he should desire to be discourteous would be his Successor in Office, who had always shown the most friendly feeling towards him. After the very handsome way in which the Prime Minister had consented to his application, he should place his Notice of Motion for the Return on the Table to-night, so that it might be moved to-morrow as an unopposed Return, and he would trust to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to lay a translation of the document in question before the House as speedily as possible. He trusted that, in future, the error of giving Returns in foreign languages would not be repeated, and that they would have them laid upon the Table in their own old English tongue, of which they were so proud. In conclusion, he begged to be allowed to withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment of the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he desired to give expression to the feeling of the people of this country, whose industries were likely to be affected by the new French Tariff, with respect to the importance of their being supplied with an authentic translation of the recently adopted French Tariff. A meeting had lately been held by his constituents at Coventry, which was attended by 2,000 or 3,000 persons, and they had urged him not to allow this subject of the French Tariff to proceed without their being afforded all the information he could obtain for them respecting it. Now, if he sent them the Tariff in French, what would be their answer to him? Why, they would at once turn upon him as the author of the work which he held in his hand, and which he had just brought from the Library, and say to him—"Do you, as the author of The Tariffs of All Nations, translated into English, with the foreign weights, measures, and monies reduced to their English equivalents, expect us to understand this foreign document?" The question was by no means a new one. The unwillingness of the Department of the Board of Trade to furnish this House and the country with information as to foreign Tariffs was an old failing. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. DILLWYN rose to Order. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) was discussing a subject which had been withdrawn, and his conduct in doing so appeared to be approaching the confines of Obstruction.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member for North Warwickshire was in Order.

MR. NEWDEGATE, resuming, said, that from the year 1847 to 1852 he endeavoured to induce the successive Presidents of the Board of Trade to furnish that information as to foreign Tariffs in English; but successive Administrations supported that Department in withholding that information until, in the year 1852—for that system of concealment was practised equally by the Government of Lord Russell and that of the late Lord Derby—he (Mr. Newdegate) stated in that House that he would undertake the task himself. Here, in the volume which he held in his hand, was the result of that undertaking. This work was to be found in the Library of the House. It was as much acknowledged as an authority in the United States as in this country; and he asked whether the House meant again to devolve upon one of its Members, as an individual, a task that ought to be executed by the Foreign Office or the Board of Trade? The work to which he referred was produced in 1855. He (Mr. Newdegate) took it to Lord Palmerston when Prime Minister, and that noble Lord did him the honour of consulting him with respect to the orders which should be issued to the various Embassies of this country for the purpose of continuing the information he (Mr. Newdegate) had condensed up to 1855. Lord Palmerston did more than that, he showed him (Mr. Newdegate) the orders before he issued them; and if the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would turn to the records of his Department he would find Lord Palmerston's order for furnishing the information in English, which was issued to every Embassy and every Consulate of this country abroad. That order was signed by Lord Palmerston in his (Mr. Newdegate) presence, and if the Embassy in Paris had not furnished Her Majesty's Government with the information which the noble Viscount the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) required, the order given by Lord Palmerston when Prime Minister must have been either cancelled or disobeyed. He (Mr. Newdegate) would not have troubled the House, but he thought the House would find itself at a great disadvantage if

hon. Members undertook to discuss this matter—the contemplated Commercial Treaty with France—in the dark; in other words, upon imperfect information, or upon data given in a foreign tongue, which the constituents of hon. Members and the people of this country generally did not understand. He held that the production of such documents relating to or descriptive of foreign Tariffs, or negotiations relating to such Tariffs in foreign languages, giving foreign weights and measures and foreign monies unconverted into their English equivalents, was simply inviting this House to debate in the dark; and he now put this question plainly to the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs—he asked the hon. Gentleman to inform the House whether the order which he (Mr. Newdegate) had seen Lord Palmerston sign, and which was issued to the Embassies of this country abroad, enjoining them to give accounts of all changes, and of all proposed changes, in the Tariffs of the countries to which they were accredited in English, giving the foreign weights and measures and the foreign monies converted into their English equivalents, had been withdrawn, cancelled, or disobeyed?

No reply was given to the Question.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MONK gave Notice that, on Thursday next, he should ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he would lay upon the Table the tariff à discuter, which formed the basis of negotiations as to the French demands?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that he would prefer to answer the Question at once. At the last meeting of the High Commissioners on Saturday they had asked their French Colleagues whether the Protocol of the proposed Tariff was a document which might be made public now, or whether it was still to be concealed, as the English Commissioners had no object in concealing any of the documents. The French Commissioners then stated that the negotiations were not at an end, but were merely suspended for some weeks. And they invited the English Commissioners to resume the negotiations in Paris at the end of a month; and they added that pending the negotiations the Protocols and the conventional Tariff were still confidential documents.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH)—THE ORDER OF 10TH MAY.

COLONEL MAKINS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of Order. I desire to ask you, whether it is true, as has been stated in the newspapers, that you have received a threatening letter from Mr. Bradlaugh—that is to say, not a letter threatening you with personal violence, but threatening to use violence for the purpose of impugning a Resolution passed by the House; whether it is your intention to take official notice of the letter; and whether you will take such steps as may be advisable for protecting the Serjeant-at-Arms and the other officers of the House from such violence in discharging their duties in pursuance of that Resolution?

MR. SPEAKER: Before the hon. Member arose, I was about to inform the House that I had received a communication from Mr. Bradlaugh, Member for Northampton; and I was about to communicate that letter to the House. I will do so now. It is in the following terms:—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Might I, Mr. Speaker, ask you a question on a point of Order, before you proceed to read that letter? ["Order!"] In spite of interruptions from the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker having allowed me to put a point of Order, I insist upon continuing. I wish to ask you, Sir, whether it is competent for any hon. Member to move, after you have communicated that letter to the House; that it be not inserted on the Journals of the House, that it be not considered by the House; and that you, Sir, be requested by the House not to give any reply to it?

MR. SPEAKER: The letter, after I have read it to the House, will be laid upon the Table; it will then appear in the Votes, and it will be competent for any hon. Member to found a Motion upon it if he should think proper hereafter to do so. I will now proceed to read the letter to the House:—

"To the Right Honourable

"The Speaker of the House of Commons.

"Sir,

"I beg most respectfully to submit to your notice the following points:—

"1. I am advised that the interruption on the 27th April, and my removal on the 10th May last from the House by the Serjeant at Arms, when engaged according to Law and in precise compliance with the Rules and Orders of the House in attempting to perform the duty of taking my seat, was on each occasion absolutely illegal, and was an infringement of my rights and in breach of my privileges as a duly returned Member of the House.

"2. I am advised that the House of Commons had not any authority either by statute, or according to its own precedents, to pass any Resolution interrupting me or authorising the Serjeant at Arms so to remove me, I being then in the exercise of my lawful right and attempting the orderly performance of my legal duty.

"3. I am advised that I should have been justified in resisting the use of the illegal and therefore unjustifiable physical force on the part of the Serjeant at Arms.

"4. I am advised that, notwithstanding the illegality of the said forcible removal of myself by the Serjeant at Arms, I have no remedy in any Court of Law against the said Serjeant at Arms, as the privileges of the House of Commons protect its Officer even in wrongful acts, if such acts are done in pursuance of the Order of the House.

"5. I am advised that the Order of the House of the 10th May last, a copy of which Order has been served upon me, does not authorise the Serjeant at Arms to use force or to employ force to prevent my re-entry into the House, to the Table of which I have been properly introduced, for the purpose of completely complying with the Law in order to take my seat at the time and in the manner provided by the Standing Orders.

"6. That if such Order should be construed to authorise the said Serjeant at Arms to attempt by force to prevent me from entering the House to complete and fulfil the duty required from me by Law, in the manner provided by the Standing Orders, then that any such user of force would be absolutely illegal, and may be lawfully resisted and overcome by me.

"I beg therefore, Sir, most respectfully to give notice that I claim to disregard the Order of the House of the 10th day of May last, and to treat the same as not requiring obedience from me, on the ground that such Order is absolutely illegal. I do not dispute the power of the House in its pleasure to vacate my seat if once I have taken it. In such case it would be for the Electors of Northampton to decide on a new Election as to whom they would wish further to represent them. I do not question, nor should I resist, the authority of the House to arrest me, this right it has exercised over Englishmen far more more important than myself, but I do deny, and, if it unhappily becomes necessary, shall feel it my duty to resist, the claim to prevent me, in spite of the Law, and by physical force alone, from complying with the Return and Mandate of my Constituents, whose lawful representative I am.

"In the name of the Law, Sir, and of my Constituents, I also most respectfully give notice that I shall, in the manner and at the time provided by the Standing Orders of the House, again present myself at the Table of the House to complete the fulfilment of the duty imposed on me by Law, and, in the course of the performance of which duty I have been most improperly and illegally interrupted and hindered.

"I, having obtained the leave of my Constituents to this effect, would have waited, and would still wait the reasonable pleasure of the House, as to any Legislation with reference to the manner of my taking my Seat; but, as the House does not express any opinion on this subject, and does not challenge in any way the lawfulness of my Return, it is due to my Constituents that I should insist on the performance of my duty in my unchallenged lawful right, and thus put an end to a state of things without precedent in the history of Parliament.

"I have the honour to be, Sir,

"Your most obedt. Servant,

"CH. BRADLAUGH.

"4 July, 1881."

I have deemed it to be my duty to communicate this letter to the House, because it contests the authority and the Order of the House itself. I may add also that I have given special directions to the Serjeant-at-Arms to enforce the Order of the House of the 10th May.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: In view, Sir, of the last observations that fell from you, that the letter contests the authority of the House, and that you have deemed it your duty to take extra precautions, in consequence of that letter, to see that the authority of the House is not disregarded, I presume I shall be in Order in treating the communication which you have just read as a matter affecting the Privileges of the House, in the same way as the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) proposed to treat the former letter of Mr. Bradlaugh. Sir, I beg to move——

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the noble Lord, who wishes to know whether he can found his Motion upon a question of Privilege upon the precedent of the former letter of Mr. Bradlaugh, that the case upon which the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) made the Motion and the present case are not at all analogous. On the occasion of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle making his Motion the matter was one of urgency; but on this occasion the noble Lord is unable to plead urgency.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Does this not affect the Privileges of the House in any way? The letter of Mr. Bradlaugh does not—"Order!"—I would say that my sole object is to prevent the letter being printed in the Votes; and that, I think, is a distinctly intelligible object. But I beg to give Notice that I shall take the earliest opportunity of moving that this letter be not inserted in the Journals of the House, that it be not considered by the House, and that you, Sir, be requested to make no reply to it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I should like to ask, as a point of Order, whether the Motion of the noble Lord will come on as a matter of Privilege, or whether it will have to go through the ordinary process of the ballot?

MR. SPEAKER: A Motion of this kind could not come on as a matter of Privilege; and I may add that, if the noble Lord proposes to take that course, it will be entirely without precedent. I apprehend that any communication which the Speaker makes to the House must, as a matter of course, be printed in the Votes.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I did not give the Notice, Mr. Speaker, in any sense as antagonistic to the communication you have made to the House, and I did not know that what I proposed to do would have that effect. What I want to do is to prevent, if possible, a letter of that kind—a letter which is of such a very peculiar character—being printed in the Journals of the House. Of course, after what has fallen from you, I shall not proceed with the Motion of which I have given Notice.

MR. SPEAKER: I apprehend that if the noble Lord wishes to take the action that he indicates, the best course for him or any other hon. Member sharing his views to adopt will be to move, subsequently, that the letter be expunged from the Journals of the House.

MR. GORST: Should I be in Order, Sir, if I were now to move that the Order of the House of the 10th May be read by the Clerk at the Table? Sir, you have stated that you have given instructions that that Order of the House shall be executed by the proper officers of the House, and I therefore desire that it should be read at the Table, so that the House may see whether the terms of that Order are such as to give the House the strongest protection against violence or a violent interruption of its proceedings. I will move that the Order of the House of the 10th May be read by the Clerk at the Table.

Mr. Speaker

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Surely, Sir, the House would best consult its own dignity and the dignity of the Chair by leaving this in your hands. The action of the House was quite clear some time ago. You have entirely given expression to the feeling of the House, and the House may safely trust this matter in the hands of its Chair.

MR. GLADSTONE: I entirely concur with what has just fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon. It would, in my view, be imprudent on the part of the House to interfere with its own Executive, so to speak, in the discharge of the duties which appertain merely to that Executive. It is the business of the Executive to look after the fulfilment of the Orders of the House; and, if that were not so, there would be no use in having an Executive. When the Executive finds it necessary to do so, no doubt it will come forward and appeal to the House for the purpose of having effect given to its action.

MR. SPEAKER: It may be convenient to the House that I should read the Order of the 10th May. It is—

“That the Serjeant-at-Arms do remove Mr. Bradlaugh from this House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House.”

MR. DILLWYN: There is one point which I wish to see cleared up before this matter is allowed to drop. It is said that the Motion is absolutely made, and that the letter of Mr. Bradlaugh will be printed, and that the proper course for the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock to take would be to move that it be expunged from the Votes. I should like to ask whether, if the noble Lord moves to expunge it, that Motion will be one of Privilege or not? Can it be sprung upon us without due Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: It could not.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I beg to give Notice that I will make the Motion at the earliest possible moment.

AUSTRO-SERVIAN COMMERCIAL TREATY.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked, When the text of the Austrian and Servian Treaty would be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that he had given orders yesterday that it should be pressed forward with all despatch, and he hoped it would be ready that week.

THE TREATY OF COMMERCE WITH FRANCE.

MR. BOURKE said, he wished to ask a Question arising out of an answer given by the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs to the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk). He wished to know, Whether the French Treaty was to be extended for three months after the 8th of November?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, the French Treaty Tariffs would come to an end on the 8th of November, and there was a Bill now before the French Chambers to enable the Government to prolong them for a further period of three months in the event of negotiations for the conclusion of a new Tariff being still pending. The French Government had made proposals to several other Powers to enter into negotiations, and if the negotiations were still proceeding on the 8th of November, the French Government would propose the prolongation of the Tariffs for three months.

PARLIAMENT—ORDER—THREATENING A MEMBER.

MR. MAC IVER, rising to a point of Order, said, he wished to ask Mr. Speaker, whether the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) was entitled to threaten him in the Lobby of the House?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is appealing to me on a point of Order with reference to a matter which has occurred in the Lobby. I am bound to say I must decline to give an opinion upon occurrences in the Lobby.

MR. MAC IVER: The hon. Member for Oldham stated that you, Sir, had made a communication to him in reference to a Petition which I presented. I am bound to ask you, whether you did make such a communication to the hon. Member? [“Order!” and “Chair!”]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member, in speaking to a point of Order, has asked me whether I made a communication to the hon. Member for Oldham. I am not aware of that communication; but I must tell him that he should not appeal to the Chair on a point of Order of that kind.

MR. MAC IVER (who rose amid cries of "Order!") said, that he was sorry for the interruption, but to put himself in Order he would conclude with a Motion. The facts were these. The hon. Member for Oldham had, in the Lobby, accused him of having gone much beyond the terms of the Petition which he had presented, and said he had been consulting Mr. Speaker on the subject, and was advised to bring his (Mr. Mac Iver's) conduct before the House. He (Mr. Mac Iver), having a perfectly good defence, wished the hon. Member to do so—if it was true that he had been so advised; but on saying this to the hon. Member, that Gentleman declined to proceed. He was aware that he did use language which was out of Order; but he stated nothing whatever beyond what the Petitioners wished him to say, and he left much unsaid that they desired him to say. He simply wished now to ask Mr. Speaker whether the hon. Member for Oldham had had any conversation with him on the subject; whether he had told the hon. Member that the matter was one which he ought, if he felt aggrieved, to bring before the House publicly? The hon. Member had not done that, but threatened him with a communication from Mr. Speaker, the existence of which he (Mr. Mac Iver) had ventured to doubt, and had, in one of the Lobbies, charged him, in the first place, with having gone beyond the Prayer of the Petition, and, in the second, with obstructing the Business of the House. That was a charge which could not be reasonably brought against him.

MR. SPEAKER: I must put it to the hon. Member that he is now abusing the Privileges of the Motion for the Adjournment of the House. If he moves the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of asking me whether the hon. Member for Oldham had a certain conversation with me, he is committing a gross abuse of Privilege.

MR. MAC IVER, rising amid cries of "Name him!" said, he had not the slightest wish to trespass further upon the House. He had only mentioned the matter, because he thought the conduct of the hon. Member for Oldham most improper and unbecoming.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed to make a personal explanation. The House is probably aware that the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), in presenting a Petition, was somewhat discursive in his remarks. Several hon. Members on this side of the House rose to Order; but, on receiving an assurance from the hon. Member that he was only repeating the Prayer of the Petition, he was allowed to proceed. I, afterwards, ascertaining that the hon. Member had travelled beyond the Prayer of the Petition, consulted the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who is one of the most experienced Members of the House after yourself, Sir, whether the matter was one to which the attention of the House should be drawn. On the whole, we have come to the conclusion that we had better not waste the time of the House when there was so much more important Business before it; but, having consulted with the hon. Member for Swansea in this matter, and meeting the hon. Member for Birkenhead in the Lobby, I thought it more candid to tell him what I had done. I told him, that though I would not waste the time of the House by drawing attention to an assurance which enabled him to be out of Order, and thereby take advantage of the House, that if such a thing occurred again I should call the attention of the House to it. That is the substance of what passed.

MR. MAC IVER: One word. The hon. Member spoke of a communication from you, Sir, and said he wanted to—"Order, order!"

MR. SPEAKER: The Clerk will now proceed to read the Orders of the Day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 135.]
Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. (Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [TWENTIETH NIGHT.]

[Progress 4th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART II.

INTERVENTION OF COURT.

Clause 7 (Determination by Court of rent of present tenancies).

MR. CHAPLIN having placed upon the Paper the following Amendment:—

In page 8, at end, add the following sub-sections:—

“(12) If the judicial rent of any holding is less than the rent payable by the tenant at the date when the application was made, the landlord, on shewing to the Land Commission that the reduced rent that will probably be actually received from the estate will not be sufficient to pay taxes, rates, cesses, interest, and instalments on public loans, and other charges of a public nature, on the estate, and to keep down the interest or yearly charge for incumbrances thereon, and to leave for the landlord a reasonable surplus, may require the Land Commission to purchase, and the Land Commission shall purchase the estate, under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts incorporated with this Act;

“(13) The purchase money shall be applied and distributed by the Land Commission, first, in discharge of incumbrances, as far as the purchase money extends, and then according to the rights of the landlord and others interested in the estate; and for that purpose any trustees may be appointed by or with the approval of the Land Commission;

“(14) The application and distribution aforesaid shall be valid and binding to all intents, and, in case of a deficiency, any proportion or part of the purchase money allocated by the Land Commission, and paid in respect of any incumbrance, shall be deemed to be paid and received in full discharge of that incumbrance, as far as the estate was a security for the same;

“(15) For the purposes of this section, incumbrance includes mortgage in fee or for a less estate, trust for securing money, registered judgment, decree, or order, legacy, portion, lien, or capital or other sum charged in any manner on an estate.”

THE CHAIRMAN: It may save discussions upon Order if I state, before asking the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) to propose his Amendment, that I have carefully compared it with the Money Resolution of the 30th May, and that I consider it is within the wide terms of that Resolution. By it the Committee can consider proposals for “advancing or purchasing of estates,” no limiting words being attached to such purchases except provisions which may ultimately be enacted in the Bill before us.

MR. GLADSTONE: On a point of Order, Sir, perhaps you will be kind enough to explain to us the difference between a Committee of this character and a Committee of Supply, in which the power of making proposals for taking money, through the authority granted to it by the House, is entirely limited to Ministers of the Crown? I understand you, Sir, to say that it is open to any hon.

Member to propose an outlay of public money in a Committee on a Bill, provided only that the terms of the Resolution of the 30th May do not exclude the purpose for which the money is proposed to be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN: The difference is that in Supply the sums are fixed and may be reduced, but cannot be increased, either as a Vote or a tax, by a private Member. Any increase of a Vote or a tax can only be moved by a responsible Minister of the Crown; but, in a Committee on a Bill, the Ministers of the Crown have no privileges as to Money Clauses beyond private Members, after the House has come to a Resolution regulating the monies to be voted by Parliament for the purposes of the Act. Both are governed by the Money Resolution of the House, and any proposals made within the terms of this Resolution may be considered, whether they are made by private or official Members of the House.

MR. CHAPLIN said, the object of the Amendment which had been referred to was to provide for those cases which it appeared to him might possibly arise under the Bill in consequence of a reduction of rent by the Court. He was quite aware it was a somewhat startling proposal to make that landlords or any other classes of the community should be relieved of debts which they had legally incurred, and he quite admitted it was a choice of evils. It was a painful dilemma in which to be placed; but the fault was not his. The fault lay with the Government who introduced this legislation, and it seemed to him that it would be even worse that any class of the community should suddenly be reduced to beggary and ruin through no fault of their own, but owing to the action of the Government who introduced legislation of this kind. It appeared to him that this was another illustration of the difficulty which Parliament must necessarily encounter the moment it departed from sound principles of legislation, and from that strict regard for the rights of property which had hitherto been recognized by the Administration of every country in the world with the exception of Her Majesty's Government. No doubt, it would be a very considerable shock to those persons and those classes in this country who had invested their money in securities of this nature to find that it was imperilled by this legislation, or by Amendments moved in consequence of it, and no one regretted more than he did the necessity of moving an Amendment of this nature. But he confessed that he would regard it, to a certain extent, as a mitigating feature of that necessity if it brought home to the general public some sense of the dangers which were incurred at the present time by property of all classes and descriptions through the legislation introduced by the present Government, and the dangers they must necessarily encounter the moment Government or Parliament began to tamper with the rights of property, and devise legislation which he looked upon as nothing less than confiscation. The effect of the Amendment would be this—if the judicial rent was lessened by the Court to such an extent that it was not sufficient to meet, in the first place, either the taxes or the encumbrances of the estate, and, in the second place, to leave some reasonable surplus for the landlord, then the landlord might require the Land Commission to purchase the whole estate under certain terms. The 2nd section provided that the estate, having been purchased in this way, the purchase money should be applied and distributed, in the first place, to the discharge of all the encumbrances on the estate, and, if there were any surplus, it should be applied to the rights of the landlord, or the rights of any others who might possess an interest in the estate. The 3rd section provided for the case where there was a deficiency of funds after the estate had been purchased to meet all the charges and encumbrances on the estate. In that case it enacted that the purchase money having been allocated by the Land Commission, if there was not sufficient to pay the whole, it should be treated as a discharge of the debt in full—that was, so far as it related to the State giving security. Before he moved the Amendment, however, he wished, on a point of Order, to ask the Chairman's opinion, because he had observed there was another Amendment, somewhat of the same nature, on Clause 20, page 13, line 23, standing in the name of the hon. Member for the Eastern Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire (Sir John Ramsden). He wished to know, by the Chairman's ruling from the Chair, whether, in the event of his moving this Amendment, and it being negatived, it would prevent the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Eastern Division of the West Riding of Yorkshire from coming on? If his (Mr. Chaplin's) Amendment were moved and negatived, and the position of the hon. Member's Amendment was not thereby interfered with, he should be glad to go on with his proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment referred to by the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin) is much further on, and I do not like to give a definite opinion so far in advance of the Business of the Committee. There is a difference between the two Amendments. In the Amendment the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire proposes to move, I apprehend he suggests that if the judicial rent is lower than that which existed before, that the whole estate should be purchased; but in the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for the Eastern Division of the West Riding, it is suggested that if the holding has a judicial rent fixed lower than formerly, that that holding should be purchased. But I am not prepared to say whether they are substantially the same, until I have given further consideration to the subject.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that as he understood if he pressed his Amendment it was possible that the subsequent Amendment to which he had referred would be placed out of Court, he would refrain from bringing forward his proposal.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. GLADSTONE: The reason that I rise now is that I desire to state to the Committee what is the view of Her Majesty's Government as to the principles contained in the clause; and that I shall do in the briefest manner, as the discussion has already ranged over a very wide field. It has been observed that there is more than one point involved in the present clause. There are, however, only two to which I will refer, and the first of them is that which relates to judicial rents, whilst the second is that which concerns the renewal of the statutory term. Those are the two main principles of the clause, and, undoubtedly, those two principles might have been separated and put into two different clauses. This case might have arisen. Some hon. Gentlemen, or important numbers of hon. Gentlemen, might have been adverse to, and others in favour of, the proposition; but it would have been perfectly competent for hon. Gentlemen, if they had thought fit, to endeavour to remove themselves from this difficulty, to move to omit from the clause so much of it as to have enabled the portion struck out to be renewed in the statutory term later on. In that way it would have been open for us to bring up that matter on a separate clause. No such difference, however, so far as I am able to ascertain, exists in the views of the Committee as to this clause. The right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote), when he was dealing with the question of judicial rents, stated that he intended—I presume that he intended on behalf of his Party—to record his objection to the judicial rent when the question was put for the adoption or rejection of the clause. Since that, general objection has been taken to the renewable statutory term, so that I conceive that there is no practical difficulty under which we lie in having these two questions in the same clause. As to the judicial rent, I shall hardly say a word, because I am under the impression that a very great majority of this Committee—a greater majority probably than voted for the second reading of the Bill—are friendly to the adoption of a judicial rent. And, then, again, this judicial rent was recommended by two Commissions, one of which embraced and included many Members of this Committee, amongst them being the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) and the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin). [Mr. CHAPLIN: No.] The hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire says “No.” The Report of Her Majesty’s Commissioners for inquiring into Agricultural Distress was undoubtedly signed by the hon. Member, and it contains a paragraph which appears to me to be a recommendation, and if it is not a recommendation it would be well that the matter should be explained. It contains this statement, that I understand to be a recommendation—“Considering that improvements are generally the work of the tenant.” I will not quote the whole of the words; but a general proposition which goes far beyond that principle is embodied in the Report, and the proposition is this—

“The desire for legislative interference to protect the tenant from an arbitrary increase of rent, does not seem unnatural; and we are inclined to think that by the majority of landlords legislation properly framed to accomplish this end would not be objected to.”

So far as I am able to understand the English language, this appears to me to be a recommendation of judicial rents. It does not say that it is a judicial rent in cases affecting the tenant’s improvements, but it speaks of rent at large, and states that legislation, properly framed for checking increase of rent without distinction between rent on improvements and any other rent, should not be objected to. It may be said that this legislation is not properly framed; but that answer can hardly be made, because the framing of the legislation has not been objected to. No other form of legislation of this kind for checking increase of rent has been proposed against it. It has been accepted as, perhaps, on the whole, not perfect legislation, but as being as free from objection as any that we can devise. But that is not the main question as to what is to be said on judicial rent, and on this point I do not propose to detain the Committee. What I wish to say is that there has been language used in this House which, in my opinion, is altogether loose and inaccurate, to the effect that this is a clause for giving perpetuity of tenure. In my opinion, and not in my opinion only, but as a matter of fact, I think it can be shown to be no such thing. I am not saying this in the interest of any particular Party, or to acquire the favour of any particular section of the Committee. There are those who would wish that this clause did confer perpetuity of tenure, and there are those who entirely object to perpetuity of tenure. It appears to me to be absolutely undeniable that this clause does not confer perpetuity of tenure, and that the use of the phrase “perpetuity of tenure” in connection with it is an abuse of language. It is altogether a misapprehension. Now, this is my proposition—is this, or is it not, perpetuity of tenure? What is perpetuity of tenure? I should say that it was a tenure which was incapable of forfeit even by a breach of covenant; but, whether that is so or not, it is undoubtedly a tenure which is absolutely incapable of being interfered with by the expression of a man’s will to take the tenancy in his possession, or when he transfers it to another person. If I do not call this clause perpetuity of tenure, I call it durability of tenure, reasonable security of tenure—security such as is intended to obviate apprehensions, reasonable security such as is intended to give confidence, and such as is intended to set free both the mind and the arm of the tenant for the improvement of his holding, and to give confidence that the whole of the fruits of his labour will be secured for his own use and enjoyment. That is the extent of what we give; and for this purpose, in our judgment, it is absolutely necessary that a durable tenure should be given to the tenant. That perpetual tenure should be given to a tenant is a totally different matter. There are many who urge that perpetual tenure ought to be given to the tenant. With very slight exception, indeed, I think it might be said that the Commission of Lord Bessborough recommended perpetuity of tenure. Even that is not altogether true; but it is not very far from true. But, with respect to this clause, it is, in my opinion, whether as a matter of praise, or as a matter of blame, inaccurate to speak of it as giving perpetuity of tenure to the people of Ireland generally. As regards the people of Ireland generally, many of them may not go to the Court at all. I do not believe there is anyone in this House competent at this moment to form a trustworthy judgment as to what proportion of the tenantry of Ireland will go to the Court. There are some of the conditions under which the Court will operate which will make them very desirous to go before it, and there are other conditions that will make them, in my opinion, very unwilling in some cases to go before it. But, however that may be, many of them may not ask to go to the Court. Many may be absolutely repelled from going, because there are particular cases—such, for instance, as the limited enactment as to estates conducted on what is called the English custom, and this matter as to judicial leases—that may be the means of excluding the action of the Court altogether so far as statutory terms are concerned, and so far as anything except the terminable interest is concerned. Well, that disposes of some people in Ireland. Is perpetuity given to those who go into the Court, whose application is accepted and approved by the Court, and who receive from the Court a judicial rent and a statutory term? And now, what I state appears to me to be so plain that I cannot conceive how it can be contested. I can conceive anyone saying, "this is a tenure of durability which you have no right to give," and I can conceive all sorts of objections on the merits of it; but let the objection be raised on the merits, and do not let it be described as "perpetual tenure." It is not a perpetual tenure for various reasons; because, for instance, of the distinction between present tenancies and future tenancies, and because of the modes provided by the Bill, by which what has been a present tenancy becomes a future tenancy. In the first place, there is the mode of forfeiture of a present tenancy, and the replacement of it by a future tenancy, in consequence of a breach of conditions by the tenant. A present tenancy may cease on any and every [of the occasions when a tenant right is transferred. When the landlord exercises his right of pre-emption the future tenancy is entered upon, which does not reserve to the tenant the right to apply to the Court, though it does reserve to the tenant his interest in his holding, and places certain restrictions on his rent. When a tenancy is transferred, there is a power in the hands of the landlord of converting, if he thinks fit, a present tenancy into a future tenancy. But this is not all. It would be no perpetuity of tenure if a man were not free to hand it over to someone else. A tenant is subject to the provision I have mentioned, and he is subject to the choice or the veto of the landlord over the vendee. The landlord can, on any reasonable cause—and the interpretation of a reasonable cause is a thing traditional in Ireland—the landlord can oppose and object to the transfer. This shows, again, that you will be misusing language to call this a perpetuity of tenure. But even this is not all; because whilst a tenancy continues in the hands of the existing tenant, it is liable to resumption by the landlord upon reasonable and sufficient cause. I admit that for 15 years, which is the first statutory period, it is not liable to resumption. The exception which we have made with regard to labourers' cottages is, I am afraid, one of a narrow scope; but whatever it is, it is only for this particular purpose, and can hardly be considered as greatly affecting the measure before us. For 15 years there will be, practically, fixity of tenure; and the fact remains, that after every statutory term, where the landlord can show sufficient cause, the tenant can be displaced with compensation, and the holding may be resumed by the landlord. Therefore, when the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, or any other hon. Member, thinks it worth while to refer to speeches made by me against perpetuity of tenure, my answer is a simple one. I can reply simply, that I adhere to the statements contained in those speeches. I do not think perpetuity of tenure desirable. What is desirable, what is necessary, what is absolutely vital to this Bill, and what in this Bill cannot be departed from by its framers, is that we should give the tenantry of Ireland a durable interest sufficient to become the basis of a real practical security. Unless we were prepared to do that, we had better not have drafted the Bill at all. Without a provision of this kind the Bill would be a departure from our duty. It would be a mockery, and would satisfy neither the Committee nor the Irish nation—it certainly would not give peace to that still unhappily disturbed country. We have got to attain this end without granting perpetuity of tenure. Why do we not grant perpetuity of tenure? Because we cannot reconcile perpetuity of tenure with the maintenance, or, still more, the duties of the landlords. I grant you that it was this very difficulty that we endeavoured to deal with; but we made an endeavour to obtain security to the Irish tenant, not only security for compensation when removed from his holding, but something more than that—namely, an assurance that he would not be removed from his holding except for grave and sufficient reasons. We have endeavoured to secure this in a manner compatible with retaining the position, the privileges, and the duties of the landlords. It is difficult, perhaps, to bring these things together; but, Sir, we have made the attempt, and we have endeavoured to adhere to the basis on which the attempt is founded. If, in the future, other attempts are made which are to become the law of that country, they will be attempts which will be likely to be in the direction of greater fixity of tenure. This is an important opportunity; this division is an important division, because the maintenance of the clause, which, as I have said, seems to us to be absolutely essential and vital to the Bill, is in the balance; it is a question of the standing or the falling of the labours of the year—the work of the Parliament during the year—and not only that, but upon this rests our hopes for the tranquillity and good order of Ireland. But I have said that I have no title to restrain the liberty of objection to and impeachment of this clause, and I only wish to express the hope that in all justice we may not be credited with praise that we do not deserve nor be charged with imputations that do not attach to the course which we have taken. I know that what I have said—almost every word of what I have said—will be characterized by hon. Members as depreciatory of the Bill. I am not here to conceal the character of the Bill; I am here, on the contrary, to make its true character appreciated and understood. Take it for what it is worth. It aims to give the tenant a durable interest; it does not aim to give him perpetuity of tenure. Let us discuss this clause and the Bill on the ground that they are for the purpose of giving a durable interest to the Irish tenant without dispossessing the landlord of his social position and the responsibilities that belong to it. We do not seek to dislocate society, and we have never had that object in view; but we cannot offer less to the Irish tenant than is here offered to him, that is, the pledge involved in this Bill—a pledge which is the more consolidated, and, if I may say so, consecrated by the reception which this measure has had from the masses of the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, that, as he had a Motion on the Paper for rejecting the clause, he might, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words with regard to it. He imagined that the Prime Minister had an object in view in taking the unusual course of commencing a debate on the Motion for rejecting the clause; but with that object he (Mr. Balfour) had nothing whatever to do. It was, no doubt, to warn his followers that he regarded the fate of the Government as depending upon the clause itself. That was a matter of the internal policy of the Liberal Party with which he (Mr. Balfour) was in no way concerned. But the first part of the Prime Minister's speech was intended, no doubt, to restrict the area of the discussion on the clause, and with that object the Committee would sympathize. He (Mr. Balfour) should not like to extend the discussion; but the Prime Minister had tried unduly to restrict the discussion, and to put it into limits which, he thought, they on that side of the House would find themselves impossible to keep within. The right hon. Gentleman had said that there were two principles contained in the clause—namely, judicial rent and fixity of tenure. With regard to the second question, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the Reports of two Royal Commissions, which, he said, supported the view of the Government. Well, as to the Bessborough Commission, he (Mr. Balfour) should have thought, after the recent debate which had occurred in "another place," it would have been well to have made no further allusion to it. He should have thought that no Government would have been rash enough to have urged the authority of that Commission in any way. But with regard to the other Commission the right hon. Gentleman claimed that it had pronounced in favour of valued rents; and when the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) dissented from that proposition, the Prime Minister proceeded to read out from the Report words which he regarded as conclusive on the point. He would point out to the Prime Minister that if the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire showed half the ingenuity in explanation that he did not report in favour of valued rents that the Prime Minister had shown in demonstrating that the Bill did not give fixity of tenure, he would find it a very easy task to escape from the strictures of the right hon. Gentleman. What did the Report say? It stated that there was a very general feeling throughout Ireland that valued rents would be desirable, and that many landlords would not object to a measure framed on those principles. He did not think that that bound the Commissioners in any way. He must confess that he (Mr. Balfour) himself should not have signed those words, because they were really a misinterpretation;

but, at the same time, he was sure that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire, when he came to speak on this question, would find no difficulty in escaping from the net which the Prime Minister had attempted to throw round him. Now, with regard to the question which the Prime Minister had raised as to fixity of tenure, the right hon. Gentleman argued elaborately to show that this measure did not give perpetuity of tenure. He (Mr. Balfour) did not wish to waste the time of the Committee over what was, after all, a mere verbal excuse. The Prime Minister said the Bill gave durability of tenure; but it seemed to him that durability of tenure, which lasted, practically, for ever, was undistinguishable from perpetuity of tenure. The right hon. Gentleman's contention was that to call it perpetuity of tenure was nothing more nor less than abuse of the English language. Those were the two questions which the Prime Minister said were raised by this clause; but there was another question which, though it was intimately connected with them, might be distinguished from them, and, in his opinion, it was by far the most important. That was the handing over to the Court, with no directions whatever, the regulation of a gigantic industry like agriculture. Yet that was what the Government did in this clause. Was the Court to deal with a country of 5,000,000 of people who practically supported themselves by but this one industry? A little section of the people of Ireland showed a sense of discontent, and the Government came down to this House and actually proposed, as a remedy, that all the most delicate and important interests of that great industry, by which a whole people were supported, should be handed over, without any regulations, to a Court not yet named. It was against this proposal that he should protest, more especially when he voted, as he shortly should vote, against including this clause in the Bill. In deciding this question of rents they could not possibly act without determining also the question of the interest in the capital and the question of wages; because, whatever might be the elements that the Court would take into account in deciding fair rents, there could be no doubt that the Court would have to also take into consideration the fair value of the labour, and the fair value of the capital, of the landlord. He admitted that, so far as the Bill went, they were at present only determining the wages of the farmer; but did they think they would be able to stop there? There had already been brought to bear upon the Government a great deal of pressure to induce them to deal with the question of the agricultural labourers. They had dealt with the farmers; would they be able to resist the appeal of 500,000 agricultural labourers when they came and asked them to determine—as they had already determined what was a fair day's rent—what was a fair day's wages? The action of hon. Members who came from Ireland showed that they did not mean to let the question rest, and they would be weakening their hands when asked to deal with it if they assented to the principle of the clause now presented for their acceptance. This was a subject on which he confessed he felt very strongly; and if there was any one consideration which would make him take a more serious view of it than another it was that the Government and hon. Members opposite appeared to think that in establishing this omnipotent Court they were doing the most ordinary legislative act in the world. No doubt, the Prime Minister had made some statements showing that he fully considered that the position was one not without gravity; but he (Mr. Balfour) had not heard that sentiment echoed from the Benches behind the right hon. Gentleman. Nor did he think there was in the Party opposite, nor in the country at large, a just apprehension on this matter. This was an experiment that had never before been made in any civilized country. [An hon. MEMBER: In India.] He was talking of Western Europe and the civilized world. No country had ever ventured on an experiment analogous to this; and not only was the experiment destined to failure, but it was one that would have serious consequences in the interests of legislation generally. Hitherto they in England had prided themselves on their principles of free contract between man and man, and they had regarded those principles as the highest mark of civilization; and there was a right hon. Gentleman sitting on the Front Bench opposite who, during the past 40 years, in season and out of season, had preached that doctrine, and who had gained and maintained his popularity by preaching it. He did not know what the right hon. Gentleman thought of it now. What did the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) think of the speeches he had delivered in years gone by on the Ten Hours' Bill, and other measures in which that great principle was involved? Had they any right to suppose that they might not in the future, and in the not very far distant future, see large classes coming to the Government and declaring—"You must step forward and protect us from free contracts?" That was what was said now in Germany. In this country they desired no interference with the operation of the laws of free contracts; and if such a movement ever spread to England, and if large numbers of the working classes of this country ever came, in the future, to the Government, and said—"Our lot is pressing hardly upon us; we are suffering extremely from the want of equality in the distribution of wealth, which is the result of your economic laws with which you can interfere, as you have shown in the case of Ireland that you are able to do"—he wished to know what reply could be given by the Government or their successors? The question was one on which he had already troubled the House at the time of the second reading; and it was one which, he thought, on account of its great importance, ought to be raised again on the third reading of the Bill. He should certainly divide the Committee on the question that this clause be omitted from the Bill.

MR. VILLIERS STUART: I am much surprised that the hon. Member opposite (Mr. A. J. Balfour) should have proposed the omission of this clause from the Bill; for, if there is one portion of it above all others justified, not only by the necessity and circumstances of the present crisis, but also by sound policy, it is this clause, which creates a tribunal securing fair rents to the tenant farmers of Ireland. It is the duty of every Government, it is the duty of every statesman who legislates for any country, to see that all obstacles are removed out of the way of the fullest development of national industries. That applies just as much where the national industry is agriculture as where it is manufacture or commerce.

The statesman would be neglecting his duty, therefore, if he allowed agricultural improvements to be obstructed by the imposition of a fine upon them. In the case of all sciences, the sole sanction for whose laws is experience, Adam Smith defines political economy to be the science which deals with the nature and causes of the wealth of nations. Stuart Mill defines it as the science which treats of the production and distribution of national wealth; that which promotes the production of national wealth and prosperity best accords with the principles of political economy. That which hinders it is most opposed to it. What can hinder it more than taxes on industry and enterprize? What can be more impolitic than to leave in private hands the power to tax a national industry by raising rent in proportion to improvement? Theoretically, it is open to the farmer to refuse increased rent; to accept his compensation and go; but, in practice, he has hitherto preferred to submit, though with a deep sense of wrong, because over and above the money value of his improvements was the attachment he felt for the farm, the improvement of which had, perhaps, been the great object and interest of his life. Is it politic to allow the state of the Land Laws to endure which leaves it open to owners to confiscate the capital and labour which tenants have invested in their farms, by clapping on additional rent for every additional improvement? Is not this to make improvement penal? Does this not account for the backward state of agriculture in Ireland? Can legislators, honestly attempting to remedy this evil, deserve the term impolitic? I know that the great majority of Irish landlords would scorn to take advantage of their tenants in this way; they are, in fact, much better than the laws. Most of them are sincerely anxious to deal justly with their tenants; but a very small percentage of grasping and unscrupulous men suffice to do the mischief. Nay, the very fact that the law renders it possible is enough to frighten the farmers and deter them from doing justice to their farms; and, if their present landlord is too just to take advantage of the law, what security have they that his successor will not do so, and thus fine them heavily for their own industry and enterprize? Such a state of law is enough to kill all enterprize

and all improvement. Is it politic to allow the law to remain unaltered? Is it not the duty of the State to remove out of the way all obstacles to the development of the resources of the country they govern, and I see no better means of remedying this serious evil than the establishment of land tribunals to insure fair play in the matter of rent. If it be objected to on the principle of political economy, I ask, has there been a divine revelation from heaven on the subject, that we can claim infallibility for the existing theories of political economists? Political economy is not an exact science like mathematics, the premisses and conclusions of which admit of no dispute, nor has any heaven-sent gospel on the subject come down to us; no, it is a science built up by experience, but the conclusions of human experience are continually subject to modification. New experience and new combinations in endless succession arise, requiring us to admit new exceptions to our rules, in the case of all sciences, the sole sanction for whose laws was experience. At all events, in the problem before us, necessity is the unanswerable argument. When the alternative lies between reform and revolt, we cannot afford to be too nice; when a conflagration is in progress, we must use the engine we have at hand, and not wait to consider whether we might not get a better one. Liability to rack rent causes smouldering discontent, which periodically passes from the chronic to the acute stage. A very acute stage prevails at present. When the passions are aroused, when men are dragged from their beds to be shot in the presence of their families, or murdered while attending a father's funeral, or have their houses blown up, all which incidents occurred last week, it is high time to strike at the root of causes which give excuse for such passions to blaze out. I say the excuse—God forbid that I should say the justification—of the crimes that have been committed, and that are now daily being committed, must fill us with indignation and horror. The state of the law cannot justify them any more than it can justify the unholy work of sowing hatred between class and class of their fellow-countrymen, in which some of the popular leaders have been employed; but defects in the law furnish the excuse, and it is not politic to leave that excuse in existence. Of course, State interference in what have been regarded as matters of private contract do clash with the notions which have hitherto prevailed. But I am one of many landlords in Ireland who have been compelled to come to the conclusion that such interference is necessary, and that it would have been well for us if it had taken place long ago. I have no hesitation in saying that it is for the interest not only of the tenant, but also of the landlord, that this interference should take place. I believe the Reports of the two Commissions prove that the great majority of the Irish landlords would shrink from exacting an exorbitant rent; but, unhappily, there are a small minority of landlords who are not guided by the just and humane principle of "Live and let live," who regard their tenants as mere rent-paying animals from whom to wring the last farthing that can be extracted. The mischief which even a small number of such men can cause is immeasurable. Men of the class I refer to have no scruple in turning their own improvements against their tenants, and in pushing up the rent in proportion to the amount of improvement that has been effected upon the farm. There is nothing which the Irish farmer dreads so much as having his improvements turned against himself in this way. Any one single case of this kind will frighten all the farmers in an entire district; and it is impossible to over-estimate the mischievous consequences to the development of Irish agriculture which have followed from this cause. The State is undoubtedly justified in interfering in the matter of rent—for what might happen if they were absolutely precluded from doing so? It was the State that originally conferred their land upon the landlords; but there must always have been this condition reserved—that they should not use the powers conferred to the detriment of the State. The landlord who tried to carry out to its extreme logical conclusion the theory that he had a right to do what he liked with his own would soon find out that there were limits to that right as regards the public. It would be intolerable, for instance, if he were to proceed to convert a populous manufacturing district into a grouse moor by evicting the entire population, and levelling every town and village upon it; but he might do this if the State had no power to interfere in the matter of rent, for he might demand impossible rents. In this last resort, therefore, the State is justified in interfering in the matters of rent; and it is for the Government of any country to determine when such a crisis has arisen as renders it expedient to interfere; this right to interfere is not limited to land, it was at one time deemed expedient to interfere with the interest to be charged for money, as was done in the case of the usury laws, when it was declared unlawful to exact a higher rent or rate of interest than 5 per cent. A still more arbitrary exercise of the right to interfere with the interest to be charged for the use of that which is a man's own property in a sense more absolute than can be predicated of land is the case of the London cab-drivers. Their cabs, their horses, and their time is their own. Yet they are precluded from charging what they please for the use of them. And a fair rent has been fixed for them in a very arbitrary fashion, and the plea in this case was not necessity but convenience. There is, therefore, plenty of precedent for interference by the State in the case of land rents. Of course, it is open to dispute whether the necessity for such interference has arisen. But the most impressive argument in favour of the necessity is the united testimony of two special Commissions, one of them appointed by a Conservative Administration, the other by a Liberal one. I joined an association last Autumn called the Land Tenure Reform Committee, of which such landlords as Lords Monck, Monteagle, and Emly, and Judge Longfield were members; they were all unanimously of opinion that a Land Court, as a security against rack-rent, was necessary; and a number of the most enlightened landowners in Ireland have come to see the danger of their own order, which is threatened, if some security against the unlimited exactions for rent is not devised. Nor have I seen any other effective measure for this purpose suggested, except tribunals empowered to control and regulate the relation between landlord and tenant, and insure to the people the use of the land at a fair rent. Speaking as a landlord myself, I would say that it is vitally necessary for the landlord as for the tenant that this interference should now take place. Had such control been established long ago, we should not be involved in the dangerous crisis which now prevails.

MR. CHAPLIN said, his first objection to the clause was that it was wholly unpractical and unworkable. That would become more apparent when they considered, on the ground of time alone, the work the Court would have to do. The first and most elementary duty of the Court would be, after hearing the parties and considering all the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, to fix a judicial rent for all the parties who might apply to it. He was informed by the highest authority that, at a moderate estimate, it would take two hours to hear each case; and he understood there were about 600,000 tenants in Ireland. There were three classes of tenants in Ireland—the highly-rented, the lowly-rented, and the moderately-rented. The highly-rented tenants would all, of course, go into the Court at once; while the Government had now empowered the landlord also to go into Court; and it would be unfair to suppose that if the landlord were taken into Court by the highly-rented tenant, the landlord would not be likely to take the low-rented tenant into Court. But they were told by the Prime Minister that rent was not the only thing which would induce the tenant to apply to the Court; that he would go into Court to obtain stability also. What would be the consequence? The whole case of the Government was that this stability of security which the Bill insured to the tenant was the one thing which the tenants in Ireland wanted, and that it was the absence of that which the tenants complained of. That was the essential grievance which they said they were about to remove; and the consequence would be that unless the Bill had been introduced on grounds totally false, the great majority of the tenants in Ireland would go into Court at once, not on account of rent only, but in order to get the stability which the Government said was essential for them, and which they also said was one of the main causes for the introduction of the measure. If that were so, he entreated the Committee to consider for one moment, before the clause was finally accepted, what was the gigantic, the impossible task they were about to impose on the Court. He might quote the words of the Prime Minister on the first introduction of the Land Bill, when he said—

“I have very great doubts indeed whether—if we were, by compulsory law, to refer the ultimate regulation of every bargain relating to land to a Judicial Commission sitting in Court—any judicial authority you could create would not break down under the weight so imposed upon it.”—[3 Hansard, cclx. 907.]

Well, it did not appear to him to matter much whether the action of the Court was to be compulsory or permissive, the result would be the same, that the great majority of tenants would go into Court. He would take the number applying to the Court at the moderate estimate of half of the entire number—namely, 300,000; and, on the supposition that each case would take an average of two hours to try, it would require 600,000 hours to decide all the cases, and, allowing that the Court sat six hours each day, something like 12 years would have passed before all the cases could be decided. Such was the position in which the Court would be placed, and after all the inducements they had held out to the Irish tenants, after the manner in which the Irish people had been excited, what, he asked, would be their feelings, when they found everything brought to a dead-lock, and the security offered to them a sham and a delusion, because, owing to the weight and bulk and clumsiness of the Bill, it was absolutely unworkable? But if the primary difficulties were got over, what were the particular difficulties that remained? He regretted to detain the Committee; but he would remind hon. Members that that was the last opportunity they would have of discussing the most novel, if not most revolutionary, proposal that had ever been submitted to the House of Commons. He asked the Committee to consider what were the principal difficulties in the way of arriving at a judicial rent by the machinery provided by the Bill; and here he must refer to some of the observations which fell from the Prime Minister upon this point, and in support of his (Mr. Chaplin's) contention, because he was aware of his inability to adduce any arguments so able and so unanswerable as those which had been used by the right hon. Gentleman himself. What did the right hon. Gentleman say 11 years ago as to the difficulties attending the valuation of rents in Ireland? He said—

"Now, look at its practical difficulty. We are to value these rents. What an army of public officers are you to send abroad to determine from year to year the conditions of the 600,000 holdings in Ireland, conditions which are settled with comparative ease when settled by private intercourse, but conditions the fixing of which beforehand by a public authority would be attended with tenfold difficulty."—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1846.]

"How are these rents to be valued? What is the test? The prices of produce? Of what produce? Of one kind of produce or of all kinds? Can any man fix by law any system upon which it will be possible to adjust rents by calculation founded upon prices of agricultural produce of all kinds. . . . It is impossible, in my opinion, to get the prices of produce so as to found the rent upon them by a public authority; and if you could get them it would be absolutely impossible to apply a standard according to the varying circumstances of each particular holding, and its capacity to produce this or that kind of produce. But what are we to say with regard to the quantity of produce? Supposing the quantity of produce is doubled, is the landlord to receive the same price for the increased quantity, or is he not? If he is to receive the same price for the increased quantity where is the tenant's inducement to increase the quantity? But if the quantity is to remain the same, by what authority do you cut off the whole of the landlord's interest in the prospective increase in the quantity of produce?"—[Ibid. 1847-8.]

And the right hon. Gentleman wound up by saying—

"If I state these things it is that I may provoke confutation. I disbelieve in the possibility."—[Ibid. 1848.]

He (Mr. Chaplin) disbelieved in it too, and he could not but say that he thought the Committee had been treated very unfairly throughout the discussion, because no Member of the Government had risen in his place to say in what respect the Prime Minister in those days was so completely deceived. But what was the objection of applying that principle of valued rents to Ireland? He must again trouble the Committee by quoting the right hon. Gentleman, who said—

"If I could conceive a plan more calculated than anything else, first of all, for throwing into confusion the whole economical arrangement of the country; secondly, for driving out of the field all solvent and honest men who might be bidders for farms, and might desire to carry on the honourable business of agriculture; thirdly, for carrying widespread demoralization throughout the whole mass of the Irish people, I must say, as at present advised—to confine myself to the present and until otherwise convinced—it is this plan, and this demand, that we should embody in our Bill, as a part of permanent legislation, a provision by which men shall be told that there shall be an authority always existing, ready to release them from the contracts they have deliberately entered into."—[Ibid. 1845.]

He regretted extremely that the right hon. Gentleman was not in his place; but he asked, was it conceivable, on any principle of morality or justice, and in the face of those declarations, that neither the right hon. Gentleman himself, nor any of his Colleagues, should not have had the manliness or courage to explain, maintain, or contradict them? But the right hon. Gentleman had said that he (Mr. Chaplin) was a party to that plan; that the Richmond Commission had recommended it, and that his name was affixed to the document which, as he had endeavoured to explain to the Committee, distinctly recommended the adoption of the plan by which rents in Ireland should be fixed by some judicial tribunal. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman thought nothing of the fact that he had repudiated all connection with such a plan or such a recommendation; and, further, he supposed it was nothing to him that that recommendation had also been repudiated by the President of the Richmond Commission in "another place." If the Committee would allow him to explain, he would, in a very few words, endeavour to show that the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. His (Mr. Chaplin's) contention had always been that the institution of a Court of public authority was not necessary to give the tenant legislative protection against the arbitrary raising of rents. There were a variety of ways in which that protection might be given. He would submit one to the Committee—he did not say it was the right, or the only one; but it would insure protection to the tenant, and was preferable to the clumsy machinery of that ingenious Bill, introduced for the purpose of puzzling tenants, and enriching all the lawyers in Ireland. What objection was there to this—when a tenant made improvements on a farm to give him power by statute, before the landlord was allowed to raise his rent, to call upon the landlord to buy up all the improvements? So in the case of tenant right. Where the tenant had been encouraged to give large prices for tenant right he had always said it was both repreh-

sible and undesirable to allow the landlord so to raise the rent as to eat up the tenant right. What was the objection in such cases to giving the tenant the same power to call upon his landlord, before the rent was raised, to purchase the tenant right? This he mentioned in order to show that there were other ways of carrying out the recommendation of the Richmond Commission besides the way proposed by the Bill. Again, the right hon. Gentleman had dwelt at some length upon the subject of perpetuity of tenure, and knowing, probably, that "conscience doth make cowards of us all," said "that he did not care what quotations the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire made from his speeches delivered in 1870." He was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman was not present, as he believed he was in a position to convince him by his own words that perpetuity of tenure was in the Bill. What did the right hon. Gentleman say as to perpetuity of tenure? He said—

"My proposition is that if you value the rents you may as well, for every available purpose, adopt perpetuity of tenure at once. It is perpetuity of tenure, only in a certain disguise. It is the first link in the chain; but it draws after it the last."—[3 Hansard, cxcix. 1846.]

Well, the right hon. Gentleman had argued at great length, in 1870, against perpetuity of tenure; and what was the description of the scheme against which his arguments were directed? He would give the right hon. Gentleman's description of it, and leave it to the Committee to say whether his speech delivered that day was consistent with that which he delivered 11 years ago. The right hon. Gentleman said—

"As I understand it, the scheme itself amounts to this—that each and every occupier, as long as he pays the rent that he is now paying, or else some rent to be fixed by a public tribunal charged with the duty of valuation, is to be secured, for himself and his heirs, in the occupation of the land that he holds, without limit of time."—[Ibid. 351.]

There was, at that moment, on the Treasury Bench the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. Had either of those right hon. Gentlemen the manliness, courage, or candour to get up and state to the Committee in what respect the scheme denounced by the Prime Minister differed from that which was now proposed; and why did the right hon. Gentleman object to perpetuity of tenure? He objected to it because of its effects—its malevolent effects, as they might be called. The words of the right hon. Gentleman were—

"As I understand it, the scheme itself amounts to this—that each and every occupier, as long as he pays the rent that he is now paying, or else some rent to be fixed by a public tribunal charged with the duty of valuation, is to be secured, for himself and his heirs, in the occupation of the lands that he holds, without limit of time. He will be subject only to this condition—somewhat in the nature of the Tithe Commutation Act—that with a variation in the value of produce the rent may vary; but it will be slightly, and at somewhat distant periods. The effect of that provision will be that the landlord will become a pensioner and rent-charger upon what is now his own estate. The Legislature has, no doubt, the perfect right to reduce him to that condition, giving him proper compensation for any loss he may sustain in money."—[Ibid.]

What distinction was there, he asked, between the two cases—that denounced in 1870, and that advocated in 1881 by the Prime Minister—which justified him in refusing compensation to the landlord to-day, seeing that he had said in 1870 that the landlord ought in justice to receive compensation? Under this Bill every tenant might apply to the Court to fix a judicial rent; when that was fixed, it became subject to a statutory term of 15 years, and the tenant might apply from time to time for the renewal of that statutory term; and the sole limitation upon it was that, by the 10th section of the 7th clause, no renewal could take place until the end of the first statutory term, and that the rent could not be altered at a less interval than 15 years. However much the Prime Minister might choose to play on the words, the real effect of the Bill was that it gave the tenant optional perpetuity of tenure—a perpetual lease with the option of a break at the end of 15 years, but with regard to which no option whatever was given to the landlord. If that were true—and he defied any hon. Member opposite to contradict his description—what were they to think of the speech delivered that day by the Prime Minister, and of the consistency of his Colleagues? He had never withheld or concealed his opinion of the Bill. He believed it to be a bad Bill, an unjust Bill, and a confiscatory Bill from beginning to end. But there was something worse which he had seen in the course of those discussions, and it was the levity with which expressions of opinion on the part of the Prime Minister of England, not on matters of fact or circumstance, but expressions of opinion on the great principles of morality and justice, were brushed aside by the transparent special pleading they had heard, and dismissed apparently without a thought or feeling of compunction, and in a manner which he could not but feel would be fatal to the public life of England, when the people of this country reflected on the character for consistency of their foremost public men.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed, that the charge just made by the hon. Member (Mr. Chaplin), that his right hon. Friend at the head of the Government was capable of treating that or any other important subject with levity, was one which would be regarded with surprise by all who heard it.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman did not wish to misrepresent him. He had made no charge against the Prime Minister of having treated this question with levity. What he said was that the right hon. Gentleman brushed aside, without, apparently, the smallest thought or feeling, all allusions to his statements in former years, with regard to which he (Mr. Chaplin) had charged him with inconsistency.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he distinctly heard the expression "levity of opinion of the Prime Minister." He was very much struck by it at the time.

MR. CHAPLIN: I said nothing of the kind. I alluded to the levity with which the right hon. Gentleman treated allusions to his past statements. I used the word "levity" deliberately, and I adhere to it now.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was quite content to accept the hon. Member's explanation, although he thought it would not carry conviction to the country. He was not, however, going to take up the time of the Committee on that subject. He would not say that the hon. Member would not have used the same words if his right hon. Friend had been present; but when he charged Members of the Government with want of courage and manliness in not answering his charges, he had to remind him that his right hon. Friend had over and over again done so. He was willing to leave the defence of his right hon. Friend to what he had said that day, and to what the House, the Committee, and the country would think of what his right hon. Friend had advanced. The hon. Gentleman had dwelt, as he had dwelt before, on the fact that his right hon. Friend had expected better results from the Bill of 1870 than it had produced; and he congratulated the hon. Member on the industry with which he had read the speeches of his right hon. Friend. But it was too late then to bring forward those speeches, as both on the second reading of the Bill and in Committee they had been repeatedly explained. They had now to consider a very important matter—namely, whether they would accept the clause; whether, in fact, they would accept the Bill, for without the clause the Bill would never have been brought in by the Government. He might, in passing, refer to the inconsistency of the hon. Gentleman in signing the Richmond Report. If the hon. Gentleman thought he had acted consistently, let him, by all means, remain of that opinion. He (Mr. Forster) would only refer him to the speech of the hon. Member who had given Notice of moving the rejection of the clause (Mr. A. J. Balfour), because it conveyed to the Committee that the impression of the hon. Member's inconsistency was not an unnatural one. But they had got more or less into a second reading debate. He did not complain of that, because that clause, the 7th, was the most important clause of the Bill. Its principles had been challenged on the second reading, and fully discussed. Nobody supposed on either side of the House that the Government would, as a matter of choice, have created a tribunal for the fixing of rent; but the majority of the House had recorded their belief that, in the present circumstances of Ireland, they must create such a tribunal. And he asked hon. Members opposite, if they were in power and administering the affairs of Ireland, would they leave matters as they now were? Almost every person who had studied the question felt that, in the present exceptional circumstances of Ireland, they were bound to have an outside tribunal to fix the amount of fair rents. Several hon. Members had tried to frighten the Committee by drawing fancy pictures of the view both landlords and tenants would take of the Court. But in a very short time after they had begun to have any experience of the working of the Act both landlords and tenants would get a pretty close idea of what the decision of the Court was likely to be in any particular event, and they would settle the rents for themselves, and so avoid the trouble and expense of going to the Court. He could assure the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire that if he would make inquiries in any part of Ireland, alike of landlords and tenants, he would find that no such feeling existed with regard to the Court as that with which he credited them. So far from that being the case, they looked forward to the establishment of the Court as their hope and resource, in order to enable them to get out of their present difficulties. If the hon. Member for Hertford were to be successful in getting the clause struck out of the Bill, it would be a matter of great disappointment, he might even say of dismay, to the receivers of rent, as much as to the payers of rent. He did not mean to say that the working of the Court would not be attended with inconveniences and difficulties; but he maintained that these would not be so great as the inconveniences and difficulties which they would remove. He doubted whether they could continue to use the power of the law in the landlord's interest, in order to compel the fulfilment of a contract, when they knew that the tenants had not been by any means as free to contract as they ought to be, and as free as tenants were in other countries. The hon. Member objected to the proposal of the Government on the ground that it would give perpetual tenure to the tenant. The Government did not so regard it; and he could not see how it could be so regarded by anyone in view of the fact that it gave to the landlord power to resume possession of his estate at the end of 15 years. They did not for a moment deny—indeed, it was their pride and boast—that though the Bill did not enact perpetual tenure, it would give great stability and security of tenure, and unless it did so the Bill would not be worth the paper on which it was drafted. He did not think that any measure short of that which the Government had introduced would, in the present strained state of relations between landlords and tenants in Ireland, have done any real good to either party. He could not complain that the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire had taken another opportunity of referring to the speeches of the Premier and explaining away his own Report. There were, however, no points in regard to the clause on which hon. Members had not had ample opportunity of forming, and probably had formed, an opinion; and he, therefore, hoped the Committee would go to a division without further delay.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: It may be perfectly true, Sir, as the right hon. Gentleman says, that there are no points which can very well be raised with regard to this Bill upon which hon. Members have not probably formed their opinions; but I will endeavour, in a few words, to show why I think, at the present moment, on the passing of the 7th clause, it is important that we should put on record the impression made upon us by the manner in which the clause has been handled since it went into Committee. It is not my intention to throw myself into the controversy which has been raised with regard to the consistency of the Prime Minister; but, at the same time, I would point out that I think it ought to be borne in mind, when references are made to the previous opinions of the Prime Minister, they are made in these circumstances. Ten or 11 years ago the right hon. Gentleman, after great care and study of the question, brought forward a scheme for dealing with the land system of Ireland. In so doing, he discussed at great length, and with very great ability, several leading and fundamental questions connected with the tenure of land. He laid down certain principles, and argued them out with great ability, thought, and clearness. We are now brought face to face with a measure, also introduced by him, in which we find a considerable number of the principles adopted by him in former times set aside, and we complain that no sufficient reason has been given, either by the Prime Minister or any of his Colleagues, why those views are now set aside. Therefore, while I do not think my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) ought to be rebuked for the course he has taken, I think we should not be wise to spend much time upon this question. What we have to consider is the 7th clause, which has been truly said to be the most important part of the Bill, and concerning which I will say that, as originally drawn, it was very different in character from the clause as we are now asked to pass it. It began, in the first instance, by providing that the tenant should have the power of demanding a fair rental to be fixed by the Court, and it went on to define the manner in which the Court were to arrive at what a fair rent would be. The clause, as it originally stood, contained rather minute and complicated directions to the Court—namely, that, in settling what the fair rent would be, they were to take into account what was called the “tenant’s interest,” and the manner of calculating this was set out at full length in the clause. On looking at that part of the clause I was of opinion that the manner in which it was proposed to calculate the tenant’s interest was unfair, in that it would not only have given to the tenant that which I believe he had no right to claim, but also more than had been claimed for him, especially in recent years, by as great a friend of the tenant as the late Mr. Butt. It was my intention to challenge the definition given as to the manner in which the tenant’s interest was to be arrived at, and, if possible, to make the definition correspond more precisely with that which would meet, as I believed, the fair justice of the case. But before we reached the discussion of that part of the Bill, the Government changed their view and struck out those minute directions intended for the guidance of the Court, and which I intended to oppose, and in place of them proposed that it should be left to the Court, with due regard to the circumstances of the case, holding, and district, to fix what was to be the fair rent. If the matters had been so left, I think it might have been satisfactory, because we could then have concentrated our attention on the construction and constitution of the Court and the powers which ought to be given to it. And, as I have said, the clause in its amended form would have been one which we might have been content to allow to pass unchallenged, in order to concentrate our attention on the Court, to whose power of discernment the question of the fair rent was to be intrusted. But, Sir, in the course of the discussion an alteration was made, not by the Government, but on the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), who took an active part in the discussion and with very great ability. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk introduced some words which I think may lead to some difficulties hereafter—I mean the words “having regard to the interests of the landlord and tenant respectively.” These sound very harmless words; but I think that, to a certain extent, they are words which may be held to imply that very direction to the Court which it was our object to do away with. [Cheers from the Home Rule Members.] The cheers from that part of the House rather confirm me in my opinion, and render it all the more important that we should bear in mind what the possible effect of the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman was, and what effect they may have on our future proceedings. Our view has been that it is necessary, and I am far from saying that, in my own view, it may not be necessary, to make, as a temporary arrangement, under the peculiar circumstances of Ireland, provisions for fixing the rent. If it is necessary, then I think it should be made without letting in a principle which is of such a character that I do not think the Committee ought to accept it. It is a principle which has been recognized almost accidentally, and without the knowledge even of the authors of the Act of 1870—certainly without the knowledge of a large portion of Parliament who accepted and passed that Act, and it is a principle which not only recognizes the right of the tenant, but largely extends it. When we say that the right was not only recognized, but intended to be stereotyped by the clause relating to compensation for disturbance, we certainly did feel that the proposal was one which must necessarily challenge a great deal of criticism on our part. Then there is the other point to which reference has been made, and upon which I will not delay the Committee now—the question of perpetuity, or fixity, or durability, or whatever else it may be called. Undoubtedly, the effect of these clauses is to give something very much beyond the mere rent for a statutory term of 15 years. The effect is to give a power of renewal, and a power of renewal which may, subject to a few exceptions, be exercised over and over again for all time, and which I think can hardly be distinguished from what may be called perpetuity of tenure. Exceptions they are, but they prove the rule and go beyond the necessity which we recognize in the case; and, under these circumstances, it becomes our duty to express our opinion by dividing against the clause. I think that is necessary, for this reason—if we did not divide against the clause in its present shape, we should always be told in future discussions on other parts of the Bill—"Oh, but that was included in the 7th clause, which, after a great deal of discussion and a great deal of amendment, was accepted by the Committee without a division." Therefore, I am not prepared to accept it without a division. While I recognize in the Bill some things which are not bad, I recognize also in it some things which I think we are bound to protest against; and, therefore, it is my intention to advise my hon. Friends to join me in dividing against the clause.

MR. SHAW said, the hon. Member who introduced the Amendment (Mr. Chaplin) had made a reference to the Bessborough Commission which he (Mr. Shaw) considered most unfair. Indeed, it was not the first time that unfair references had been made to that Commission, and he thought it would be much better if hon. and right hon. Gentlemen would give Notice of a Motion in regard to that Commission. There might have been a dozen witnesses who gave their evidence very absurdly; but he was quite prepared to defend the recommendations of the Commission and the conclusions to which they arrived. The hon. Gentleman also referred to a debate which had taken place in "another place." Until that day he (Mr. Shaw) had not read the speech of the Duke of Argyll. He had been more pleasantly occupied in taking a few days' holiday; but he had not the slightest hesitation in saying that a more incorrect and a more unfair speech he had never read. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is at present referring to a debate in the other House, and he is not in Order in so doing.

Sir Stafford Northcote

MR. SHAW thought he might be allowed to refer to the debate in question, seeing that the Chairman had not interposed when it was referred to by a previous speaker.

THE CHAIRMAN: I did not hear the reference, or I would have stopped it at once.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked if it was not a fact that a noble Lord in "another place" referred to a speech made in the House of Commons this Session by the Prime Minister?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have no knowledge whatever of what has taken place in "another place."

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to ask a question on a point of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point of Order is already settled.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to ask a question on another point of Order. Of course, it was perfectly clear that any Member of that House would not be justified in referring to what had been said by a Peer in "another place;" but would he not be justified in referring to a published report of that Peer's speech which had appeared in the newspapers?

MR. SHAW, continuing, said, he had been asked by a friend whether he did not intend to reply to that speech, and his answer was that he could not very well, in the present hot weather, answer it by a letter in The Times. It was only a Scotchman who was able to do that. However, he had expressed his willingness to answer the speech at any time in the place in which it was made. [Cries of "Oh!"] He did not mean what hon. Members seemed to think he meant. He hoped that Providence would preserve him from acquiring a right to speak in that House; and what he meant was, that he was ready at any time to appear at the Bar of the House of Lords and answer the speech, and he had no doubt that Baron Dowse would also be quite ready to appear there. [Cries of "Order!"] He really did not think he was out of Order; but he would address himself now to the clause under discussion. He regarded it as containing what he understood to be a real and perfect security for the present tenant, and for the present tenant alone. As such the Irish Members had always regarded it; not as giving security in perpetuity, but as giving security to the present tenants. If the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister were now to withdraw the clause, he (Mr. Shaw) was sure the Irish Members would entirely dissociate themselves from the Bill, and cast upon the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who threw out the clause the responsibility of passing the measure. He considered it absolutely essential that on every change of tenancy the tenant right and the improvement rights of the tenant should be purchased, and he understood that to be the recommendation of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he had not stated that he recommended that as the right plan to adopt; but he had mentioned it to show that the recommendation of the Commission was not inconsistent with the possibility of doing it.

MR. SHAW said, he could not understand why the hon. Member should propound a plan of this kind without being prepared to give the Court power to carry it out. He understood that the hon. Member propounded it as a great political scheme; but it was a plan that would work absolute and entire ruin to the landlords.

MR. CHAPLIN: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why?

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire desires to make an explanation he will have an opportunity of doing so after the speech of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Shaw) is concluded.

MR. SHAW, continuing, said, it had been suggested that he should move an Amendment to the clause; but he believed that the clause as it stood was sufficient to protect all the interests concerned. It was absurd to suppose that any valuer in Ireland, being required to enter into the whole question of the interest of the tenant and of the landlord, would not take everything into consideration.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 289; Noes 157: Majority 132.—(Div. List, No. 291.)

Clause 8 (Equities to be administered by Court between landlord and tenant).

MR. BIGGAR said, that as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the County of Roscommon (Dr. Commins) was not present, he would move formally the Amendment which stood in the name of his hon. Friend, in order to give the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland an opportunity of deciding whether the substitution of "inequitable" and "inequitably" for the words "unreasonable" and "unreasonably" would make any difference in the view of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. As a non-legal Member, he (Mr. Biggar) could see no difference; but, on the other hand, there might be a difference in the legal mind. If there should prove to be a material difference he would not press the Amendment. He begged to move, in line 31, to leave out the words "unreasonable" and "unreasonably," and substitute for them the words "inequitable" and "inequitably."

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 31, to leave out the word "unreasonable," in order to substitute the word "inequitable."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'unreasonable' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he must decline to accept the Amendment. If the landlord demanded too high a rent, it would come under the word "unreasonable," as the Court would have to decide whether the demand was unreasonable or not. The insertion of the word "inequitable" would not be any improvement.

MR. BIGGAR said, that after that explanation he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON moved, as an Amendment, in line 34, after "same," to insert "or postpone the same." It would be grossly unjust to the landlord who had originally placed a farm in the hands of a tenant in a thoroughly good condition to give power to the Court to accede to the tenant's application, and declare the landlord's conduct unreasonable so long as the farm continued in a bad condition. He wished to have these words inserted in the clause in order to indicate to the Court that it should have power to say to the tenant—"I will not give any decision yet as to rent, owing to the scandalous condition into which you have allowed the holding to run; but if you will come back to me in two or three years' time, I will then consider your application, and, in the meantime, you must put the farm into good heart and condition." The Court in such a case would be able to say—"I do not dismiss your application absolutely; but I postpone the consideration of it for two, two and a-half, or three years, and at the end of that period you may come back, and I will then see what the condition of the farm is." The tenant might receive the farm in a perfectly good condition, and might by the worst conceivable husbandry reduce it to the worst possible condition, in which it might be worth only 2s. 6d. an acre. The words he proposed to insert in the clause were "or postpone the same," subject to certain terms; and the terms he assumed would be that the tenant should put the holding into something like a reasonable tenantable condition. The Court would always have an opportunity of seeing whether the tenant had bond fide carried out the terms and conditions of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 34, after "same," insert "or postpone the same."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) said, he did not like to refuse anything proposed to him by his right hon. and learned Friend; but he did not see that it was desirable to accept the proposal now made, which was altogether unnecessary. When a man entered upon a farm, he ought to be wise enough to keep his farm in the highest possible state of cultivation, so that he might realize the highest possible sum from it. If a tenant who had allowed his farm to run out of condition applied to the Court, the Court would at once be able, under that 8th clause, to deal with it at its discretion. It might consider whether the tenant had done anything that was unreasonable, and might thereupon refuse the application. But there was nothing to prevent the Court from entertaining the application again at the end of two or three years. The clause, as it stood, would enable the Court either to grant the application, or to refuse it until the tenant had restored the holding to a satisfactory condition. When the farm had been placed in a tenantable condition, there was nothing to prevent the tenant from making an application again; and if the application was a proper one, it would, no doubt, be heard.

MR. BIGGAR failed to see that any advantage would be derived from the adoption of the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). The Court would have power to take into consideration the rent that was substantially paid, and in a case where the holding had been very much impoverished and allowed to run into a very bad condition the interest of the tenant would be exceedingly small. The case put by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, where a tenant had allowed a farm worth 30s. an acre to become so impoverished that it was only worth 2s. 6d. an acre, was a very extreme one; and the Court had ample power, as the clause now stood, to deal with such a case.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. GIVAN said, he proposed to move the omission of the last paragraph of the clause, which provided that—

"The Court in considering whether the landlord or tenant has unreasonably refused any proposal made by the other, may take into account any proposal that may have been made of the grant by the landlord to the tenant of such a lease as is hereafter in this Act referred to as a judicial lease; but the conduct of the tenant in refusing the grant of any such lease shall not be deemed unreasonable unless the Court is satisfied that the interest of the tenant, having regard to the value of his tenancy, would have been sufficiently secured by such lease."

The object of that part of the clause was to protect the tenant from any undue force the landlord might bring to bear upon the tenant to compel him to accept a judicial lease, and then from setting up such lease in opposition to the tenant's claim. The clause, in the first paragraph, provided that—

"Where the Court, on the hearing of an application of either landlord or tenant respecting any matter under this Act, is of opinion that the conduct of either landlord or tenant has been unreasonable, or that the one has unreasonably refused any proposal made by the other," the Court might do certain things specified in the second paragraph of the clause, and which were to be a direction to the Court in regard to the matters that were reasonably left to its discretion. The words, as they stood in the first part of the clause, were, he thought, quite sufficient, and it was not expedient to drag into the clause the offer of a judicial lease to the tenant for the purpose of enabling the landlord to go before the Court with what he might consider to be a reasonable offer in satisfaction of the claims of the tenant. At the present moment, he proposed to move the omission of the third paragraph of the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 38, to leave out from the word "justice" to end of Clause.—(Mr. Givan.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to left out stand part of the Clause."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL hoped that the Government would adhere to the clause as it stood. The provision which the hon. Member proposed to strike out was only an invitation to the landlord and tenant to settle their differences out of Court. The paragraph itself simply enabled the landlord to draw the attention of the Court formally to the lease which the Government proposed to call a judicial lease; otherwise the Court might not have regard to the perfectly equitable and fair terms of the lease. It was open to the tenant to refuse it if he thought it would bind him too much; but, on the other hand, if he did accept it, the landlord ought to be able to take advantage of it.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he did not attach very much importance either one way or the other to the Amendment. As to the paragraph of the clause against which the Amendment was directed, he did not think it improved the first part of the section, which might be described as the general equity section. The first part of it was sufficiently comprehensive in its general terms to give the Court power to deal with all applications by the landlord or tenant; and he did not think it good drafting, after having laid down general principles, to proceed to point out particular cases.

MR. SYNAN thought the tenant was protected by the words at the end of the sub-section—

"But the conduct of the tenant in refusing the grant of any such lease shall not be deemed unreasonable unless the Court is satisfied that the interest of the tenant, having regard to the value of his tenancy, would have been sufficiently secured by such lease."

In fact, the lease was not forced by the landlord on the tenant; but it was a lease accepted by the Court on behalf of the tenant, and approved by the Court on behalf of the tenant. It therefore stood upon entirely 'different lines from the clause of the Act of 1870, which provided that a 31 years' lease should take the tenant out of the Act. This clause did not take the tenant out of the provisions of the Bill; but it left it directed that a lease, when accepted by the tenant and approved by the Court, should be binding upon the landlord. If the Court said that the refusal of the tenant was not unreasonable, that would be a sufficient protection for the tenant.

MR. LITTON said, he was of opinion that it would be undesirable to allow the Court to say that the offer of a judicial lease was to be a receipt in full to the tenant for all claims under the Act. He did not suppose that a single tenant out of a lunatic asylum would dream of accepting a lease of 31 years in lieu of the benefits conferred by the Act. Now, what were the benefits of the Act? The right of getting a perpetual renewal of a term of 15 years, so long as the tenant thought proper to go to the Court and prove that he had observed the conditions of a statutory tenancy. What, then, could be the object of placing the Court—recollecting that the Court would probably be the County Court Judges in Ireland, who, whatever their abilities were, had their feelings—would it be wise or just to place upon them the invidious duty of determining that a lease of 31 years offered to the tenant was a lease that ought to be accepted by the tenant? It was quite true that the words were "thirty-one years or upwards;" and it might be contended that the County Court Judge, before he refused the application, might say that unless it was a 41, or a 51, or a 61 years' lease, he would not consider it reasonable. Under all the circumstances, he apprehended that it would be a great improvement to the Bill if these words were struck out, as was proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Monaghan (Mr. Givan). They were quite unnecessary for the general purposes of equity; and, under the first part of the clause, the matter might very well be left to the discretion of the Court.

MR. LALOR wished to remind the Committee and the Government that many of the evils which afflicted Ireland at the present moment had arisen out of the power given by the Land Act of 1870 to force judicial leases upon the tenants. Much bitterness of feeling and heartburning had originated from that practice. He said that the leases had been forced upon tenants. They had never been more forced upon them than now. It might be said that the tenants were open to refuse them; but if they had refused them they knew what the inevitable consequence would be. He was satisfied that no man in Ireland would accept one of these judicial leases in lieu of his rights under the present Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: Two distinct questions have been raised in the course of the observations of hon. Members who have taken part in the discussion. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) did, however, place the matter suggested by the Amendment on its proper ground. The suggestion is this—the two first paragraphs of the clause are quite ample to cover any judgment the Court may form as to the offer of a judicial lease. Now, I think it is not expedient to argue, on the present occasion, the question whether these leases are desirable, or, if they are desirable, what should be their precise terms. The Committee will have to consider that question under the 9th clause, and they will have not only to consider the whole of the terms of the leases, but to give their judgment upon the 9th clause itself. Therefore, I would respectfully suggest that we would do well to postpone that subject entirely, and confine ourselves now to the narrow question whether it is expedient for the purposes of the Bill that after investing the Court with general power to consider and determine and draw its own conclusions upon every question of a reasonable offer between the parties we should proceed to point out one particular kind of reasonable or unreasonable contracts. I am bound to say that I think we should do much more wisely to trust to the general powers contained in the first part of the clause. No doubt, under the general powers conferred by the clause, it will be in the competency of the Court to deal with the question of unreasonable contracts; and the refusal to entertain the offer of a lease would, under the first part of the clause, undoubtedly come within the jurisdiction of the Court. The closing words of the first paragraph in line 31 are—

“Or that the one has unreasonably refused any proposal made by the other the Court may do as follows.”

Then the clause goes on to say what the Court may do, and the alternative is that—

“It may refuse to accede to the application, or that it may accede to the application subject to conditions.”

Under these circumstances, I think it will probably be better to drop the third paragraph, especially as the matter may be considered better on the 9th clause, which contemplates the duration and consequences of judicial leases upon the settlement of the whole condition of the tenancy, whereas this clause does not contemplate such matters, but only the settlement of the amount of rent.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought the Government had acted very unwisely in giving up this section. Judicial leases were the particular invention of the Prime Minister himself. He recollected quite well the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman in introducing the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said, in effect—“We recognize that there are good landlords in Ireland, and we wish to make a distinction between them and bad landlords, and to keep them, if possible, out of Court by permitting them to make arrangements with their tenants. We wish to give them an opportunity of continuing to their tenants, for some considerable time, the benefits the tenants now enjoy under them; and, therefore, the tenants who enjoy judicial leases will not come under the clause.” The offer of a judicial lease was to be considered by the Court as a reasonable offer, not to be refused by the tenant; but the right hon. Gentleman now proposed to leave the Court to say that the tenant might be free to refuse it or not. As the clause originally stood the tenant could not refuse a judicial lease, as long as it preserved the fair interests of the tenant. He thought the concession of the Government was really a very important one; and he deprecated the readiness which they displayed in abandoning their proposals in order to meet the views of the extreme Party.

LORD JOHN MANNERS regretted that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had not, on other occasions, displayed the same readiness to make concessions which he had manifested now. He (Lord John Manners) also entertained an objection to the mode in which it was proposed to deal with judicial leases; and if the 3rd section of the present clause had been allowed to remain in it, it would have been his duty to move the insertion of the larger and more liberal words which appeared in the 18th section of the Act of 1870. The Act of 1870 was not to be displaced from the Statute Book; and as they had heard nothing in condemnation of the operation of the 18th section, he thought, if the words of the present clause were to be changed at all, it was expedient that the Amendment should be in the direction of adopting the phraseology of the 18th section of the Act of 1870. Therefore, if the section had been retained he should certainly have felt it necessary to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

MR. WARTON wished to put a question to the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman, if he understood him rightly, seemed to be abandoning the third paragraph of the 8th clause of the Bill on the ground that judicial leases were not worth having. He wished, therefore, to know whether it was also the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to abandon the 9th section?

Question put, and negatived.

Words struck out accordingly.

MR. WARTON said, that nothing in the conduct of the Bill had struck him with more surprise than the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law) upon the meaning of the word "unreasonable." He did not dispute that there might have been cases since the passing of the Act of 1870 which the Court might fairly hold to be unreasonable; but if they were to make the Bill understood and effective they ought not to leave out of consideration the important question of the deterioration of the holding. As the clause was at present drawn, the only questions the Court could really consider were questions relating to that which happened at the time the landlord and tenant came into Court, or nearly about that time; and, in reality, they did not go back far enough into the history of the conduct of the parties, and especially into the important question whether the tenant had or had not deteriorated the condition of the soil. In passing, he wished to put a question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman upon a point which had agitated his mind very considerably, in regard to the provisions of the 4th clause. Long as it was since the Committee disposed of that clause, some of them would remember that, in the 4th section, a number of conditions were defined which were called "statutory conditions." At first it was thought that a breach of these conditions would lead to the loss of the holding and to the re-entry of the landlord. It was now found that, nevertheless, the tenant was to be compensated by damages. He wished to know whether, in the event of the tenant breaking any of the statutory conditions, such, for instance, as breaking up the farm and sub-dividing it, that was a question which was to come up for the consideration of the Court, because the words of the clause, as they stood, were—"Or that the one has unreasonably refused any proposal made by the other, the Court may do"—certain things. All the statutable conditions made by the 4th clause were interfered with by the present clause; and he was, therefore, anxious to move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 4, at the end of the Clause to add—"Provided always, That in considering the question whether the conduct of the tenant has or has not been unreasonable, the Court may take into consideration whether the tenant of the holding in which such tenancy subsists, or his predecessors in title, has or have caused or suffered such holding to become and be then deteriorated contrary to the express or implied conditions constituting the contract of tenancy."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would accept the same answer as that which he had given to his right hon. and learned Friend opposite (Mr. Gibson). The word "unreasonable," which was already in the Bill, would include waste, and all the deterioration which the hon.

[Twentieth Night.]

and learned Gentleman wished to guard against was already provided for by the Bill.

MR. WARTON intimated that, after the clear statement made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he was satisfied, and would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PART III.

EXCLUSION OF ACT BY AGREEMENT.

Judicial Leases.

Clause 9 (Lease approved by Court during its continuance to exclude provisions of the Act).

MR. LITTON moved, as an Amendment, to leave out "thirty," and insert "sixty." He thought that 30 years were too short a term, and that 60 or 61 years would be much better. He was, however, unwilling to press the Amendment, unless he had reason to believe that it would be favourably received by the Committee. He should, therefore, ask the Chairman to put the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 12, to leave out "thirty" and insert "sixty."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'thirty' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE: As the hour for reporting Progress has nearly arrived, it is hardly worth while to call upon the Committee to discuss the Amendment, which is of some importance, now. I will, therefore, move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Mr. Gladstone.)—put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

And it being now ten minutes to Seven of the clock the House suspended its Sitting.

House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Progress resumed.

Amendment again proposed, in page 9, line 12, to leave out the word "thirty," and insert "sixty."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'thirty' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LITTON explained, that he proposed the Amendment with a view to ascertaining the views of the Government upon the subject. It appeared to him that it would be a very great advantage, where an equivalent was to be offered to the tenants, that a real equivalent should be offered, and not simply 30 years, which appeared to him to be totally inadequate. He did not wish to press the Amendment, if the Government did not see their way to accept it; because he thought the necessity was somewhat removed by reason of the Amendment made on the latter portion of the prior clause. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was able to state to the Committee that he preferred to keep the term "thirty years" in the clause, he (Mr. Litton) would withdraw the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not know what the intention of the Government was as to this particular Amendment. Under the clause, as it at present stood with 31 years, the tenant, instead of being entitled to a renewal from time to time at the end of 15 years, would, at the end of 31 years, become a future tenant. That was an objectionable provision, because a landlord might bring pressure to bear on the tenant, and threaten that if he did not agree to his terms he would take him into the Court and put him to expensive litigation. Although provisions of leases heretofore had not been always insisted upon by the landlords, it had been customary to put in leases conditions which would be thoroughly unreasonable if acted upon, and would deprive the tenant of his rights. Nothing could be more natural than that a landlord should say that the provision was the same as leases which had been signed from time to time; and thus the tenant of a large property might be induced to accept leases entirely taking away his rights.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Committee must remember that the position of the tenant would be very different after this Bill became law from his position hitherto, and the power of the landlord to force the tenant, or to bring pressure to bear upon him, in order to take away a lease, would be very much diminished; because, by this clause, the Bill would enable a tenant, under pressure or threat, to apply to the Court in cases where there was a judicial rent to resist more or less the powers of the landlord. Everything which would apply to the Act of 1870 would not apply now; the landlord would not be able to force upon the tenant a lease as he could under the Act of 1870, and the arrangement would not in future be one-sided. It was not absolutely to the advantage of a tenant to have a long lease; on the contrary, it might in many cases be an advantage to have a shorter lease; therefore, he thought the proposed Amendment was not desirable. If they were to look forward to the judicial lease at all, they must take care not to make the tenancy so large as to take away the landlord's interest. Both sides ought to be considered.

CAPTAIN AYLMER was glad the Government did not support the Amendment. He would remind the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) of the necessity of not making more absentee landlords, and that, he feared, would be the result of the Amendment.

MR. LITTON asked permission to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR objected to the Amendment being withdrawn, observing that Irishmen had not derived any advantage in past times, and did not expect to do so in times to come, as to leases. It was perfectly well known that since 1870 landlords had been constantly urging their tenants to agree to leases. If a tenant was to be entitled to appeal to the Court with regard to leases, he had better not have the powers proposed as to leases at all; for if he were a free agent he could please himself whether he agreed to a lease or not, whereas under the Bill the lease must be subject to the whim of the Judge.

MR. LALOR hoped the Government would accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he rose to propose an Amendment on behalf of the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Harcourt). The clause, as it stood, provided that the landlord and tenant might agree to a lease mutually made, "if sanctioned by the Court, after considering the interest of the tenant and the value of his tenancy." His hon. Friend, however, proposed to insert, instead of "the interest of the tenant," the words "rights and interests of the landlord and tenant respectively." He had not the slightest doubt that the Government in introducing this Bill desired to do justice to all parties, and he, therefore, felt sure they would agree to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, lines 15 and 16, to leave out "interest of the tenant and the value of his tenancy," in order to insert "rights and interests of the landlord and tenant respectively."

Question proposed, "That the words 'interest of the tenant and the value of his tenancy' stand part of the Clause."

MR. WARTON agreed with the object of the Amendment, but objected to the words "rights and interests of the landlord and tenant respectively;" because that might imply that the landlord only had rights and the tenant interests. He suggested the words should be "rights and interests both of the landlord and the tenant."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) regretted that he could not accept the Amendment. He explained that a judicial lease was not a lease which the landlord of his own mere motion was to have the power of granting to a tenant. The Court was brought in not to look after the interest of the landlord—who was perfectly well able to take care of himself—but to protect the tenant, and it was with that view that the Court was to be empowered to sanction a lease.

MR. PLUNKET said, he understood that the object of this clause was to carry on in this Bill the policy which was introduced into the Act of 1870—namely, the system of leases, which exempted a landlord from the provisions of that Act. The object of the clause, as he understood it, was to introduce a similar provision; but the intervention of the Court was to be permitted. He did not wish to insist on the language of the Amendment; but he desired the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to explain exactly what was the meaning in this clause of the words "after considering the interest of the tenant, and the value of the tenancy?"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) explained that it would be the duty of the Court to ensure the interests of the tenant being respected.

CAPTAIN AYLMER pointed out that the clause distinctly stated that the landlord might propose, and the tenant agree to accept, a lease, and the thing would then practically be done on such conditions as the parties agreed upon. Then came the words "if sanctioned by the Court," and the right hon. and learned Gentleman said the Court was to see the interests of the tenant respected; but surely they ought to look at both sides of the question, and it was monstrous to say that the Court was only to look after the tenant's interest.

MR. GIVAN thought the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Aylmer) was labouring under a slight misapprehension, for he seemed to forget that in accepting a judicial lease the tenant surrendered certain important rights which he possessed if he had not accepted the judicial lease. He had a right to go and get a statutory term and have the rent fixed; but as he surrendered those rights by accepting a judicial rent, the clause properly provided that the Court should have supervision over his interests. It was not necessary that the rights of the landlord should be protected, because those rights were subsisting rights which were not surrendered. The tenant might be an ignorant man and not understand the effect of the clause, and so he might be induced to accept a lease which would be prejudicial to his interests, while he surrendered all the privileges he would have as a statutory tenant; and that was the reason, as he understood, why the rights of the tenant and not those of the landlord were to be protected.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought the argument of the hon. Member (Mr. Givan) was based entirely upon a misapprehension as to the meaning of the words. The judicial leases were suggested by the Government, because the Government recognized that in dealing with the Land Question in Ireland, they had to deal with two distinct classes of landlords—good landlords and bad landlords. Good landlords would allow their tenants to hold on for a great many years at a moderate rent, while other landlords would, to a certain extent, rack-rent the tenant. The good landlord, who had been in the habit of allowing the tenant to hold on at a certain rent for many years, would have power under this clause to suggest to the tenant that they should not go to the Court to fix a rent, but should agree together to continue the tenancy on its old terms. In that way he would exclude the action of the Bill; but he would give the tenant a certain amount of permanency in his lease. That was the object of the clause. The landlord would grant a judicial lease which would be accepted by the Court, and the landlord's and tenant's interest would be equal. He considered the Amendment on the whole a reasonable one, and the only ground upon which he disliked the language of the Amendment was that it was the same as the hon. Member for Dundalk had inserted in the 7th clause, to which he (Lord Randolph Churchill) had objected as having an insidious meaning. It had, no doubt, an insidious meaning in that clause; but he did not think it would have in this clause. He attached very considerable value to the provision as to judicial leases, because the landlords in Ireland who had managed their property fairly and well would be glad to give the tenant for 31 years or more all the advantages they had hitherto enjoyed, but on the understanding that the tenant was not then to be at liberty to take hostile proceedings against the landlord. That was the value of the judicial lease, and he considered that it was being seriously interfered with by the Amendment which the Government had accepted earlier in the Sitting, and with regard to which he should, on Report, move the reinsertion of the words then omitted.

MR. PLUNKET suggested that the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Aylmer) should not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing upon the Amendment. He still preferred the language of the Amendment to that of the Bill, and he could not understand the necessity of the words "after considering the interest of the tenant." If any reference was to be made to the interests of either landlord or tenant, it would, he thought, be better not to have a one-sided affair. But, under the circumstances, he would advise the withdrawal of the Amendment if the Government persisted in opposing it.

CAPTAIN AYLMER observed, that there was nothing in the clause to bind the tenant to give up his statutory term, and that if he accepted a lease he did so by his own free will. Both landlord and tenant were on equal terms, and he maintained that the interests of both parties ought to be considered by the Court in deciding whether the terms on both sides were just. He regretted that the Government did not look at the matter in the same light; but he would not take up the time of the Committee by dividing. At the same time, he thought it was extremely unfair and unjust for the Government to refuse the proposal.

MR. WARTON asked, whether it would still be in the power of the landlord and tenant to agree to a lease on any terms apart from the lease?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): Certainly not.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL proposed, in lines 15 and 16, to leave out "and the value of his tenancy;" and explained that if any hon. Member thought it necessary to raise a discussion he should not press it.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, lines 15 and 16, to leave out the words "and the value of his tenancy."—(Mr. Charles Russell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be struck out stand part of the Clause."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, in agreeing to the Amendment, he did not think the proposed words were required.

MR. PLUNKET said, he did not wish to raise a controversy upon the Amendment, and he should not therefore oppose it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL pointed out that "the interest of the tenant and the value of the tenancy" might be two distinct things. "The interest of the tenant" meant what was established under the Common Law, fortified by the Act of 1870; but "the value of the tenancy" meant any sum of money which the tenant had paid on going into the farm; so that all the Court had to consider was what the Common Law assigned to him. Therefore, he thought that the framers of the Bill were not open to the charge of tautology, and it was not necessary that all judicial leases should take into account "the interests of the tenant and the value of the tenancy," because the two things were distinct. On the whole, he was inclined to think that the clause would be better as it stood, than if amended as proposed.

Question put, and negatived; words struck out accordingly.

MR. PLUNKET (for Mr. Northcote) proposed an Amendment. The Amendment would do no possible harm, and he thought the Government would not object to it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 16, after "tenancy," to insert "and where such lease is made by a limited owner, as defined by the twenty-sixth section of 'The Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870,' the interest of all persons entitled to any estate or interest in the holding subsequent to the estate or interest of such limited owner."—(Mr. Plunket.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) agreed in the object of the Amendment, but explained that that object was already provided for in the 18th section of the Bill.

MR. WARTON pointed out that the 18th section applied only to a fixed tenancy, and not to a judicial lease.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) replied, that that might be quite true; but the clause with regard to rules met the difficulty.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN proposed an Amendment with the object of introducing, at that point of the Bill, that system of Parliamentary tenant right with which the name of Judge Longfield was associated. When the Land Act of 1870 was passing through Parliament, Judge Longfield, in a letter to The Times, on the 26th March, 1870, pointed out, or gave expression to, some apprehensions he had as to the failure of that well-intentioned measure, then being carried through Parliament, in some respects, and he made a suggestion as to a principle which he called "Parliamentary tenant right," which was that leases might, on the agreement of the parties, be indefinitely renewed, with a self-adjusting mechanism for settling a fair rent without reduction. He (Mr. Sullivan) hoped the Committee would agree that in this Bill it was desirable to introduce this principle, which could be introduced without dislocating or damaging in any way any of the other useful provisions of the measure, especially if it could be shown that the Amendment would enable the landlord and tenant to adjust the question on a fair rent from time to time without approaching the Court. The proposal which Judge Longfield made was that every tenant in Ireland should be made to purchase a Parliamentary right in his holding equivalent to the Ulster tenant right, which the tenant might have purchased for a considerable sum of money. In Ulster, a tenant would have the Parliamentary tenant right based upon the sum which the tenant had paid for his interest in the holding. Outside Ulster, Judge Longfield proposed that a similar system should be introduced by enabling the tenant to buy the tenant right in either one of these ways—by the payment of a sum of money down, or by money paid by the lessee to his predecessor in title with the expressed or implied consent of the landlord, or by money to be spent in improvements agreed on by the parties; or, in a vast majority of cases, which under this Bill were called present tenancies—that was to say, tenancies outside Ulster where the Ulster Custom had not been localized, but where the tenants, nevertheless, had succeeded, through many generations of occupancy, to an interest in the holding, as well as to their actual improvements—he would allow the tenant right to purchase by estimating the value of such equitable interest as the tenant had in the farm, including therein the Ulster tenant right where it existed. The question of fair rent would be adjusted in this way. The tenant having agreed upon a fair rent for a certain term of years, which the Amendment proposed should be 15, if, at the end of the 15 years, the landlord claimed a higher rent, the tenant might either assent to it or elect to go out; but in the latter case, the landlord would be bound to pay the tenant 10 years' purchase of the increased rent which he demanded. On the other hand, if a tenant demanded a reduction of rent, and the landlord did not consent to the reduction, the tenant would be bound to sell to the landlord at 10 years' of the reduced rent. The effect of this proposal would be this—if the tenant attempted to extort from the landlord by demanding a reduced rent which was less than a fair rent, he would be cut by the landlord, who would buy from him, on the basis of 10 years' purchase of the reduced rent; on the other hand, if the landlord endeavoured to extort from the tenant by asking an increased rent, he would be cut by the tenant, who left the farm, and received 10 times the increase asked for by the landlord. In that way it would be the interest of the landlord not to ask too much, and the interest of the tenant not to insist upon too low a rent. That would be what he would call a self-acting mechanism for effecting a fair rent without recourse to litigation, and by the simplest of all processes—namely, self-protection and self-interest, which enabled both landlord and tenant to prevent either over-reaching the other. The system had been in operation on some farms belonging to a relative of Judge Longfield, in Ulster; and not only had the instalments of the money advanced to tenants to purchase tenant right been regularly paid, but there was not at this moment on any of those farms one farthing of uncollected arrear even for past bad seasons. The security which this Parliamentary tenant right had given to those tenants had, somehow or other, brought about a thrift and a saving on the part of the tenants, which tenants elsewhere had not exhibited. He, therefore, wished to move this Amendment, the nature of which he had explained. The power to be created by the Amendment would be purely permissive, and the Court might or might not permit a lease on which the landlord and tenant had agreed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 20, after "applies," insert "Provided always, That a judicial lease may be a lease for a Parliamentary tenant right, according to the form in the Schedule to this Act annexed, or such similar form as the Court may prescribe from time to time."—(Mr. A. M. Sullivan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) thought it would be certainly inconvenient to introduce the Amendment into the clause, and he pointed out that, as the clause stood, there was no reason why the Court should not adopt leases such as those indicated by the hon. and learned Member, if only they were agreed upon by landlord and tenant. The Court had to see that the conditions were fair, and it would be quite competent, under the clause, for the Court to consider and adopt the Longfield Lease if they liked.

MR. PLUNKET said, the proposal had attracted a great deal of attention in Ireland, and, like everything which Judge Longfield had brought before the public, it was extremely ingenious. It was brought forward in 1870—but then he (Mr. Plunket) thought rather as a rival scheme to the Bill of the Government—and during the debate the Prime Minister had announced that if it was intended as a rival scheme, he preferred his own proposal. He (Mr. Plunket) should not regret the adoption of the scheme in the present Bill, and he thought it had some recommendations as compared with the general scheme of the Government. In the first place, it avoided the constant interference of the Court, and would work easily, if voluntarily adopted by both parties. In the second place, it did, to some extent, make provision for bad years and varying seasons, for it regulated the rent at times when the landlord might be inclined to ask for increased rent, or a tenant might be inclined to ask for a decrease. If, however, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had stated, the Longfield Lease might be adopted under the present clause, he would not now advance any further argument.

MR. PARNELL said, he believed that the proposal for the Longfield Lease was brought forward in 1870, not as a permissive proposal, but rather as something the Court might do instead of giving the tenant compensation for disturbance under the Act of 1870—that the Court might, upon application, grant such a lease. It appeared to him that the great objection to the Amendment, as at present proposed, was that it would not be operative. As had been pointed out by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, practically speaking, the Court could adopt this lease under the present Bill if it chose; and undoubtedly the 9th clause was sufficiently wide to cover the Longfield Lease, if the parties agreed to such a lease. But he (Mr. Parnell) should like to see the Amendment brought forward in a different shape—in the shape of a new clause, after the 7th clause, empowering the Court, after it had, on the application of the landlord or the tenant, determined upon a judicial rent, to grant to the tenant some such lease as this, instead of on a 15 years' statutory term. In this way the difficulty as to fixing the future rent after the expiration of the statutory term, might be got rid of. The rent would be fixed according to the arrangement under the Longfield system. The landlord and tenant would be able to agree upon the rent at the expiration of the statutory term, and there would be no more reference to the Court. This would provide a certain practicable plan for settling future rents, after the judicial fair rent had been once settled. This was a subject which he thought well worth the consideration of the Government in the interval before coming to the new clauses; and if his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) were to withdraw the Amendment now, in order to see how he might bring it up again as a new clause after Clause 7, the Government might perhaps be induced to agree to some such proposal. The proposal, if adopted, would get rid of a great deal of the friction which would undoubtedly arise under the provisions of the Bill, as it at present stood, with regard to future revision.

MR. GLADSTONE: The whole of this debate has been exceedingly interesting, and the tone of the Committee is pacific. I have not the slightest inclination to vary it. But there is nothing to prevent the inclusion of the Amendment within the terms of the judicial lease. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) wants to have a judicial lease fixed, and the Bill fixed, so as to have the movement of the rent according to the Longfield Lease, and not according to the statutory judicial lease.

MR. PARNELL: To give power to the Court.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, on the application of the parties.

MR. PARNELL: Not of both parties.

MR. GLADSTONE: It appears to me that the proposal of the hon. and learned

Member for Meath is for both parties, and it would be dangerous to start it as a provision which might be adopted on the application of one party only. Under the judicial lease it will be the duty of the Court to see if the rent is a fair rent; and therefore, if the parties agree, it is clearly within the power of the Court to give a judicial lease with the Longfield Lease, subject to a statutory term of 15 years. But if it is to be adopted on the application of one of the parties only, I confess I think that is rather a peculiar plan, and one which it would be unsafe to start.

MR. GRAY observed, that the Longfield Lease was theoretically perfect; but it appeared to him to be utterly inapplicable to small tenancies. It would only be applicable to large tenancies, where the tenants were able to deal at arms-length with their landlords. It gave power to the landlord at any time to propose an increased rent, and the only remedy the tenant had was to demand a decrease. In the case of tenants holding large interests, this was a substantial check on the landlords; but in the case of small tenancies it was no check whatever, because the extra power which the tenant gained would be no compensation for his increased rent, and he would agree to an excessive rent rather than risk being paid off. He thought it was tolerably evident that the Longfield Lease must be one of the many forms of judicial lease sanctioned by the Court; but it was a different thing to introduce it by a Schedule; and although he would object to any power imposing the Longfield Lease on the tenant, it would be desirable in cases where hardship existed to encourage the adoption of that lease. When the Longfield Lease was first brought before the public in 1870, there was a marvellous consensus of opinion in its favour in Ireland—Conservatives and Liberals and all classes united in pressing on the Government the desirability of adopting that lease as a permissive lease under the Act. But, at that time, the Prime Minister held different views from his present views, and he was so opposed to it that the proposal had to be pressed to a division. If there was no substantial objection to the Longfield Lease itself—and he had not heard of any objection—it might be well worth the consideration of the Government whether they would embody it as a permissive lease in the Bill.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought the proposal would cause great complication in many cases, and he hoped it would not be pressed upon the Committee, but that the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) would be satisfied with the general approval which had been expressed by the Government.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, it was not often that he agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Meath; but in this case he did agree with him, and his view was not a thing of the moment, because, last year, when the Compensation for Disturbance Bill was under consideration, he spoke to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland about the advantages of the Longfield Lease. At the same time, while he would support the Amendment he would not exactly follow the Schedule which the hon. and learned Member proposed to attach, because he thought the Schedule of the Longfield Lease required some alteration. It was sound in its general principles, but in some parts it was defective. Some landlords had altered it, and had then found it work well. He hoped the Government would adopt the proposal.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was exceedingly rejoiced to hear from the Government that this was a lease which it might be quite within the power of the Court, under Clause 9, to award. His own conception of the lease was that it must necessarily be a matter of agreement between the parties. The object of the Longfield Lease was to avoid friction, and he thought the virtue of the plan would be destroyed if it were to be imposed on the parties. He should ask permission to withdraw the Amendment, with a view to consider whether, at a later stage of the Bill, he could introduce something which might give expression to as much of the agreement of opinion as he had collected from the speeches of hon. Members.

MR. BRODRICK thought it would be well if, before the Amendment was finally withdrawn, the Committee should be aware of the previous views of the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan) on this subject, and of the change that had taken place in those views. The hon. and learned Member wrote a letter to The Freeman's Journal on October 5, 1880, in which he said the idea of a reduction of rents over all Ireland would be entirely repugnant to the principles of commercial freedom of the English people.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Gentleman is going beyond the Amendment.

MR. BRODRICK said, he was merely going to point out that there had been a great deal done since that time; and that the principle which the hon. and learned Member now wished to withdraw and re-introduce in a fresh form as an alternative, was one which the hon. and learned Member, representing, no doubt, a large section of the Irish people, previously held up necessarily as sufficient to meet the case at issue. He thought it was not legitimately brought forward as an alternative. If the lease proposed was held sufficient nine months ago to preclude the necessity of any revision of rents, it was equally so now; and if the hon. and learned Member brought it forward, he ought to be prepared to vote against any interference with the provisions in the 7th clause.

MR. BIGGAR thought it was rather hard on the Irish Members, that each of them should be held responsible for what his Colleagues might have said 10 years ago.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PLUNKET (for Mr. GIBSON) moved, as an Amendment, in page 9, line 21, to leave out after "lease" to the end of line 24, and insert "the landlord shall be entitled to resume possession of the holding." This, of course, was a serious and important proposal; but he hoped to be able to show that it was a fair proposal and well worthy of consideration. Supposing that the proposal of the Government were adopted, and that after the expiration of the judicial lease, the lessee should be deemed to be the tenant of a future ordinary tenancy from year to year at the rent and subject to the conditions of the lease, so far as such conditions were applicable to such tenancy, that amounted, practically, to perpetuity of tenure. What was the good of contracting this judicial lease, and having all the conditions of the tenancy laid down by the Court for a certain period, if, after the termination of the period, the landlord was again to find himself face to face with what was called a future tenant? The present clause applied not only to the landlord and tenant of any ordinary tenancy, but also to the landlord and tenant of a proposed holding to which the Act applied, which was not subject to the conditions of an existing tenancy; and in that case, though the lease offered by the landlord and accepted by the tenant was entirely fair, and the lease would be submitted to the Court and sanctioned by the Court, still when the lease expired the landlord would find that the tenant stood in the position of a future tenant. The clause, at all events, so far as concerned the cases to which he had referred, was of a very extraordinary character, and the Committee would perceive that although the number of years mentioned was 31, there might be a 60 or 100 years' lease; and, no matter how long it lasted, at the end the tenant would be in the position of a future tenant. What the Amendment suggested was that at the expiration of the judicial lease the landlord should be entitled to resume possession. That seemed to him to be a fair and natural conclusion to a tenancy which was strictly guarded against all those infirmities which were supposed by some to attach to contracts of tenancy made in Ireland, because this lease, voluntarily entered into between landlord and tenant, was supposed to have already obtained the sanction of the Court. Therefore, with great confidence, he submitted that the Amendment would make the state of affairs more logical, and was more in consonance with the idea of freedom of contract than the proposal of the Government, that in all cases where a judicial lease was granted, whether in the case of an ordinary tenancy or not, the landlord should afterwards find himself face to face with a future tenant. He moved the Amendment accordingly.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 21, after "lease," leave out to the end of line 24, and insert "the landlord shall be entitled to resume possession of the holding."—(Mr. Plunket.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'the lessee, &c.,' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he did not understand the difficulty felt in this matter. Where was the hardship of the landlord's position, if, at the end of the lease, he could exercise the landlord's ordinary power of control by raising the rent, and could compel the tenant to go or pay an increased rent? [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No.] He said "Yes," certainly; and his noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) was, he submitted, quite wrong upon the point. Applying this to the case of a future tenant, he could not go to the Court for a judicial rent. He failed to see the object of the proposed Amendment, or, rather, what was the hardship it proposed to remedy.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, at the end of a lease a tenant became a future tenant, so that if the landlord demanded an increased rent, and the tenant did not pay it, he could take him into the Court. That was what, in plain English, seemed to him to be the position of the matter; and if the point required any further explanation, perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland would get up and give them the necessary information. To his mind, there could be no doubt at all about it. The tenant, by the words of the Bill, became a future tenant at the expiration of the judicial lease. He thought the words of the Bill were very much better than those of the Amendment, because he was clear upon this point, that the landlord, upon the termination of a judicial lease, could evict the tenant if he liked, just as a landlord could evict the tenant of any holding where the lease had expired. The tenant became an ordinary yearly tenant, and was no longer protected by the Bill, and the landlord could go and evict him. What did the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) propose? He said that the landlord should resume possession of the holding, and that was an artificial expression which they had had some conversation about before. The resumption meant the question of very full compensation.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL really thought that the words proposed to be omitted could not, and ought not, to stop as they were. It might be desirable to leave to the parties freedom of contract as to new tenants coming in; but this section would apply to an existing tenant, and especially to a present tenant. ["No!"] Well, if it did not apply to a present tenant, he had nothing more to say. He had read the clause, and it appeared to him to be the fact that any present tenant who accepted a lease under this provision would sacrifice his tenant right. He thought they should encourage the landlords to grant long terms and keep themselves out of the Court.

MR. GREGORY thought it would be desirable that they should have some explanation from Her Majesty's Government as to what would be the practical operation of this provision, because he confessed for himself, it might be from ignorance, that he felt considerable difficulty about the matter. If it was a matter of English law he should not feel that difficulty, because there the principle was clear that a tenant, after the expiration of a lease or agreement held under the terms of such lease or agreement, and subject to all the conditions of a yearly tenancy as regarded notice to quit. But now the tenant was turned into what was called a future tenant; and what a future tenant in the Bill really meant he was at a loss to know, and it was upon this point that he thought the Committee were entitled to some information. If the position of a tenant, after the expiration of a judicial lease, was to be the position an English tenant would occupy under similar circumstances, there would be an end of the matter. He would merely hold at the will of the landlord; but if there was anything beyond, any inchoate right to the continuance of the tenancy, he thought the Committee ought to know it.

MR. LITTON said, that if the proposal of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) were agreed to, the clause would read thus—

"At the expiration of the judicial lease the landlord shall be entitled to resume possession of the holding."

Now, he would ask what was the object of putting in this Amendment? Because this was the state of things that would follow in the absence of any words of the kind. The Amendment ought, therefore, to have been to strike out the clause, because precisely that result would follow if the clause were not there. There was no distinction whatever between the law of England and the law of Ireland as regarded an over-holding tenant. An over-holding tenant might be evicted at the expiration of a lease.

With regard to the question what should take place on the termination of a judicial lease, that divided itself into two branches. There might be a judicial lease in the case of a present and of a future tenant. The question might arise, what should be the position of a judicial lessee on the termination of his lease?—first, where he happened to be a present tenant; and, secondly, where he was a future tenant. It was manifest that the position of the two ought to be different; and it was quite clear that the man who was a present tenant, and came and took from his landlord a judicial lease, should, on the expiration of that lease, be in the position of a present tenant and not a future tenant.

MR. GLADSTONE: Her Majesty's Government do not propose to accept this Amendment. I am not quite certain—indeed, it would be presumption in me to say what would be its legal effect—but I take it, as expressed by the right hon. and learned Gentleman who moved it (Mr. Plunket), to be a notice to the tenant who accepted the judicial lease, and at the end of all the relations between him and the landlord, that all the tenant's interest should terminate. That is exactly the thing to which the Government cannot agree, and if we did agree to it the clause would be rendered absolutely a dead letter. No tenant in Ireland would accept a lease on conditions that at the end of that lease his whole interest should expire. I will quote a very ancient anecdote upon this point, but is also a very short one. It is one which the late Lord Devon, who was at the head of the Commission of 1843, told me. He said that when inquiries were going forward in Ireland it was found to be usual for a man who held a lease for life to bequeath it on his death-bed to somebody else. That was the expression of a deeply-engrained idea, and the Government are not prepared to come into conflict with that idea. I do not say anything about the other Amendments that may be moved, but I must object to this one.

MR. GIBSON said, that, speaking with great frankness, his opinion as to the judicial lease and the subsequent proposal as to fixed tenancies was that they partook very much of the nature of padding. He did not attach very much importance to all this elaborate phraseology about judicial leases, and he thought that fixed tenancies, to which two clauses of this remarkable Bill were devoted, would not be called in question 10 times during the next 100 years. As, however, the clause was there they should try and give it something like an intelligible construction, and try to arrive at something like a reasonable conclusion upon it. The reason that he had put down on the Paper the Amendment which had been moved by his right hon. and learned Colleague (Mr. Plunket) was that he wished to arrive at a clear and definite idea—if Her Majesty's Government had one—as to what would be the position of a tenant of a judicial lease at the termination of it. They appeared to intend, by adding this second paragraph to Clause 9, to give a construction to the position of a lessee on the termination of his lease entirely at variance with the construction that would be put upon his position on the termination of an ordinary lease. It was intended, by adding the second paragraph at the end of Clause 9, practically to give real perpetuity of tenure in that case as in all others—real, but not avowed. Now, what was the position of the tenant of an ordinary lease, leaving the word “judicial” out of the case altogether? If the tenant of an ordinary lease was permitted by his landlord to continue in occupation on the termination of his lease, and if the landlord elected to accept from that tenant payment of rent, that tenant became a tenant from year to year upon the terms and conditions of his lease which had just expired. There could be no question about that; but the Government did not leave the tenant overholding on the expiration of his judicial lease to the legal implication which every lawyer understood. They stepped in and said that at the very moment the judicial lease terminated the tenant became clothed with all the powers and authorities of a future tenant; and it was there that he thought it right to step in and present to the Committee nakedly and clearly what it was that they were asked to decide in this clause. What was the meaning of saying that the lessee would be deemed to be the tenant of a future ordinary tenancy? Did the Government mean to suggest that that was exactly the same position as if the landlord of an ordinary lease, on its expiration, had permitted the tenant to continue in occupation, had accepted rent from him, and had so accepted him as a tenant from year to year? If they did mean that, why did not the Government put it in the clause? As a matter of fact, they must mean something more, because they had, in the preceding part of their Bill, given to future tenants certain rights entirely independent of a tenant holding on at the expiration of a lease. For instance, under sub-section 2 of Clause 3, the tenant of a future lease, if asked by his landlord to pay an increased rent, had a right to sell his tenancy, and to compel the landlord then to pay the amount of difference that the Court would hold was lost in the purchase money by the fact of a rise of rent being asked in excess of what the Court would hold was a fair rent. The tenant would have the right of free sale, and it might be that they would compel the landlord by these words, instead of having an absolute right to resume possession on the termination of a lease, to admit that the very day the lease terminated a future tenancy was created. They would compel the landlord, if he wanted to get possession, to serve a notice to quit. They would, therefore, compel the landlord, by the words which the Government now said meant nothing—[Mr. GLADSTONE: I never said so]—it had been suggested by silences and by gestures, which were sometimes liable to be misinterpreted; but, no doubt, he had made a mistake, as his statement had not been accepted. But, at any rate, as he had understood it, it was suggested by several speakers that these words in the second paragraph of the 9th section really said, in reference to a lessee on the termination of a judicial lease, that he was to be in exactly the same position as a lessee on the termination of an ordinary lease. He (Mr. Gibson) ventured to say that that was not a fair way in which to treat the landlord. The Prime Minister said that nothing could be more absurd than to say that this Bill contained anything in the nature of perpetuity of tenure; and, unless he was very much mistaken, the right hon. Gentleman had said that it was an abuse of language to use any such phrase in connection with the Bill. Well, he (Mr. Gibson) spoke with entire sincerity, and with great respect for the opinion of the Prime Minister on a question of this kind; but, really, with some misgiving, he must venture to say that, although he might lay himself open to the same charge from the Prime Minister of being absurd, he had arrived at the conclusion that, though not avowed and put in terms, there was actual, real, and substantial perpetuity of tenure in this Bill. He was not going into any other clause of the Bill except for the purpose of illustration; but if a tenant from year to year expanded to a statutory 15 years' tenancy, and then at the end of 15 years he could expand that tenancy into another 15 years, he called that, if not perpetuity of tenure, at any rate, the best imitation of perpetuity of tenure that he had ever heard of. The Court could, with the sanction of the parties, give a judicial tenancy for 31 years as a minimum, and might go up to 500 years, or even 1,000 years. Few of them would really speculate as to how long the world was likely to last; but if a lease was granted for 300 or 400 years, or for 1,000 years, it was a tolerably substantial instalment towards perpetuity. But take it that it stopped short of that, the tenant could have the holding for 31 years, and that was the minimum. He asked in what time on the expiration of a lease had a landlord the shadow of a ghost of a chance of resuming possession? He could not do it, because they did not give him the power. They said a tenant at the end of the lease was a future tenant, and they clothed the tenant with the character and fixed conditions under which the landlord could not resume possession. ["No, no!"] Yes, that was the case. The landlord could not get back possession, except under conditions where he would have to buy over again the fee-simple of the tenancy. Was that giving the landlord any power whatever of resuming possession? To deny that the Bill gave perpetuity of tenure was the merest play upon words. He called it perpetuity from the landlord's point of view. No matter how the tenancy might change, or what machinery might be contained in the Bill with regard to change or sale, there could be no doubt that the proposal of the Government involved perpetuity of tenure as against the landlord, who could not, under any circumstances, resume possession of the holdings. The proposal contained in the clause certainly, in his mind, involved perpetuity of possession as against the landlord; and he ventured to say that the proposition could not be gainsaid, or even qualified. It had been his (Mr. Gibson's) good fortune to hear almost all of the speeches which had been made by the Prime Minister on this Bill, and he had endeavoured to derive all the instruction and information that was possible from them. The Prime Minister had addressed the Committee that afternoon, with his usual force and eloquence, to this particular branch of the matter before the Committee, and had endeavoured to show that it was an abuse of language to suggest the idea that the Bill intended or was framed to procure perpetuity of tenure; but in doing that the Prime Minister looked at the question only from one point of view, and absolutely ignored every other. The right hon. Gentleman said it was an abuse of language to say that the Bill involved perpetuity of tenure, because in certain conditions one tenant might be compelled to sell his interest to another tenant; but he ignored the fact that all this might be mere by-play on the part of the tenant, and that it did not bring the landlord one whit nearer the possibility of resuming possession of his estate. The tenant in possession, or the one who might succeed him, had in his hands perpetuity of tenure as against the landlord, in that the landlord could not resume possession, but could only under certain conditions compel his tenant to transfer the tenancy to someone else, which would not bring him an atom nearer to the re-possession of his estate. He would remind the right hon. Gentleman that on the previous evening he had been prevented, by a ruling from the Chair which was defended by the hon. and learned Solicitor General in a well-considered speech, from raising this question on Clause 7, and he was now dealing only with the particular clause under discussion. He did not wish to go back upon Clause 7, except for purposes of illustration as far as his present argument was concerned. The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech that day, denied that the Bill contained the principle of perpetuity of tenure—in saying that he (Mr. Gibson) ventured to urge that he was not misrepresenting what the right hon. Gentleman said—but asked why there was not perpetuity of tenure? He would give an answer to this which he thought no one who had considered what occurred on the previous evening would gainsay.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL, rising to Order, said, he wished to ask whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman was discussing the Amendment now before the Committee or one in Clause 7—a matter which had been disposed of at the Morning Sitting?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) was certainly illustrating his argument very fully by references to what had taken place in the course of the previous Sitting.

MR. GIBSON said, his complaint was that the perpetuity of tenure, which in his view the Bill certainly involved, was disguised instead of being thoroughly and frankly avowed. He supposed this was due to the fact that in the year 1870 the highest authority in the House laid down the proposition, and supported it by the most persuasive reasoning, that if perpetuity of tenure was granted as against the Irish landlords they would have an absolute claim to compensation. It was in order to avoid——

MR. GLADSTONE rose to Order, and said that the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had been speaking for nearly 20 minutes, and had said no single word on the subject of the Amendment before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that, as far as he could gather, the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) had certainly addressed his observations much more to Clause 7, and the arguments which were used in support of it, than to the Amendment immediately before the Committee.

MR. GIBSON said, the clauses were absolutely connected together. He did not wish to refer to the speech which the Prime Minister had made in the course of that day, further than to say that the right hon. Gentleman had committed himself to the opinion that the Bill was free from the charge of giving perpetuity of tenure. He had endeavoured to show that this clause in its 2nd paragraph, instead of giving to the landlords a right to resume possession of the holdings which they had let, so hampered the landlords as to imperil, if not altogether to prevent, their right or power to resume possession. He was, therefore, asking why the Government, instead of frankly, plainly, and directly giving perpetuity of tenure, were doing that particular thing in a round-about, involved, and disguised way, so as to obscure the landlord's right to compensation? The object of his Amendment was to bring into perfect clearness the landlord's position. This was a perfectly clear proposition which, if denied by the Government, made it clear to his mind that there was something, at all events, very like perpetuity of tenure to be granted under this Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he thought his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) had been labouring under some delusion in respect to this clause, or that his brain was oppressed by the weight of arguments which he had intended to bring forward on a previous occasion. To contend that the clause practically conferred or involved perpetuity of tenure, disguised in some marvellous way, required a considerable amount of courage, and that courage had, he must admit, been displayed by his right hon. and learned Friend on the present occasion. His right hon. and learned Friend had told the Committee that the Court might give leases for 30 years, 100 years, or even 500 or 1,000 years, as against the landlords, the fact being that the Court could give nothing, but that the landlord could give what he pleased in agreement with his tenants. To talk of what the Court could give, as against the landlords, was, therefore, only misleading the Committee. If his right hon. and learned Friend would look at the last paragraph of the clause, he would find that a tenant, at the determination of his lease, became the ordinary tenant of a future tenancy. His right hon. and learned Friend then went on to ask how the landlord was to regain possession of his property, and to urge that he might be deluded by a series of mock ejectments—in short, he had mixed up the clause now before the Committee with the one which preceded and the one which was to follow it, without any over scrupulous reference to the matter with which the Committee was now asked to deal. But, after all, what did the whole of this come to? Everyone who knew anything of Irish agricultural life knew that a lease only meant a settlement of the amount of rent for a certain number of years; and that, although according to the letter of the lease, the landlord, at its termination, was to get back possession of the holding, still, according to the almost universal custom, the landlord, instead of resuming possession, had a revision of the rent, and on the revised scale the tenant retained possession. A judicial lease, as proposed by the Bill, was a pure matter of agreement, to which the landlord was not compelled to assent if he thought the terms proposed to him were unjust. His right hon. and learned Friend had suggested that the clause would not be used in many cases. This might, or might not, happen; but, in any case, it was clear that the landlords were not bound to grant leases on terms which they thought would be unfair to themselves. He could see no injustice in a proposal which, in accordance with the Irish custom, allowed tenants, on the expiration of their leases, to retain possession of their holdings, subject to a revision of rent. No one could suppose that a man would take a 31 years' lease of his holding if he was liable to be turned out of it on the day following the completion of his term. If the tenants were expected to accept these leases, they must be presented to them in a form likely to be acceptable.

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOT said, there were two points which seemed to arise out of this Amendment. The first was, whether, at the end of a lease which, in Scotland, was, as a rule, 19 years, and in England far less, the landlord was or was not to resume possession of his holding? The value of an estate in Ireland was from 22 to 25 years' purchase, yet it was proposed to give leases for 31 years; and he asked whether it was fair that, in such circumstances, the landlords should not have a perfect right to resume possession of their properties? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland said that course would have the effect of being contrary to all Irish opinion. The second point was that which had been raised by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), which was whether a future tenant would have a right to a statutory term in the event of his rent being raised?

Mr. Gibson

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, it was an essential feature of the Bill, as set forth in Clause 3, that the future tenants were not entitled to go to the Court in order to have a rent judicially fixed, or procure a statutory term. It was only the present tenant who had those privileges.

MR. SYNAN said, the mistake into which the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) had fallen was in confounding the "future tenant" with the "future ordinary tenant," the different phrases being used in different clauses of the Bill. He should be glad to see the word "ordinary" struck out of the clause; but unless that was done, there must remain a marked distinction between tenants under this and under the 3rd clause.

MR. MULHOLLAND said, he would admit that, according to the Irish custom, it was not usual for tenants to give up their holdings at the expiration of their leases, but to go on after there had been a re-valuation and a re-adjustment of the rent; but, on that point, he thought there was somewhat of ambiguity in the clause, as it stood in the Bill, in relation to the meaning of the words "a future tenant."

MR. GLADSTONE said, they on that Bench had not been arguing about the clause as it stood, but as to the Amendment which had been proposed. When that had been disposed of, they would consider what should be the ultimate form of the clause, bearing in mind the importance of several of the suggestions which had been made.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he hoped the Amendment would be disposed of forthwith, in order that they might get at the substance of the clause which the Prime Minister said had yet to be reached.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he had altered his Amendment as it stood on the Paper. Hon. Members would see that, as it had first stood, it applied to all cases in which a judicial lease was agreed to between a landlord and tenant, without making any distinction between the case where a judicial lease was accepted by a present tenant or a future tenant. The object of the Amendment was to make a distinction between those two cases. He said "the Amendment," but there were really two Amendments—although the first was only formal and rendered necessary to make the other intelligible. Possibly, the second Amendment would, in the eyes of many hon. Members opposite, raise a very important question. The question was one that must be raised and dealt with by the Committee, if justice was to be done. There were two classes of cases—first, those where the future tenant, so-called, had had no previous relations with the occupancy or contact with the landlord, as in the case where a previous tenancy was determined, and a future tenant came in fresh, as referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), where a landlord let out some of his demesne lands. The distinction drawn in the Bill between future and ordinary present tenants—although he agreed that there probably ought to be some distinction—was too sharp; and he therefore trusted that that sharpness, which would cause inconvenience, would be avoided. But, for the moment, he did not wish to deal with that. He wished to deal with the case of the man who was a present tenant of the land, and who agreed with his landlord to take a judicial lease—that was, a lease which received the sanction of the Court. The Bill, unless amended as he proposed, said that the present tenant—such at the time of the acceptance of the judicial lease—was, by reason of his acceptance of the judicial lease, altogether to lose at the expiration of the lease the character and advantages given to a present tenant. If this were to be the case, they would get no people to accept these judicial leases. The Government ought to be consistent, and, after the course they had taken yesterday with regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), they should accept his (Mr. Charles Russell's) proposal. The hon. Member's (Mr. Balfour's) Amendment was to the effect that the statutory term should come to an end at the end of the second statutory term—in other words, the statutory term for the purpose of his Amendment should be two terms of 15 years, equal to 30 years. The Government, desiring to see this an efficient Bill, resisted that Amendment. But, having resisted the Amendment, which sought to fix 30 years as the limit at the end of which time a tenant was to cease to be a present tenant, in the sense of having the benefit of any application which he might make for a statutory term, it seemed to him that the Government must accept his Amendment as giving effect to the action they had already taken. In the case of the Ulster tenants there was an express provision that at the end of their leases they should have the benefit he wished to give to tenants under judicial leases.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, at end of Clause, add—"Provided always, That, at the expiration of such lease either the landlord or the tenant shall be at liberty to apply to the Court to fix the rent, and thereupon the Court shall make such order as, in view of all the circumstances of the case, shall seem to be just."—(Mr Charles Russell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. W. H. SMITH: I certainly think the time has come when the Prime Minister ought to give us some statement as to the views of the Government on the subject of this clause. It appears to me that if the words of this clause are adopted, the occupier under a judicial lease will be in a position of having agreed with the landlord for that which will enable him to say—"I am now entitled to compensation for disturbance if, at the end of this judicial lease, you do not agree with me either for a new tenancy or a new lease." This, in reality, transfers to the occupier so much of the property of the landlord as is expressed by the compensation to be given to him, and enables the occupier to say to the landlord—"Make terms with me, or I will place you under this fine." The landlord will say—"It is true I have agreed with you for a judicial lease." Well, I suppose he may not have agreed, because a judicial lease is different from any other document which, in the past, has been looked upon as a lease. Hitherto it has always been understood that at the end of the lease the property reverts to him who granted it; but it is not to be so in this case. The tenant is to enjoy his occupation for 31 years; and the landlord, at the end of that period, is to be subject to a fine, if an arrangement is not come to which is satisfactory to the leaseholder. That is a real transfer of property from the one to the other. If they are to negotiate a new lease, the tenant says to the landlord—

"Here is my right to seven years' rent, in the case of a £30 tenancy; five years' rent, in the case of a £50 tenancy." And in that way he extracts from the landlord—who does not wish to be subject to a fine—an arrangement. That can hardly be the intention of the Government. It is not just. It places the tenant at the end of a lease in a better position than he was at the beginning of the tenancy. The landlord may have fulfilled all his engagements; and it cannot be the intention of the Government that at the end of the lease he should be in a worse position than at the beginning.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith), I am afraid, has not gathered the effect of the clause. The right hon. Gentleman is under the impression that the tenant will be invested with a kind of indefeasible tenancy, which it will rest with him to retain, which he has a right to retain, and on account of which, if he is not allowed to retain it, he may demand from the landlord compensation. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he is entirely incorrect. The tenant may continue in the tenancy under the terms of the lease, and, if he demands any modification of those terms, the only mode of enforcing it will be by quitting the tenancy; and, if he does that, the only privilege accruing to him will be the privilege of selling his interest. That will be the position of the future tenant at the expiration of the lease under this clause.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Then I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that a lease for 31 years becomes a lease practically for ever, according to the terms and conditions of the lease. ["No, no!"] Well, at the expiration of the judicial lease, the lessee is to be deemed to be the tenant of the future ordinary tenancy from year to year at the rent and subject to the conditions of the lease, and he can only be turned out—that is to say, the landlord can only resume possession—under the penalties contained in the Bill; in other words, by giving compensation for disturbance. Under the Act of 1870 these leases were subject to the conditions of all leases, and at the end of them the landlord could resume possession, or a new arrangement was come to by the parties. There was no idea of compensation for disturbance at the end of the lease.

Mr. Charles Russell

But, for the moment, he did not wish to deal with that. He wished to deal with the case of the man who was a present tenant of the land, and who agreed with his landlord to take a judicial lease—that was, a lease which received the sanction of the Court. The Bill, unless amended as he proposed, said that the present tenant—such at the time of the acceptance of the judicial lease—was, by reason of his acceptance of the judicial lease, altogether to lose at the expiration of the lease the character and advantages given to a present tenant. If this were to be the case, they would get no people to accept these judicial leases. The Government ought to be consistent, and, after the course they had taken yesterday with regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), they should accept his (Mr. Charles Russell's) proposal. The hon. Member's (Mr. Balfour's) Amendment was to the effect that the statutory term should come to an end at the end of the second statutory term—in other words, the statutory term for the purpose of his Amendment should be two terms of 15 years, equal to 30 years. The Government, desiring to see this an efficient Bill, resisted that Amendment. But, having resisted the Amendment, which sought to fix 30 years as the limit would say something as to the view the Government took. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had not done so. It appeared to him (Lord Randolph Churchill) that if they accepted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), they would be altogether departing from the plan they had in view when they inserted these judicial leases in the Bill. He had tried to point out before dinner, but had not been successful in his endeavour to attract the attention of the Government, that the Amendment they had accepted to the 8th clause seriously interfered with their plan. They had cut out that which was part and parcel of their plan. If the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk was accepted, judicial leases would be wholly worthless. He wished to embarrass the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member from the consideration raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith). He could not understand the contention of that right hon. Member that any part of this subsection, as it stood, conferred perpetuity of tenure. It appeared to him to be nothing more nor less than what would be the existing law with the modification that the tenant at the end of the lease could be put out on an ejectment. By this clause he became ipso facto a yearly tenant, and would have to be put out by a notice to quit. But a future tenant at the end of a lease was as unprotected from eviction as any tenant in Ireland. And, more than that, the future tenant at the end of a judicial lease was debarred from claiming compensation for disturbance under the Act of 1870. He could not imagine that that point would be pressed by his right hon. Friend so as to embarrass the Committee in deciding the point raised by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. He attached great importance to this question of granting judicial leases, and he thought it distinctly in the interests of the landlords. The advantages were these—the landlord would be saved from hostile litigation on the part of the tenant, who would be bound by the conditions of his lease. There would be many landlords who would say—“We do not want to be bothered by going to the Court; we will give them judicial leases for 31 years, that will last our lifetime, and when our heirs follow us they will have to make their own arrangements with the tenants on the basis of free contract.” But if they made a tenancy at the end of a judicial lease of a present tenant, they would destroy any advantage that could be got in this way, because the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk wished to put judicial leases on the same basis as leases executed before the passing of the Act. The hon. and learned Member appeared to forget that a tenant under a judicial lease used all the rights that the Act would confer upon him. He had great advantages. He obtained security for two statutory terms; the landlord had no right of pre-emption at the end of the second statutory term, and he could not raise the rent. It was said that no tenant would take a judicial lease. Certainly he would not if they accepted the Amendment. As the Bill stood, under certain circumstances, the tenant would have no option but to accept a judicial lease.

MR. GLADSTONE: I would point out to the Committee that the Court would still be enabled to judge, under the 8th clause, whether a refusal to give a lease is or is not unreasonable. Upon what principle is the Court to proceed in order to judge this question? It would ask the tenant to show whether it was or was not to his interest to accept a lease; and if we pass this clause we must take care that the interests of the two parties are so balanced that there can be no reason why, if the landlord offers a lease and sees his interest in offering it—because, of course, he cannot be compelled in the matter—the tenant should not have a reasonable interest or inducement to accept it. As the clause stands, I confess that I am bound to say it is not drafted so as to meet all the merits of the case. The clause as it stands is applicable both to present tenants and to persons who are not present tenants; but the general effect is to give somewhat less than is due to present tenants and somewhat more than is due to persons who are not present tenants. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) will, I think, find his horror at the clause considerably diminished if he bears in mind that our intention really is this—the future tenant shall fare

MR. GIVAN said, the matter was one of considerable gravity. They should be able to carry with them on this clause—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the Committee that the discussion is going very much on the whole clause, instead of on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell).

MR. GIVAN said, it was on the Amendment that he was about to speak. It was important that they should carry with them the sense and judgment of those who were inclined to agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gibson), who had a facility for putting matters in such a way as to carry many people away with him. In order that the Committee might understand the position of the tenant under the judicial lease it was necessary that the Committee should consider what was the present position of the tenant from year to year. The right hon. Gentleman had asked what was the position of a tenant under an existing lease? Well, they would see in a moment whether the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) was reasonable or not, when they considered what was the position of the tenant under the existing lease. The tenant, under the existing lease in the Province of Ulster, was entitled to tenant right at the end of that lease, because the lease, in most cases, had been proved to be a mere interregnum in the tenancy; consequently, at the end of the lease, all the incidence of the tenancy returned, and the tenant became entitled to all the rights and privileges he enjoyed previous to the date of the lease. Then, what was the position of the lessee outside the Ulster Custom? Under the 4th clause of the Act of 1870, he was entitled to his improvements. Now, if the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had been carried, or if the tenancy was to be a future tenancy under the Act, not only would the tenant not have the privileges of the Ulster tenant under the 4th clause of the Act of 1870, but he would be turned out of his improvements and altogether deprived of his holding. Therefore, it was clear with regard to future tenancies created after the passing of the Act, where there had been a pre-contract between the landlord and tenant, and where he had no existing interest in the land, the true principle to adopt, and the principle which the Bill enforced was this—that the tenant should, at the determination of the lease, become a future tenant; but if the tenant had at the commencement of the judicial lease an interest in the land as a tenant from year to year, then why should he be deprived of the tenancy by accepting a judicial lease? Unless the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) were accepted a tenant now accepting a judicial lease would be put in the position in which no tenant ever was before. He would neither be a tenant under the Ulster Custom, nor entitled to full compensation for disturbance under the Act of 1870.

MR. GIBSON wanted to ask a question of the Government. As he understood the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), it was this. He proposed to leave the drafting of the second paragraph of the clause as it stood, and then to say that as to certain tenants who might have been present tenants at the commencement of a judicial lease, they should maintain their status as tenants at the expiration of the judicial lease. If the hon. and learned Member would look at the earlier words of the clause, he would find that it was not at all general—it did not purport to give power to all tenants coming under the Act to obtain a judicial lease. It was limited to two very specific classes—first, the landlord and tenant of an ordinary tenancy; and then, the landlord and tenant of any holding to which the Act applied which was not subject to a subsisting tenancy. That was all. He could not exactly reconcile the Amendment with the glossary. He asked for information—whether the clause contemplated, in its rather peculiar phraseology, that the present tenant could at all have entered into a judicial lease?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the first sentence of the clause expressly included both present and future tenancies.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to know what they were going to do with regard to this Amendment? When the Prime Minister rose, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) had hoped that he drafting, he thought he could easily accommodate his Amendment to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister. He was, however, willing to leave the necessary Amendment conceded by the Government to be dealt with by the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood the Prime Minister's proposal to be that the present tenant should not be altogether thrown on one side at the expiration of the lease. He quite approved of that proposal, and thought it quite wrong that the present tenant should be so sacrificed, though he did not so much care for the future tenant.

MR. MACARTNEY pointed out that the present practice in the North of Ireland was, as a matter of custom or of law, that upon the expiration of the lease the tenant should continue as a tenant from year to year until he was disturbed; but he had no right to remain on if the landlord gave him notice to quit. The right which belonged to him was the tenant right, which he was able to dispose of to another tenant who wanted to come in, or to the landlord who might wish to purchase. He (Mr. Macartney) thought he had understood the Prime Minister to say that the future tenant, after the judicial lease had expired, though he would not be subject to the conditions of the Act in regard to other matters, would have a right to sell his holding. Had he correctly understood the right hon. Gentleman?

MR. GLADSTONE: What I said was that, as the clause now stands, it is too much to place him in a better position. There is no reason when a man gets a judicial lease why he should, at the expiration of that lease, be in a better position than another future tenant, and the landlord would fix the initial rent. We propose, therefore, to leave the main subject to the general operation of the law.

MR. MACARTNEY wished to know whether the tenant, at the end of his judicial lease, was to have the right which the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. C. Russell) would give him, and which would place him in as good a position as the tenant who had had two successive statutory terms, and was entitled to a third? He did not know whether the Bill intended to give that power, even to the present tenant.

Question proposed, "That the word 'ordinary' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think any inconvenience would arise from the retention of the word "ordinary;" because at the close of the statutory term the tenancy would become an ordinary one.

Question put, and agreed to.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL moved, in page 9, line 26, the omission of the word "tenancy," in order to insert the word "holding."

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 26, to leave out the word "tenancy," in order to substitute the word "holding."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'tenancy' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) trusted that the Committee would allow the word "tenancy" to stand, for it had been deliberately determined before that the word "tenancy" should be used when the interest of the tenant was spoken of.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL pointed out that the definition of "tenancy," as given in the Interpretation Clause, was "the tenant's interest in a holding." But the words in this part of the clause were governed by the word "landlord." Now, there could not be a

subsequently like any future tenant, so that he will come in at the end of his judicial lease like any other third party. But I admit that, as the law stands, he gets more, because he gets a lease; whereas, if he came in as a future tenant, the landlord would be entitled, when he had separated his holdings into several parts, to fix upon whatever initial rent he pleased; whereas, those who are not present tenants may be willing to take leases under favourable conditions, yet we may release the landlord from all special restraints at the termination of the lease, and allow him to deal with respect to the initial rent just as he would if there had been no judicial rent at all. It is not to be doubted that it is the result of general testimony with regard to opinion and practice in Ireland that the reputation of leases is at this moment not good in Ireland. There is an ill savour about them in the nostrils of the Irish tenant generally, and he will be very cautious indeed about taking a judicial lease, and the Court will certainly not consider his refusal to take a judicial lease as an unreasonable refusal, unless it can be shown on the face of the lease that the conditions of that judicial lease are constructed upon the principles of a fair balance, giving him an equivalent for his rent. Therefore I believe that, as regards tenants, the foundation of sound legislation with regard to this matter of judicial leases will depend upon our drawing a distinction, in the first instance, between persons who are not present tenants at the outset of the lease, and persons who are. As regards persons who are not present tenants at the outset, I believe their case will be quite provided for, and the Court will have the utmost discretion and jurisdiction in regard to them, if we drop the words in the second portion of the clause. But then there is the question of those who are present tenants. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. C. Russell) proposes to provide a declaration that, whatever the length of the lease may be, at its termination the tenancy should be a present tenancy. We are rather disposed, I think, to meet my hon. and learned Friend half way, and to say that there are cases in which, where leases of great length are given, we think it might fairly be expected that, in compensation for such security, the tenant should give up the advantage of being a present tenant at the expiration of the lease. For the sake of argument, I may refer to the amicable conversation we have had to-night upon the Longfield Lease, which, it appears, is a lease for 500 years. I confess I do not see any necessity for providing that, at the termination of a Longfield Lease in the year 2381, the holder of that lease shall be a present tenant. But what my hon. and learned Friend evidently has in view is the currency of leases such as are usually given in Ireland upon agricultural holdings. We have taken that here as 31 years. What I think we might do is that we might accept the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend with regard to all judicial leases which do not extend beyond a certain term of years; but we must place that term of years sensibly higher than 31 years, or, if the practice of 31-year leases were adopted under this clause, it would be entirely inoperative if we adopt the provision of my hon. and learned Friend. If we are to have judicial leases at all, we must make it reasonably worth the while of the tenant to accept them, or the Court would never give them. I think we may say that if the currency of the lease does not extend to 60 years or upwards, we shall, in all those cases, accept the Amendment, and that would fairly strike the balance between the various interests involved.

MR. GIBSON could not see how the suggestion of the Prime Minister could be worked in with the Amendment now before the Committee. He thought the Amendment ought to be withdrawn for the present, and then it could be brought up again subsequently in an altered form. The hon. and learned Member (Mr. C. Russell) seemed to think it reasonable that the present tenant should be dealt with in an entirely exceptional way, and that he should be reinstated at the expiration of his lease as a present tenant. He (Mr. Gibson) thought, however, that the best thing to do would be to leave the question to be dealt with on Report, when he was sure his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland would present the matter in a way which they could all understand.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he would be quite willing to do whatever was reasonable; but, as a matter of drafting, he thought he could easily accommodate his Amendment to the suggestion made by the Prime Minister. He was, however, willing to leave the necessary Amendment conceded by the Government to be dealt with by the Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Law).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL understood the Prime Minister's proposal to be that the present tenant should not be altogether thrown on one side at the expiration of the lease. Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 26, to leave out the word "tenancy," in order to substitute the word "holding."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'tenancy' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) trusted that the Committee would allow the word "tenancy" to stand, for it had been deliberately determined before that the word "tenancy" should be used when the interest of the tenant was spoken of.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL pointed out that the definition of "tenancy," as given in the Interpretation Clause, was "the tenant's interest in a holding." But the words in this part of the clause were governed by the word "landlord." Now, there could not be a landlord of an interest—he must be the landlord of a holding.

MR. WARTON thought there was a great deal of force in the observations of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). The fact was they were rapidly drifting away from all the definitions given in the Interpretation Clause. They had just omitted the word “ordinary,” without considering what an “ordinary tenant” meant; and now they were going to do worse, by leaving the word “tenancy” where it should be “holding.”

Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

MR. GREGORY wished to make an inquiry on behalf of an individual who had been ignored throughout the Bill—he meant the mortgagee upon Irish estates. The Bill, as he understood it, enabled any landlord and tenant to enter into any contract to convert any holding into a fee-farm rent. All he asked was that the mortgagee should have an opportunity of being heard when the landlord and tenant proceeded to any such conversion, and that it should not be done behind the mortgagee’s back. He asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to consider the question before they came to the Report. If some protection were not given, the only result would be that all securities on Irish property would be called in, or otherwise the interest of the mortgagee might be completely annihilated behind his back.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS hoped an assurance would be given in accordance with the proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. Gregory).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he certainly would consider the question; but he wished to point out that the 18th clause would deal with limited owners.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 11 (Conditions of fixed tenancy).

MR. GREGORY moved to insert, after the word “tenancy,” in page 9, line 34, these words—

“And as in the case of a landlord who is a limited owner, as defined by the 26th section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, the Court shall approve, after considering the interest of all persons entitled to any estate or interest in the holding, subsequent to the estate or interest of such limited owner.”

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR (for Mr. HEALY) moved as an Amendment in page 9, line 38, to leave out “and,” and insert—

“Provided that in case of the re-valuation by the Court under this section of any such fee-farm rent, such valuation shall be conducted on the principles prescribed for fixing a fair rent under the seventh section of this Act.”

He presumed the Government would accept this Amendment, and therefore it was not necessary for him to occupy time by supporting it with argument.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he did not see how a fee-farm rent could be dealt with on the same principle as an ordinary rent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the principle of the Amendment was unobjectionable; but perhaps the hon. Member for Wexford would allow it to stand over until Report, for it would require some consideration on the point of drafting.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, a fee-farm rent might or might not be subject to re-valuation, as might be agreed upon between landlord and tenant; and, surely, the conditions of re-valuation would be matter of agreement.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, if the words “by the Court” were left out of the Amendment, that would meet the objection.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that there was no objection to the Amendment. As he understood the Bill, it simply meant that the re-valuation should take place in accordance with the provisions of the Act. But, seeing that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had agreed to the principle of the Amendment, and had undertaken on Report to bring in such words as would carry out the idea of the Amendment, he begged leave now to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ERRINGTON said, he had an Amendment to move on a subject that excited much interest in Ireland. This question of fixity of tenure, which the Committee were discussing, was really considered the most important and most useful portion of the whole measure. His proposal was to omit the word "and" in line 38, and insert these words—

"Which rent, or any part thereof, he shall be at liberty to redeem at any time of such term, subject to such regulations as the Court shall deem fair to both parties."

This was to facilitate the purchase of an increase of the tenant's interest. The importance of the provision in the clause for the purchase of the land by the tenant was agreed, but few tenants would be able to avail themselves of it to the full extent, and he was anxious that they should be enabled to acquire it by a gradual process. It would be a great inducement to offer to the tenant this means of fining down the amount of his rent, and by the gradual increase of the tenant's interest in his farm the tenant's security would be increased and the general tranquillity promoted. The words he proposed to introduce would safeguard the interest of the landlord, for the Court would make the regulations and lay down the terms on which the fining down should take place, and the means by which the money should be paid, and probably there would be no difficulty in the Court making arrangements for the investment of the money if this course were determined upon.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 38, to omit the word "and," and insert "which rent, or any part thereof, he shall be at liberty to redeem at any time of such term, subject to such regulations as the Court shall deem fair to both parties."—(Mr. Errington.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'and' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought there was a great deal of force in the object of his hon. Friend (Mr. Errington) up to this point, that when the landlord had become a rent-charger, and was no longer in the true sense a landlord, there should be arrangements for this rent-charge being redeemed. But this was a matter for the Court. He did not wish to insert more than the conditions to bring in the action of the Court, and it would be better to leave the matter until the action of the Court was reached.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, a fee-farm rent could not be so fined down.

Mr. Errington

MR. ERRINGTON said, he did not wish to press the Amendment. He only hoped that the principle was in the Bill as it now stood.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would formally move an Amendment, of which his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had given Notice, though he did not think that, as the law stood, it was necessary.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, at end of Clause, to add new sub-section 3—"A fixed tenancy shall be created by deed executed, or note in writing, signed by the landlord or his agent thereunto, lawfully authorized in writing."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the object proposed to be carried out by the Amendment was the existing practice under the ordinary law. It was desirable that there should be a formal document.

MR. BIGGAR, seeing that the right hon. and learned Gentleman shared the opinion which he held himself, would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

PART IV.

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTAL TO PRECEDING PARTS.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 12 (Sale of tenancy without notice of increase of rent).

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked, did the Government intend to proceed further? He had an Amendment of importance on the Paper; but it seemed to him that the clause had really been practically dealt with by the sub-section in Clause 3. Perhaps the Government did not intend to proceed with it; but if they did, he should move in page 10, line 7, after "tenancy," to insert "under the provisions of this Act and."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would agree that this was a convenient point to report Progress. He did not think the Government wished to retain the clause, and he did not think they could have a better stopping place for the night. The Committee had made considerable progress, and it would be pressing them unduly hard to proceed further. He would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Lord Randolph Churchill.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH hoped there would be some information as to whether the clause was to stand; it would be very inconvenient for hon. Members not to know.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he had a Notice to omit the clause, and it would be satisfactory to know if the Government intended to persevere with it or not.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he did not wish the Committee to go beyond this clause.

MR. GIBSON said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not quite apprehend what had been said. In consequence of the Amendments already made in the Bill, the Government would probably see that all the topics dealt with in the clause had been disposed of; but if they proceeded with the clause at all, it must lead to long discussion, and, it was obvious, could not be disposed of to-night.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it was not reasonable to ask what the Government intended to do on the Motion to report Progress.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, if the Government did not intend to press the clause, he would withdraw his Motion; but he would decline to do so if the Government retained the clause, in view of the fact that it must lead to a long discussion and the House met at 12 to-morrow.

MR. CHAPLIN suggested that the Government should allow Progress to be reported, and then say if they intended to retain the clause. It would be a matter of convenience to all.

MR. BIGGAR thought it was unreasonable to ask right hon. Gentlemen opposite to make up their minds as to striking out the clause in the absence of the Prime Minister, who had charge of the Bill; but, at the same time, it would be unreasonable to ask the Committee to sit later in view of the early Sitting next day.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would consent to Progress being reported; but he must consult with his right hon. Friend as to the clause.

MR. WARTON wished to make two suggestions—one was, that the amended clauses should be reprinted as far as the Committee had gone; and the other was, that as the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had promised to consider an immense number of points on Report, a list of these should be printed and added to from time to time, to give some notion of the proposals that were to come.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

[BILL 100.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short title; extent; interpretation).

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 26, after "1866," to insert "Provincial Law Societies or Associations" means all bodies of solicitors in England incorporated by Royal Charter, or under the Joint Stock Companies Act, other than the Incorporated Law Society above mentioned."—(Sir John Holker.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked what was the position of those bodies of solicitors incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies Act?

SIR JOHN HOLKER said, he could not give the information. The Amendment was proposed by the Provincial Law Societies; they were anxious to have it inserted, and he had got them to draw it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if necessary, it might be amended on Report. He did not quite know to what it referred.

Question put, and agreed to; words inserted accordingly.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 (Power to make General Orders for remuneration in conveyancing, &c.).

On the Motion of Sir JOHN HOLKER, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 4, after “Society,” to insert—

“And the President of one of the Provincial Law Societies or Associations to be selected and nominated from time to time by the Lord Chancellor to serve during the tenure of office of such President.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 3 and 4 severally agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 5 (Security for costs, and interest on disbursements).

On the Motion of Sir JOHN HOLKER, the following Amendment made:—In page 3, line 15, leave out “on money disbursed by a solicitor for his client.”

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Remaining clauses agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT—ORDERS OF THE DAY —ENTRIES ON NOTICE PAPER.

MR. WARTON asked how it was that the Bills printed in the Orders of the Day were, in the first instance, a long list subject to alterations consequent on the Morning Sitting; and then in the evening a much shorter list was furnished?

MR. SPEAKER: At the early Sitting of the House the House ordered the consideration of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill in Committee to be carried forward. That was done on the Order of the House.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

PART IV.

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTAL TO PRECEDING PARTS.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 12 (Sale of tenancy without notice of increase of rent).

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 7, after “tenancy,” insert “under the provisions of the Act, and.” — (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, Progress was reported last night in some uncertainty as to whether the Government intended to keep this clause in the Bill or not, in view of its action upon the sub-section of a former clause. He could not say that he understood exactly what course the Government really proposed to take, because the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had an Amendment on the Paper which raised a very important question; and, in the absence of the right hon. Baronet, he should certainly take the liberty of proposing it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment referred to by the noble Lord is the one I have just put from the Chair. He will find it given upon page 2 of the Orders of the Day.

MR. MACFARLANE said, the first Amendment on the Paper stood in the name of the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Lalor).

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment moved by the right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) was still under discussion when Progress was reported last night; and, according to the usual practice, it has again been submitted to the Committee. The Question is, "That the words moved by the right hon. Gentleman be here inserted."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL hoped that the Government would give the Committee some explanation of the meaning of the clause.

MR. GLADSTONE: The purpose of the clause is a very narrow one. It is intended—I do not at all dissemble—to meet the case of something like fraud or trickery on the part of the landlord. At present there is a possibility of such a thing happening in the case of an unprincipled landlord, who, after the arrangements between the incoming man and the outgoing tenant have been completed, and the money paid, should, before accepting the incoming tenant, intimate his intention of requiring a rise of rent. It is a nice matter, perhaps, to deal with; but we are of opinion that the landlord should be under the same liabilities to the tenant in regard to fair dealing that the tenant is under to the landlord, and that there should be a clear understanding upon the subject.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had hoped that after what passed last night the Government would have announced this morning that they were going to drop the clause. It seemed to him a very complicated clause, and the complications of the Bill were such that it was advisable to lighten the ship as much as possible. He confessed that he had never been fully able to understand the object of the clause; and the statement which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had just made gave it a much narrower scope than before. He had understood that it was intended to guard against a kind of fraud on the part of the landlord in raising the rent between the sale of the tenancy and the acceptance of the new tenant. If the landlord allowed the transfer to take place without any word of dispute about the rent, he was to hold his peace for ever, and was practically precluded from requiring a rise of rent afterwards.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the landlord has accepted the incoming tenant, and the incoming man has now become his tenant, and the landlord then demands an increase of rent, there is nothing to prevent him from doing so. The object of the clause is to make provision for this narrow point; it is considered that there may be an interval between the completion of the transaction by the old tenant and the introduction of the new tenant, during which the landlord may say to the new tenant—"You are now coming in; I do not refuse to accept you; but if you take this farm, you must take it under an increased rent." This clause would place the landlord under the same liabilities to the new tenant as to the old.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that in that narrow sense he did not think it necessary to object to the clause. If the landlord allowed six months to pass before he raised the rent the case would be different.

MR. GIBSON said, the Prime Minister had presented the section in a very minimized and narrow point of view; but, in his (Mr. Gibson's) opinion, it was open to a far wider construction. He quite accepted the statement of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell), that it was desirable, as far as possible, to lighten the ship. That he would be anxious to do if it was possible, especially in the present state of the weather; but he thought that the best way of lightening the ship in this instance would be to drop the clause altogether. Of course, if the Committee thought it desirable to deal with the question now it could do so. There were two classes of tenancies dealt with—namely, present and future tenants. The position of a future tenant was abundantly protected by sub-section 3 of Clause 2 as amended. But the question of the present tenant, which he admitted to be an important question, was not left uncovered. A present tenant had ample power, if he was dissatisfied with the rise, to appeal to the Court and demand that the Court should overrule the claim of the landlord to the extent to which it was unreasonable in the matter of rent.

He wished to know whether those two questions did not dispose of the width of the drafting of the clause? It might be a very narrow and minute point which had been indicated by the Prime Minister, and it might require some further drafting; but, unquestionably, on that side of the House they could not allow the clause to remain in its present shape without a protest. Therefore, in the interest of the time of the Committee, he would ask the Government to withdraw the clause. If it went on, they would feel called upon to move Amendment after Amendment which stood on the Paper in order to prevent the wideness of the drafting of the clause being used in a way which was not intended.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that, if the clause is to be discussed in detail, a discussion is now quite irregular. It must be taken when the Question is proposed that Clause 12 stand part of the Bill, and not upon the simple Amendment now before the Committee.

DR. LYONS wished to know what the actual words of the Amendment were?

THE CHAIRMAN: The proposal is to leave out the word "tenancy," in line 7, in order to insert the words "under the provisions of this Act, and."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH would venture to make a suggestion. There appeared to be a good deal of difficulty in the matter, and, in order to save time, he would suggest that the clause should be postponed. Perhaps the Government would agree to that

COYDILL

THE CHAIRMAN: It would be necessary for the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Amendment first, and after that is done the clause could be postponed, if desirable.

MR. GLADSTONE: I see no objection to the postponement of the clause. It was not intended last night that the clause should be postponed, but that I should state to-day what the object of the clause was. I trust that the Committee will see that there is really some point in the clause. My object is simply to provide protection against a very dishonourable transaction aimed at a man before he becomes a tenant at all, either present or future; and the clause is intended to have its operation confined to that narrow point. But I do not think that the Government will have any difficulty in being able to consider the point between the present time and the bringing up of the Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

Clause 13 (Regulations as to sales and application to Court to fix rent).

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to move the Amendment which stood in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). The object of the Amendment appeared to be that if the landlord had an objection against the tenant before the judicial rent was fixed, he should place the tenant in a position that he would be able to sell the holding at a reasonable and fair price according to the merits of the case. It was obvious that if the rent was increased, and then the holding sold, the tenant would be placed at a disadvantage. Therefore, the Amendment was, he considered, a fair and reasonable one. It gave both the landlord and the tenant the opportunity of getting a fair price, and nothing more.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 16, leave out from the word "proceedings" to "following," in line 25, and insert "Where proceedings other than proceedings in ejectment for non-payment of rent are taken by the landlord to compel a tenant to quit his holding the tenant may sell his tenancy at any time before, but not after, the execution of the writ or decree to possession, and thereupon such proceedings shall be stayed and wholly cease, and the purchaser shall hold such tenancy as if such proceedings had not been taken; and if judgment, or decree in ejectment, has been obtained before the passing of this Act, such tenant may, at any time before, but not after, the expiration of six months from the execution of a writ or decree to possession in an ejectment for non-payment of rent, and at any time before, but not after, the execution of such writ or decree to possession in an ejectment for non-payment of rent, and at any time before, but not after, the execution of such writ or decree in any ejectment other than for non-payment of rent, apply to the Court to fix the judicial rent of the holding."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'where proceedings' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) thought that the hon. Member must have misconceived the object of the clause. He (the Attorney General for Ireland) could see no difference between the object which the hon. Member proposed to attain by the Amendment, and what was in the Bill already, except in one small matter of very trifling importance. If the Amendment were adopted in the very common case of an ejectment for non-payment of rent, the tenant's power of selling would be gone. He thought that could hardly be the object of the hon. Gentleman. The Amendment left out all the first part of the clause, and accordingly left the tenant who was ejected for non-payment of rent without any power of sale. That, of course, was not intended. If the object was to enable a tenant who was ejected for non-payment of rent, as in other cases where proceedings were taken, to apply to the Court to fix a judicial rent, then that was expressly provided for by the Bill as it stood. The only difference in the Amendment was that it left the tenant entirely unprotected where he happened to be ejected for the non-payment of rent.

MR. BIGGAR said, that under those circumstances, after the very fair explanation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, he would withdraw the Amendment. He might add that his hon. Friend, in whose name the Amendment stood, had not requested him to move it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR would like to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland a question or two before the Amendment was withdrawn. This was one of the two clauses which affected a tenant who had entered into a contract with his landlord. He understood that the right hon. and learned Gentleman and the Government were anxious to make provision for those tenants whose tenant right had been swallowed up by excessive rents, and by the proceedings of the landlord. As he understood the matter, a tenant who was at present engaged in legal proceedings with his landlord would only get six months, from the passing of the Act, in which to redeem himself, and put himself right so as to sell the advantages conferred upon him by the Act of 1870, and by this Bill. He wished to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland whether, if the Government thought it right to protect the tenants whose tenant right had been destroyed on account of bad seasons, and if they also thought it desirable that the protecting power of the clause should be limited to the short period of six months? The right hon. and learned Gentleman must know that this distress was not a distress of last year, but that it had extended over two or three years. He would, therefore, respectfully suggest that the Government should increase the protection afforded to those unfortunate tenants, so that they might have an opportunity of recovering their position.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, the clause must be read in conjunction with others. The condition laid down was that within this period of six months, if the rent still remained unpaid, and in one or two other cases specially provided for, litigation might be commenced and the tenant ejected. It would not be reasonable to require a more extended period to elapse before the landlord could have his remedy. The question which the hon. Member had just put related, he understood, to tenants now in difficulties. The Bill provided that they would have the same period of time up to which they would be able to redeem their position, and they might apply to the Court to fix a judicial rent. If they got a judicial rent fixed, they would have a statutable period of 15 years, during which they would be able to sell their rights. By sub-section 2, where the sale of a tenancy was delayed without default of the tenant, it was in the power of the Court to extend the time; and by one of the last clauses in the Bill, Clause 48, it was provided that, although the Court might not sit until October, and a tenant was unable to make an immediate application to the Court, he should be, if the Court thought proper, in the same position, and have the same rights in respect of his tenancy, as he would have been in and would have had, if the application had been made on the day on which the Act came into force. He thought that it was impossible to provide more reasonable arrangements generally in order to enable a tenant to realize the benefits of the Bill.

MR. MACFARLANE also wished to ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland a question. Were the proceedings referred to in the section those that were existing at the time of the passing of the Act, or only proceedings that were now pending?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Both.

MR. BIGGAR said, he understood from the Prime Minister, on Monday last, that it was intended to-day that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland should lay before the Committee the views of the Government upon the question of arrears. He should like to know when that statement was to be made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I may briefly state that I propose to lay before the Committee the views of the Government in regard to this matter when we come to the Amendment which stands in the name of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton). I may remind the Committee that I have given Notice of an important Amendment in Clause 45, to insert, after the words "a tenancy to which this Act applies shall be deemed to have determined whenever it is sold in consequence of a breach by the tenant," the words "after the passing of this Act." That would put a tenant under the notice of eviction in the position that if he thought himself rack-rented he could apply to the Court to fix a fair rent, and would be able to sell the holding as a present tenancy.

MR. GIBSON said, the statement just made by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) was one of extreme importance, and he would not now discuss its details. So far as he gathered, the Government did not intend themselves to bring in any substantive Amendment dealing with the question of arrears; but they intended to accept another Amendment and draft their alterations upon it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: What I intended to state was that we proposed to put our clause upon the Table of the House to-day; and I intimated that I would take the opportunity for doing so upon the Amendment being moved by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LITTON said, the Amendment he was about now to propose would only require a very few words of explanation.

Mr. Macfarlane

He proposed to insert, after the words "where proceedings are taken by the landlord," in line 16, the words "or have been taken." That would make the clause apply to proceedings taken both before and after the passing of the Act.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 16, after "are taken," to insert the words "or have been taken."—(Mr. Litton.)

Amendment agreed to.

CAPTAIN AYLMER wished to move an Amendment, in order to clear up a doubt as to who the clause applied to. He proposed to insert, after the first word "tenant," in line 17, the words "of a present tenancy."

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 17, after the first word "tenant," insert "of a present tenancy."—(Captain Aylmer.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR, on behalf of the hon. Member for Wexford County (Mr. Barry), moved, in line 20, after the word "of," to insert the words "not less than two years."

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 20, after "of," insert "not less than two years."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) hoped that the hon. Member would not press the Amendment. The law as it stood gave the tenant a year's grace, and that was, he submitted, a sufficiently liberal allowance. It would be most unjust to require the landlord to wait for two years.

Question put, and negatived.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, after the word "rent," in line 22, to insert the words—

"Provided that any such tenancy so sold shall be, and be deemed to be, a subsisting tenancy as if no such proceedings had been taken."

There could be no question that the tenancy in a legal sense would be gone, subject to the equitable right of redemption. The object of this Amendment was to provide, as in Ulster, that the tenant, notwithstanding that fact, should be at liberty to sell so long as the right of redemption lasted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 22, after the word "rent," insert these words "any such tenancy so sold shall be, and be deemed to be, a subsisting tenancy as if no such proceedings had been taken." —(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON said, that this Amendment was proposed in manuscript without Notice, and would very much have preferred that the Amendment should have been placed on the Paper, because it was of great importance, bearing in mind the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for North Northumberland (Sir Matthew White Ridley), which came immediately afterwards, and which provided that such sale should not prejudice or affect the landlord's rights in the event of the said tenancy not being redeemed within the period of six months. His hon. Friend was not in the House at the present moment; but he (Mr. Gibson) intended to move the Amendment for him. It dealt with a technicality, and remedied a flaw in the clause. But if they declared that, notwithstanding a notice to quit, the tenancy was an existing tenancy, how would the position of the landlord be affected? Did it free the purchaser, who stood in the shoes of the tenant, from the obligation to redeem? That was a vital question. The tenant right at present was this—that he had six months after the execution of a writ or decree to redeem; and if the tenancy was not redeemed—and it could only be redeemed by the payment of the tenant's rent—then, in common justice, the landlord would be entitled to treat the tenancy as gone, and put a man in possession. His right hon. and learned Friend now proposed to declare, notwithstanding all this, that the tenancy should be held to be a subsisting tenancy; and he (Mr. Gibson) wished to show how, if they did that, it would affect the landlord's rights. He did not like to differ upon a question of this kind from his right hon. and learned Friend. But, unless his right hon.

and learned Friend would say that the matter should be considered in connection with the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Northumberland, and that the acceptance of this Amendment would not prejudice the Amendment of his hon. Friend, he certainly could not accept the Government Amendment, which would prejudice that which he was about to move, and which was an absolute test of the bona fides of the clause. He must, therefore, most reluctantly decline to accede to the present Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) thought the observations of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) were quite just; but it was not intended that the landlord's rights should be prejudiced by the Amendment. In point of fact, the Amendment was proposed as a means of protecting the landlord's rights. There would be a sale under the 1st clause of the Bill, and in a case of this kind where the rent was due the money must be paid into Court. He should have no objection to add to the Amendment, not exactly the words of the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Northumberland (Sir Matthew White Ridley), but words which would provide against anything being done that was calculated to prejudice the rights of the landlord. The landlord had two rights—the right to recover the rent of his land, and the right to obtain compensation for damages; and the Government would not sanction any Amendment that would be inconsistent with those rights. Of course, if a tenancy was sold it went to the purchaser; but he would be perfectly willing to introduce an Amendment fully preserving the landlord's rights.

MR. GIBSON said, he was sorry that he had been unable to follow the argument of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, and he would, therefore, shortly state his own views. He thought that the Government had no right—indeed, they admitted that they had no right—to interfere in any way between the landlord and the recovery of his rent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, it might perhaps save time if he said that he saw no objection to the insertion of the words proposed to be moved by his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson).

[Twenty-first Night.]

MR. WARTON wished to suggest to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that it would facilitate the progress of the Bill if, when Amendments were moved which were not on the Paper, the right hon. and learned Gentleman would read the exact words in which they were framed. In regard to the last Amendment, he had noticed no fewer than four corrections from the words as given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and the words as afterwards read by the Chair.

MR. BIGGAR thought that the conversation which had taken place between the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland and the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) was somewhat irregular. The Attorney General for Ireland had moved an Amendment, and the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin argued against it unless the Government would consent to some subsequent Amendment. Now, he did not think that that was at all a regular mode of proceeding. The best course would be to settle this Amendment first; and then, when the next Amendment was moved, it would be for the Committee, and not for the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, to settle whether it was to be received or not.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) is perfectly correct. There was an irregularity in discussing the second Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GIBSON moved, in line 22, after "rent," to insert—

"But such sale shall not prejudice or affect the landlord's rights, in the event of the said tenancy not being redeemed within the said period of six months."

This, he said, was the Amendment which stood in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for North Northumberland (Sir Matthew White Ridley).

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 22, after "rent," insert "but such sale shall not prejudice or affect the landlord's rights, in the event of the said tenancy not being redeemed within the said period of six months."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. BIGGAR said, he would like to have the opinion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland as to what the effect of these words would be. It seemed to him that they might neutralize, in a great measure, what occurred in the subsequent paragraphs of this particular clause. Those paragraphs provided that certain proceedings should be suspended until the decision of the Court had been had on the question of rent and other matters; and he thought the Amendment, in its present form, would nullify that provision, and put the landlord in absolute possession of the holding even if legal proceedings were pending. Under those circumstances, he thought the Amendment very objectionable, and he hoped that the Committee would not agree to it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he did not think the Amendment would have any injurious effect. It was quite clear that the landlord was entitled to get the rent of his land, and that this right must be protected; and there never was any intention in any part of the House, when the land was transferred to another tenant, that the landlord's right to be paid his rent should be taken away from him. This Amendment merely involved a declaration that a sale should not prejudice or affect the landlord's rights, in the event of the tenancy not being redeemed within the specified period of six months. In reference to what followed, his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) would see in the next paragraph of the Bill that power was given to the Court to extend the time for the application beyond the period previously assigned, so that, under special circumstances, although the six months might have expired, the Court would have power to enlarge the time.

MR. LEAMY said, the Amendment might be very reasonable or not; but he thought they had already protected the landlord in the case of a sale. In the 1st clause of the Bill it was provided that until the purchaser satisfied the requirements of Section 8, and until any rent that was due was paid, the landlord need not accept the purchaser as tenant. Therefore the landlord was sufficiently protected as the Bill stood, and even for the purpose of protecting the landlord there was no necessity for introducing this Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the difficulty arose from the words he had adopted in his Amendment, that a transfer should take effect as if no ejectment proceedings had been taken. His right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) therefore proposed these words in order to save the landlord's rights.

MR. LEAMY said, there was this difficulty. If the landlord was not protected under the 1st clause, then, as he had said, it would be very fair and reasonable that the new tenant should stand in the old tenant's shoes; and if the rent was not paid within six months, of course it would affect the position of the incoming tenant. That was only reasonable. But then it must be borne in mind that the outgoing tenant was compelled to sell, and he must give notice to his landlord of his intention to sell. The landlord had the right to decide who should be the purchaser; and he had a right to object, on reasonable grounds, to the proposed purchaser. The landlord had also a right to call upon the proposed purchaser to pay the money into Court. The outgoing tenant would then have complied with all the conditions that were necessary in regard to the power of sale, and would have done everything that could reasonably be expected of him. Consequently, the landlord would have got sufficient protection. But if they allowed this Amendment, the tenant, having got the consent of his landlord to sell, and the proposed purchaser having been received favourably by the landlord, then the selling tenant might get nothing whatever from the incoming man, and the incoming tenant and the selling tenant might both be evicted.

MR. MARUM thought that unless the words were qualified they would cut away the temporary power of suspension.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he could not see what object was to be gained by inserting these words. They only repeated words that had already been assented to by all parties, and were contained in the Bill. They simply meant that if the landlord could not get his rent he was to have back his land, and that was perfectly just. He agreed that the insertion of these words might interfere with the intention of the clause. The laying down of general rules was often a good preface for making exceptions.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) did not attach sufficient importance to the words proposed to be inserted. He (Mr. Biggar) held that in the event of the tenancy not being redeemed within six months, what followed afterwards would be entirely nullified—namely,

“Where any proceedings for compelling the tenant to quit his holding shall have been taken before or after an application to fix a judicial rent, and shall be pending before such application is dismissed, the Court before which such proceedings are pending shall have power to postpone or suspend such proceedings until the termination of the proceeding of the application for proceeding in such judicial rent.”

He thought there ought to be some saving words contained in the clause, such as had been suggested by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, or otherwise one part of the clause would contradict the other.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) thought that, with a slight alteration, the words proposed might be rendered unobjectionable. No doubt, what had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) was quite correct; but in case that transaction was not carried out, the words that had now been adopted, on the suggestion of his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, might be argued to have the effect of putting an end to the ejectment proceedings altogether, and render them a nullity, so as to compel the landlord to commence proceedings de novo for a fresh ejectment. He thought it possible to add words to protect the landlord's rights—not to give him any fresh rights, but to provide that the proceedings already commenced should not be made a nullity. He would suggest that the Amendment should be amended by the substitution of the words—

“Without prejudice to the landlord's rights in the event of the said tenancy not being redeemed within the said period of six months.”

MR. GIBSON said, that everyone liked his own child best, and therefore he preferred his own words; but he would not object to those proposed by the Solicitor General, who had fairly stated the substance of the contention.

THE CHAIRMAN: The most convenient course will be for the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) to withdraw his Amendment and propose to insert the one now suggested.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 22, after the word "rent," to insert these words, "without prejudice to the landlord's rights in the event of the said tenancy not being redeemed within the said period of six months."—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. FITZPATRICK wished to propose a small Amendment in order to clear up an ambiguity. He proposed to insert after the word "to," in line 24—

"And the Court be satisfied the rent mentioned in the said ejectment was an excessive rent the tenant was unable to pay him," it might fix a judicial rent. These words were only an amplification of the words of the Prime Minister himself on the introduction of the Bill. Speaking of pending cases of eviction, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"A very lively and just susceptibility has been shown by Representatives from Ireland as to the effect of the Act in cases where proceedings with a view to eviction have been commenced; and it has been said that if you take the cases of excessive rent which the tenant has been unable to pay, it would be extremely hard that such a tenant should be deprived of the benefit which this Act proposes to confer on tenants as a class."—[3 Hansard, cclx. 911.]

He only took those cases where the Court was satisfied that an excessive rent was exacted from the tenant; and in such cases he thought it was only right that the Court should have a permissive or a compulsory power to fix the rent, or else a litigious and tiresome tenant would force his landlord into Court, and go there simply in order to see what he could get. Where the tenant thought the rent was excessive, he would still be able to go to the Court and apply for a judicial rent; but if he had no reason to think that the rent was excessive, there would be no inducement for him to go into Court at all.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 24, after the second word "to," insert the words "and the Court be satisfied that the rent mentioned in the said eject-ment was an excessive rent the tenant was unable to pay him."—(Mr. Fitzpatrick.)

Mr. Gibson

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he could not accept the Amendment. There was no reason why the tenant should not go into Court to have his rent fixed, even if the rent was not excessive, if he wanted to obtain the benefit of a statutory term.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR regarded the Amendment as a very ridiculous one. The hon. Member had spoken of an excessive rent, and under this Amendment the tenants would have to prove not only that the rent was not fair, but that it was excessive. Now, was not an unfair rent an excessive rent? Owing to a series of bad seasons the rent might be unfair, and the tenant would be compelled to submit practically to such hard terms as the hon. Member proposed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that he would not enter into the legal question of what was meant by an excessive rent. No doubt, any rent which a tenant could not pay might be considered an excessive rent.

MR. GIBSON thought the Amendment covered a matter of sufficient importance to be made the question of an independent Amendment. It was a distinctly retrospective provision; and anything in the nature of a retrospective legislation was, of course, immensely in favour of those who were to derive a benefit from it. The Bill, as drafted, proposed to extend to all tenants, good, bad, or indifferent—no matter what their circumstances were, and whether a man with money in his pocket absolutely refused to pay the rent—it meted out them the same measure of justice. He did not think this was fair, or calculated to improve the morality of the nation; and, therefore, he thought his hon. Friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) was right in moving the Amendment. Was it reasonable that the people who came within it should gain the benefit of these retrospective words? He would take the case of a tenant, which was a common case in Ireland, who, with ample means in his pocket, and with every opportunity and fully able to pay, deliberately held back, and, in accordance with the iniquitous teaching of the Land League, had refused to pay, and insisted on the landlord's taking proceedings against him? Was it not abhorrent to justice to tell that man who, contrary to all principles of morality and justice, compelled his landlord to evict him, that he was to have the advantage of this retrospective clause equally with the deserving and impoverished tenant; and that he should be able to bring his landlord into Court without any direction to the Court to discern in any way between the two cases? It was most important that there should be something to indicate to the Court that they should have a discretionary power in dealing with such a case. These might not be the most appropriate words to introduce into an Act of Parliament; but they had high Parliamentary sanction, because they were the very words used by the Prime Minister in introducing the Bill, when dealing with the question of excessive rents, which tenants were unable to pay. The very same words had been introduced by his hon. Friend into the Amendment, and, at any rate, they contained an important principle; and it was quite plain that when the Prime Minister presented the Bill to the House on the first occasion he fully appreciated the propriety of discrimination when dealing with past proceedings in reference to ejectments. A tenant who, owing to circumstances beyond his control, such as poverty and bad seasons, was unable to pay, ought not to be treated in the same manner as a man who had refused to pay owing to his own misconduct. He hoped the Government would be able to indicate that they were willing to adopt some Amendment whereby they might indicate to this Court of Equity that it might have power, if it considered it necessary, to refuse the application of a tenant who had improperly and unjustly refused to pay his rent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he agreed with his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) that if the Court was satisfied that a tenant had wantonly and unjustly refused to pay, it should not accede to the application. But that case was fully provided for under the 8th clause, which stated that where the Court, on the hearing of a case, was satisfied that the conduct of the landlord or the tenant had been unreasonable, it might refuse the application. That clause was certainly intended, and he submitted was quite sufficient to meet the very case which his right hon. and learned Friend contemplated.

MR. LALOR asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) desired to persuade the Committee that there were tenants in Ireland who had allowed themselves to be served with ejectments from their holdings, and had allowed themselves and their families to be evicted, when they had money in their pockets to pay the demands of the landlord. [Mr. GIBSON: Hear, hear!] The right hon. and learned Gentleman, if he believed that, would believe anything. The assertion was as absurd as it was false? Nothing of the sort had ever occurred in Ireland, and there was no man in Ireland who would have allowed himself to be evicted from his holding who had the money to pay the rent in his pocket. As to excessive rents, he would remind the Committee that, although the rents might not have been originally excessive and unfair, the circumstances of the last three or four years might have caused rents to be unfair which would not otherwise have been excessive; and, therefore, although they might not have been excessive previously, they were excessive now. There was another part of this clause to which he desired to call the attention of the Committee—namely,

“And if any judgment or decree in ejectment has been obtained before the passing of this Act such tenant may, within the same periods, respectively apply to the Court to fix the judicial rent of the holding.”

He would remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland that, at the present moment, there were a number of Irish tenants who had been evicted, and evicted for non-payment of rent; and, if this Act did not come into operation before the end of six months, they would be completely deprived of all benefit from it unless it was intended to extend its operations.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would give some answer to the appeal just made to him. As yet no satisfactory intimation had proceeded from the Treasury Bench as to what was to be done in regard to pending cases.

THE CHAIRMAN: That question is not raised by the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. FITZPATRICK said, he was satisfied with what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland as to the working of the Equity Clause; and he would, therefore, withdraw his Amendment.

MR. WARTON wished to call attention to the very wide application of the 8th clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was in Order in referring to the power already passed in the 8th clause; but the hon. and learned Member for Bridport cannot discuss the 8th clause now.

MR. WARTON said, he only wished to apply it in the same manner that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had done. The position of the tenant who had paid his rent and the tenant who had not paid it was dealt with in the 8th section. It gave the Court the power to review the conduct of the tenant; but not separately, and only with regard to the joint negotiations between the landlord and tenant.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LITTON said, that with reference to the subject-matter of pending arrears, he did not wish to stand between the Committee and the statement about to be made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland; and, therefore, he would content himself with simply moving the Amendment which stood in his (Mr. Litton's) name on the Paper.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 25, after "holding," insert "and if the rent theretofore payable appears to the Court to have been an excessive rent, or that the tenant, by reason of the general failure of crops in the district or other unavoidable necessity, is unable to pay the same, so as to redeem his holding, the Court may reduce the arrear due by such tenant to such sum as the same would have amounted to had the rent theretofore payable been the rent fixed as the judicial rent, and may also give time to the tenant for the payment thereof, or direct that the same shall be paid by instalments upon such terms and conditions as the Court shall deem fit."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I think I may at first state, with regard to the Amendment, that the Government cannot undertake to accept it, and on this ground—that it is implied by it that a legal debt at present due from the tenant to the landlord would be compulsorily diminished. There is a very great difference between Parliament dealing in this Bill with future contracts, and sanctioning a breach of past contracts; and we must bear in mind that this Amendment does not cover all the cases of arrears. There are many cases in which arrears have been caused by the distress of bad years, and which are not caused by any excessive rent at the present time. The Government cannot accept the Amendment of my hon. and learned Friend, nor that of my hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan), which would give the power of diminishing the debt, not merely by excessive rent, but by any defective seasons or failure of crops. If the Committee will allow me now to explain the proposals of the Government, I will do so as briefly as I can. It is our desire to give a fresh start, if it is possible, to the tenants in arrear. It is most desirable to do so, and for that purpose we think that Parliament may give facilities, and may, I may say, hold out temptations to both landlord and tenant to come to an agreement. Our object is to make proposals which may conduce towards making both landlords and tenants meet their difficulties. I will, therefore, make as slight an allusion as I can to any matters on which, no doubt, there is great difference of opinion. Those who owe arrears may be divided into two classes—namely, those who are unable to pay, and those who are unwilling to pay. Let me first state what we are actually doing for tenants in arrear. By the clause which we are now actually considering in Committee, and by the 45th and 48th clauses, we put every tenant against whom his landlord takes proceedings for the recovery of unpaid rent in this position—that he would not lose the benefit of the Act, on account of the landlord's taking proceedings, without having the power to apply to the Court to fix a judicial rent. The result of this would be that if he had been rack-rented, or if he had been even over-rented, or charged any rent which was above a fair rent—if that were so, he would have the opportunity, notwithstanding that he was in arrears, of having a fair rent fixed; and then, by the 1st clause, he gets the power of selling his tenancy as settled by the Court; and by the proposals to which I have already alluded, and which the Government hope to persuade the Committee to accept, he will be able to sell that tenancy as a present tenancy. This applies to our definition of proceedings—namely, that proceedings should not be completed until the six months for redemption have passed over. The hon. Member for the City of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) asked what was to become of the tenant if the Act is not passed within six months. If we do not pass the Act at all we must begin all our discussions over again; but if the Act is to be passed at all it must be passed within six months? I think that is the evident reply to this question. It would be a great mistake to suppose that this is not a considerable boon to tenants in arrear; but I am perfectly well aware that there may be many tenants whose arrears will be beyond the price they could obtain for the tenant right even with a present tenancy and with a judicial rent. The question is, how far we can or ought to help those of them who are unable to pay their arrears—how far we ought to help them so that they may have a fair start along with other tenants, and not be evicted? In considering this question we must bear in mind, when we come to examine into the arrears, that generally speaking—I may say almost invariably, for the exceptions are on so small a scale that hon. Members of practical experience will confirm me in the belief that they are really more or less arrears within the last three years—namely, the two bad years of 1878 and 1879, the two rents which were due before the last crop, and the comparatively good year of 1880. What I mean by that is that they are the rents which ought to have been paid after 1878, or 1879, or 1880. I am well aware that on some estates there is an appearance of arrears beyond that time; but I believe that that is really what we may call an arrangement of accounts much more than a reality. ["No!"] I am told that you may find some estate books upon which there appear to be arrears due since the time of the Great Famine. That appears to me to have been very unwise book-keeping, and I do not call those arrears at all. In some few cases, after the Famine, no doubt, when the rents were paid, instead of starting fair, the landlords put them to the credit of the old account. But I do not call those arrears, and they are not worth a farthing in the pound. What we have really to deal with, practically, are the arrears of the last three years. Of those arrears I believe that if the last year had been by itself, and the tenants had been left alone, there would not have been much trouble. I believe that, generally speaking; I do not say that there would not have been exceptions—there always will be exceptions—but if the tenant had not had the arrears of the two previous years hanging around him like a mill stone, and there had been only last year to deal with, and if the tenant had also been let alone, the landlord would have obtained the rent, in some cases without abatement, and in others with reasonable abatement. But then comes the great difficulty of the two previous years, and I am afraid that some hon. Members may have a feeling of disappointment when I now state what the Government propose. But the Government believe, after serious consideration, that they would be more likely to arrive at beneficial results for both landlord and tenant, and quite as much for the tenant as the landlord, if, instead of making any compulsory arrangement as to what the landlord must accept or what the tenant must pay, we stepped forward on the part of the State and made an offer. The offer we propose to make is this. That the Commission shall have power to advance to all tenants who have settled with their landlords for the rents due since last year's crop—that is, who have paid their rent, or made arrangements with their landlords by which he accepted what had been paid as payment in full; to all those tenants the Commission will, in regard to their holdings, have power to advance to the landlord 50 per cent of any arrears that may be due from the two previous years—I hope I am making myself understood—1878 and 1879, on these conditions—That the landlord and tenant shall agree in the application; that the landlord shall undertake the repayment of the advance in 15 years in half yearly instalment, at, I suppose, an interest of  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent—certainly not above  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent—that the tenant shall allow the payment to be added to his rent for 15 years, whether it be a judicial rent or not; and that in consideration for receiving that advance the landlord should give a release in full to the tenant for all arrears. The result of that would be this—that on those holdings to which the arrangements would apply there would be no possibility of eviction for anything due up to the present time. Upon last year's rent the landlord and tenant would come to an agreement; and with regard to the two previous years' rent, the landlord would receive a sum not exceeding one year's rent, as an advance, from the Government; while the tenant would be free from all previous debts upon the condition that he pays this small addition to his rent, whatever it may be, spread over a period of 15 years. That is the proposal which we make. I must now state out of what fund the Government propose to take this money. It is proposed to make this advance on the security of the Church Fund, which, after all, is a purely Irish fund. I hope that hon. Members from Ireland will recollect that agricultural distress, and arrears of rent, and the difficulties of tenants, and, I must say, the difficulties of landlords, are not confined to Ireland at the present moment. But it would be a mistake to suppose that the Government incurs no responsibility, because the Irish Church Fund has a good many burdens upon it; and I do not know how far it may stand this additional strain. Therefore, it is not to be supposed that the Government are making a proposal which, to some extent, may not involve a responsibility to the ratepayers. Let me say one or two words as to the effect of this proposal. It is true that it is not a compulsory, but a voluntary arrangement. There are advantages in compulsion; but, I believe, the difficulty of getting an enactment passed into law—I suppose I should hardly be in Order in explaining much more than that—the difficulty of getting an enactment passed into law, which might have anything of a compulsory nature about it, would be very great. On the other hand, there are very great advantages if we can give the two parties, the landlord and the tenant, a strong temptation to come to an arrangement voluntarily. What would they get from it? The landlord would get a strong temptation from the tenant to pay the whole of the remaining debt of last year. He will get an advance of 50 per cent of the previous arrears, possibly amounting to one year's rent in ready money; and I am afraid that there are a great many landlords in Ireland to whom that would be a great boon. It may be said that the landlord would still have to lose the other 50 per cent. No doubt he would lose it; but if he could get it, it would be with great difficulty, and it is for the landlords to judge what is best for them. My strong belief is that the majority of landlords in Ireland will not object to the offer which the Government make, nor look upon it as a bad one. Then, what would the tenant gain? He gains a fair start for the future. He gains a release of all arrears of the bad years, and any arrears that may have been existing before. He gets the temptation from the landlord to make fair terms with him for last year's rent, and he gets time for repayment; and he gets security against eviction; and, furthermore, a certainty of obtaining the benefit of the Act. I need hardly say what would be the advantages to the State if we can get this proposal agreed to. It is not necessary to explain that. Instead of having the landlords considering how they can get the law enforced, and instead of many of the tenants considering how they can break the law, we should have both considering the best use they could make of the offer of the Government. I may explain that this proposal cannot be discussed now; but I hope to place it upon the Paper to-day. I am obliged to the Committee for allowing me to make this statement. It is impossible to make the proposal to-day, simply because I have not yet had time to consult the authorities of the Treasury as to the exact technical position of the fund from which this scheme is to be carried out. I trust that I have made myself clear; at any rate, I have tried to do so, and I hope my hon. and learned Friend will not object to withdraw his Amendment, on the perfect understanding that if he thinks fit—I hope he will not—to bring it up at a future time, he will find an appropriate opportunity, and one upon which he will get the best chance of a full discussion upon the clause which I shall place upon the Paper to-day.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish to point out to the Committee that though, by the indulgence of the Committee, it is permitted to a Minister of the Crown sometimes to make an explanation of a clause in advance, it would not be in Order to discuss a clause which is not before the Committee; but the discussion must be postponed until it is. At the same time, any explanations asked from the right hon. Gentleman in order to make his statement more clear would be in Order.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I rise, not for the purpose of discussing the important statement which has just been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland—I quite agree that it is one which we ought not to attempt to discuss now; but I rise chiefly for the purpose of asking whether this will be brought in as a separate clause? If so, we shall have plenty of time to consider it on the Paper before we come to its discussion; and although the statement of the right hon. Gentleman has been extremely lucid, I think we could scarcely appreciate that statement until we see it on the Paper.

MR. LITTON said, that, after the Ministerial statement, it would be extremely inconvenient to discuss his Amendment; and he would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw it.

MR. LALOR said, the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman seemed to be only that which was enjoyed by every trader in the Kingdom—namely, the right of offering a composition to his creditors.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now discussing the proposition which is proposed to be withdrawn.

MR. LALOR said, he was discussing the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton). He did not see how it was possible to make any objection to that principle. With regard to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he had no doubt that it would be an excellent provision for the landlords of Ireland who were unable to collect their rents, because it gave them 50 per cent of the rents which they were not able to get. He wished, however, to ask the right hon. Gentleman, with regard to tenants who had paid up their rents to last November 12 months, whether such tenants would get any benefit from the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he did not wish to discuss this proposal now; but he should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman two questions with regard to it. The first was that which had just been put by the hon. Member who last spoke (Mr. Lalor) whether it was intended that the proposal should apply to cases in which the arrears had been paid as well as to those in which they were still due; and, secondly, was it proposed that the scheme should apply to the whole of Ireland? because he must say that he was perfectly certain, from all the information which had reached him, that there were many parts of England in which, if the proposal was to be justified by the distress of the landlords and tenants, it would be as much required as in Ireland.

MR. H. R. BRAND, said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland with respect to one point in the scheme. He had failed to gather from the right hon. Gentleman's explanation whether the advantages it was proposed to give were to apply to all tenancies alike, or whether a distinction was to be drawn between those who had been really unable to pay their rent, and those who had not paid their rent although they had been perfectly able to do so.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to put a question in order to further elucidate the nature of the Government proposal. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland said the arrangement would be purely voluntary. In that case, how would it fit in with the 8th clause of the Bill? Was the refusal of the landlord to accept the arrangement to be regarded as unreasonable, and would it come under the 8th clause?

MAJOR NOLAN wanted to know if this offer on the part of the State was to be upon the gross rent, without deductions in any way for poor rates or county cess. [Cries of "Oh!"] He protested against the supporters behind the Government constantly groaning whenever an independent Member rose to put a question. It would be far better if they would get up and explain plainly what they meant. He wished to know, also, whether the Income Tax would be remitted on those payments?

MR. MACFARLANE said, the proposition amounted to this—that the landlord would get from the Government 50 per cent of the sum he was entitled to collect from the tenant. He wished to know, further, if the landlord would not also be entitled to collect from the tenant the other 50 per cent?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: With regard to the question of the hon. Member for the County of Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) I have already stated that one of the conditions of the advance will be that the landlord shall give a release for all arrears due. With regard to the question of the right hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) whether the scheme will apply to the whole of Ireland, I can only observe that there are parts of Ireland in which both landlords and tenants are less distressed than in other parts of the United Kingdom. But I am sure that, unless in exceptional cases, in many parts of Ireland these advances would not be made, because there are no arrears due previously to the last year's crop. In the parts of Ireland to which the right hon. Gentleman alluded, the rents, as a rule, were uncommonly well paid, sometimes with abatements on account of bad years, but, taken as a whole, uncommonly well paid until the rents were due last November; and, consequently, this offer will not apply to those cases. The offer will not apply to any arrears that have become due since the last year's crop. We believe, as a general rule, that the arrears which have become due since last year's crop might fairly be left to the landlord and tenant to settle between themselves. In the great majority of cases they can be paid; and the scheme, on the one hand, tempts the tenant to pay up last year's rent because of the advantages he will gain on account of previous year's arrears, and, on the other hand, it tempts the landlord to make a reasonable abatement on last year's rent in order to get the 50 per cent advance on the arrears of the two previous years. There is one thing of some importance which I forgot in making my statement, and of which I have been reminded by the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand), and that is that the offer is limited to tenancies of the value of £30 and under. The hon. and gallant Member for the County of Galway (Major Nolan) asks whether county cess will be taken into account? That is rather a technical question; but I think I can give him a pretty clear understanding—namely, that what we deal with is the rent due from the tenant to the landlord—a rent that he can put in his rent bill if he takes proceedings to evict. I think I have now answered all the questions that have been put to me.

MAJOR NOLAN: You have not answered my question about the Income Tax.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not think that we shall make allowance for Income Tax.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question with reference to the 8th clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: With regard to the 8th clause I would refer the noble Lord to the language of that clause, which is that, if the conduct of the landlord or the tenant is unreasonable, it is for the Court to consider whether it has been so. The mere fact of the refusal on the part of the landlord would not be sufficient; but it might be accompanied by other things which might tend to render the conduct of the landlord unreasonable, and all the facts would be considered by the Court. As to what fell from the hon. Member for Queen's County, I think he stated this, after all, was only an offer enabling the tenants, like any other traders, to compound their debts with a landlord creditor. There is just this difference—that the State comes forward and offers to prevent, in their cases, the surrender of the land. One great object of ours in this Bill, and in these discussions, is to enable the tenants in the future to enter into agreements with the landlords without compelling them to make this great sacrifice.

MR. MACARTNEY asked what, exactly, would be the position? The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the rent that would be considered as arrears in regard to this offer would be rent that would be included in the claim of the landlord if he brought proceedings to eject a tenant. If that were the case it would include rent up to the 1st May, 1881; therefore, it would include rent which would be payable under ordinary circumstances in Ireland out of the crop of this year. They ought to have very clear information on this point—

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member does not understand me.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that if the right hon. Member would allow him to conclude he would put the case as he understood it. In most parts of Ireland there was rent unpaid payable last November, and due on the 1st May, 1880. There were very few landlords who had received their November rents in May this year. That being the case, if these landlords made the abatement asked for, they would be foregoing 50 per cent.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not complain of the misunderstanding of my statement, because I do not believe that, however clearly to my own mind I might have put the case, hon. Members can perfectly understand the matter before they see it in print. What I did say was that this is voluntary offer with conditions attached to it, and that one of those conditions—the most important of them—is that it should only apply to the case of holdings on which the rent due since the last crop—that is to say, due last November or last May, has been paid either in full or to such an amount as the landlord is willing to accept as payment in full. I think that answers the question completely. Of course, it will be for the Committee to determine what time the Commission shall allow to elapse in this arrangement. I dare say our proposal will be open to some objection as not going far enough; but, after going through the matter very carefully, we propose that last year's rent should be settled for.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he still was not clear on the point.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: We shall have to frame the clause so that it will be understood by both parties as a legal offer on our conditions. The tenant must have paid to the landlord the rent due on the last two gale days since the crop. What we mean to say is that we do not think any offer should be made as regards last year's rent.

We do make an offer as regards the previous two years' rent.

MR. MACFARLANE said, it would simplify the proposal if the offer were made conditional upon the payment of one year's rent, whether last year's or one of the two preceding year's.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he did not wish to discuss in any way the proposal, but he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman one or two questions; and, first, as to an observation he had made in reply to an hon. Friend behind him. He would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he was not aware that £1,000,000 was advanced to the clergymen of the Irish Church as an indemnity for the non-receipt of their tithes, that this money was paid out of the Imperial Exchequer and was afterwards forgiven? He would like to ask also whether those tenants who had not been able to come to any arrangement with their landlords as to the payment of last year's rent were, by this proposal, to be left to fight it out with the landlords as best they could? He should like to ask, further, whether the Government would be willing to reconsider the figure of £30 valuation, which, if adopted, would make the proposal completely worthless to a large number of people in Ireland? He would not ask the right hon. Gentleman to answer the latter question now. There was still another query he wished to put—namely, whether the proposals of the Government would take into account, or would be supplemented by anything which would take into account, the position of the 9,436 persons evicted in 1880, the 1,732—less 181 put back as caretakers—evicted in the first three months of the present year, the 4,679 evicted in 1878, and the 6,239—less 633 put back as caretakers—who were evicted in 1879, all these evictions having taken place in what might be called years of distress?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I cannot give an answer as to what happened with regard to the tithes. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), who would be likely to know something about this, seems to think that the money was not given, but advanced. [MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Advanced and forgiven I said.] That may be so, but many years have passed since then. As to the other questions, they do not appear to have anything to do with my proposals, about which I do not think there can be any doubt. The hon. Member asked if any other proposal is contained in my proposition, and, in reply, I have to say that there is none. If the hon. Member wishes to bring forward any of these proposals it is perfectly within his power to do so. There is no proposal before the House for reinstating those persons evicted during the past year. It would be a most difficult thing to do.

MR. SHAW said, he rose for the purpose of suggesting that it might be advisable now to postpone a critical examination of the proposals of the Chief Secretary. They would not gain very much by discussing them now. The right hon. Gentleman's proposals were most important and required careful consideration.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) had put a very pertinent question as to whether, within the limit of £30, there was to be any distinction between tenants who would not and tenants who could not pay. In the case of a perfectly solvent tenant, were the taxpayers to pay a part of his arrears, or was a discretion to be allowed by the Court?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The proposal is intended to apply to all cases. If my hon. Friend looks into the matter he will see that there is a great guarantee to the taxpayers in the case he mentions, for if the tenant is able to pay, and there are no difficulties in the way, I do not suppose the landlord is likely to accept only half the arrears.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT wished to know why the Chief Secretary had fixed the valuation at £30? There might be a large number of persons who might have suffered distress with a valuation far above that.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and gallant Baronet is now discussing the clause.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: No doubt this matter will come under discussion when the clause is before the Committee. The figure has not been hastily fixed. It has been carefully considered, and the chief reason upon which we justify our proposal is that it will secure the peace of the country by relieving those people who are suffering. That was the sum named in the Bill of last year; and I would remind the hon. Gentleman that in cases above £30 the risk to the taxpayer would be immensely increased, whilst the number of people relieved would be very much smaller.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had not received a clear answer to the question he had put to the Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. and gallant Member's question has reference to the Income Tax, whilst this question is one as to rents—there payment of allowances to be made for rents. When the circumstances of the case are taken into consideration, I leave it to the hon. and gallant Member to consider the policy of the change he proposes.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the Amendment went on proper lines. Objection was taken to it because it was retrospective; but he would point out that all legislation as to arrears must be of a retrospective character, and, more than that, it seemed to him that there would be so many complications of different sorts that it seemed impossible to prepare a clause drawing a hard-and-fast line that would not be objectionable in some respects. Let them take a case where the landlord had not been charging over the valuation. In such a case the Court could reasonably say—"This tenant has not been unfairly treated. He has a right to pay his arrears on the valuation, and he has no right to get any redress under the provisions of the Bill." But, on the other hand, suppose the tenant came before the Court and said—"This landlord is charging me three or four times the Government valuation, and has improperly heaped up his arrears; I want to get some redress as to these arrears." In that case the Court might fairly say—"This tenant has been harshly treated, and we think he should have a substantial allowance." With regard to the question of bankruptcy, the Court never took the last penny a bankrupt had; but in these cases of eviction, where the cause of non-payment was excessive rent, the tenant would be turned out without mercy. Under the Bankruptcy Law it was frequently possible to make arrangements for a friendly composition. The Court, he understood, was to act as arbitrator between the two parties. He had a letter from one of his constituents which referred to an estate where, although both the present owner and his predecessor had acted in a kindly manner, arrears of three and four years were still kept by the agent in the rent book. This was an extract from the letter in question—

“As the question of arrears of rent is likely to occupy considerable attention in discussing the Land Bill, I take the liberty of bringing the case of the tenants on Lord Charles Beresford's property in this parish under your notice. This property formerly belonged to the late Primate of Armagh—the present owner's uncle—who was a good landlord. During the last Famine in 1848, the tenants were allowed to fall into arrears, as they were not able to pay—some of them as much as six years' rent. When the times improved the tenants paid their rents punctually enough; but the agent still kept the arrears on the rent book, and when the late Primate died all the tenants who were able to pay were processed and made to pay these old arrears. But a large number of these arrears are still due—three or four years; so that if there is not some provision made for cases like this, the Land Act will be of very little benefit to a large number of people.”

Such cases as these the Court could reasonably take cognizance of.

MR. DE LA POER BERESFORD said, that the tenants on the estate referred to had been treated, perhaps, better than any other tenants in County Cavan or in any other part of Ireland. Few of them had been processed, there had been hardly any ejectments, and where such things had occurred the tenants had been re-admitted as caretakers. There were very large arrears due, yet no one had been put out. The tenantry had been treated with the utmost kindness both by the late Primate and by Lord Charles Beresford.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had stated that the late Primate of Armagh had treated his tenants in a most kindly manner, and he had said the same of the present landlord. He had no charge to make against the proprietor of this particular property; but what he wished to observe was, that this was a case in point. Large arrears were due, and such an Amendment as that proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), if carried, would give an opportunity to the Court to take the case into consideration and, if necessary, to wipe off the arrears. Though the Beresford family might not act in a tyrannical manner towards their tenants, there were other landlords in Ireland of whom this could not be said. There were some who would extort the last penny from the unfortunate tenants.

MR. LITTON said, that after the discussion which had taken place he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PLUNKET said, he rose to propose an Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage). The object of it was this—Now that an opportunity had been given to the tenant to proceed to sell where proceedings were taken against him, and to ask the Court to fix a judicial rent for the holding, the landlord should be enabled to apply to the Court to direct that the tenancy in the holding should be sold. Either the tenant had the money to pay or he had not. If he had it he ought to pay it, and the policy of the earlier portion of the measure was that he should sell, and, out of the proceeds, pay his just debts to the landlord. The Amendment was to prevent the landlord being obliged, under the circumstances contemplated by the clause, to proceed further with ejectment proceedings. He might receive directions from the Court that the tenancy was to be sold, and that, out of the sale, the debts to the landlord should be paid. He was aware that other Amendments had been postponed after the statement of the Government; but this particular proposal did not run on the same lines. Therefore, he should be glad to hear what his right hon. and learned Friend had to say on the subject.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 25, after “holding,” insert “Provided that in those cases where arrears of rent may be owing to the landlord, the landlord may apply to the court to order the tenant's interest in his holding to be sold, and the purchase-money for the same to be paid into court as hereinbefore in this Act provided, and to be applied in the first instance in satisfaction of the just claims of the landlord, and as the court shall direct.”—(Mr. Plunket.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that although, no doubt, a great deal might be said for the Amendment as a mode of dealing with the case, it would bring about an entire revolution in the system of ejectment for non-payment of rent. At present the landlord's right, in case of default by the tenant, was to get back the holding, and the Bill was drawn in accordance with the present system. The Amendment would run entirely at right angles with that, and could not be accepted.

MR. MARUM would remind the Mover of the Amendment that the landlord had very great powers now, and it could not be desirable to supplement them.

MR. PLUNKET was sorry the Government had not been able to give the Amendment favourable consideration. As such large sacrifices had been made to get rid of the ill-blood which these proceedings occasioned between landlord and tenant, he thought the Government should have had no difficulty in accepting the proposal.

MR. SHAW said, he had the following Amendment on the Paper:—In page 10, line 25, after “holding,” to insert—

“Provided that if in any district scheduled in the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Acts 1880 and 1881, on hearing the case it appears to the Court that the arrears of rent accrued during the years 1877, 1878, and 1879, and were the unavoidable result of bad seasons and the failure of crops, the Court may reduce such arrears by one-third and give a decree for the balance. And the Land Commissioners may out of moneys in their hands advance the other two-thirds, one-half of such advance to be a free grant and the other half to be repayable by the tenant without interest in five yearly instalments, such instalments to be collected by the guardians for the relief of the poor in each union.”

He did not propose to move the Amendment, because, under the Resolution of the House of May 30, the Committee had no power to deal with it.

MR. PLUNKET said, that, in the absence of his right hon. and learned Colleague, he would move the next Amendment, which was in his (Mr. Gibson's) name. He thought the proposal was obviously just and fair, and trusted that the Government would not resist it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 25, after “holding,” insert “After judgment or decree in ejectment for non-payment of a judicial rent, and where a decree of possession or writ of habere facias possessionem of the holding has been executed, the landlord shall from thenceforth hold the holding discharged from the tenancy and freed from any claim save one for restitution or redemption made within six months after the date of such judgment or decree in ejectment.”—(Mr. Plunket.)

The Attorney General for Ireland

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he could not accept the Amendment, as it would be directly contrary to the paragraph they had just passed.

MR. GIBSON said, he did not think the right hon. and learned Gentleman had seized the point of the Amendment. Its object was to introduce certainty for uncertainty, as to the redemption period. The period, he thought, ought to be within six months of the date of the judgment decree. As the Bill stood, during the redemption period the landlord was practically unable to do anything with a farm. He could not effect any permanent improvements. He must leave it often derelict and worthless to himself and to the community, in consequence of the instability of the redemption period. At present they could not tell when the redemption period would begin, as it ran, not from the certain date of the decree, but from the uncertain date when the landlord might be able to execute it. He did not think that the objections as to the question of antecedent drafting were at all affected by this proposal. The earlier portion of the section gave the power of selling to the tenant. He had no objection to the insertion of the words “subject to the aforesaid rights of the tenant;” and, whatever might be his own opinion, he did not now question that the purpose of the Amendment was what was done in the 1st sub-section of Clause 13. In the case of tenancies subject to judicial rent, he certainly thought the landlord should have the redemption period fixed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) admitted that there was a good deal in what the right hon. and learned Gentleman had said; but the practical difficulty was met by the landlord putting back the tenant as a caretaker. However, whether the period of redemption began with the date of the eviction or the date of the judgment, the same difficulty existed during the interregnum. He hoped that any great difficulty which had hitherto existed would be overcome by other parts of the Bill. The difficulty had arisen in this way. The tenant not being able to sell, and his only hope being the chance of getting a sum of money in some other way, the landlord was left, to a certain extent, in a state of uncertainty; but now the tenant, when pressed by the landlord for the rent and unable otherwise to pay, would, within the time allowed him, sell his tenancy, and then everybody would be happy. The landlord would get his money, and the tenant would have something left in his pocket. It would be better to leave the clause unaltered. The period of six months was already given after the execution of the decree. That was contained in an earlier clause. The tenant might sell his holding; but what was now proposed was to cut down the redemption period; and that was entirely contradictory of the first part of the clause, which gave six months as the period after eviction. All that was proposed in this Amendment was that after judgment, or where a decree had been executed, the landlord should hold the land discharged of the tenancy.

MR. MARUM thought the effect of the Amendment would be to cut down the six months; but six months was an equitable period, and he objected to the Amendment, which would be contrary to all principles of equity.

MR. GIBSON asked permission to withdraw the Amendment; but stated that on Report he should present in a clearer way, and earlier in the clause, an Amendment challenging the whole principle of this redemption period, because he did not recognize that when they were doing everything for the tenant they should do nothing to simplify the rights of the landlord.

MR. P. MARTIN mentioned that in the Fixity of Tenure Bill of the late Mr. Butt, instead of the six months' period for redemption, the tenant was given the six months additional to pay his rent. The tenant thus could not be sued in ejectment for non-payment of rent for some 18 months. Now, under the present system, the tenant had the same time to redeem; but if unable to meet his rent, the useless and unnecessary costs incident to an ejectment and the execution of the habere had to be incurred. Having regard to the fact that under the provisions of the present Bill the tenant had the right of sale, he considered additional reasons now existed for giving effect to the course suggested by Mr. Butt. Let the right of redemption be abolished, and tenants have that period of six months within which to pay the year's rent, without being subjected to the costs of an action of ejectment. This would be infinitely preferable to the complicated proceedings under this Bill, with all the costs which would be thus unnecessarily incurred prior to the selling of the tenancy. He would suggest that the hon. Member should propose that period when the Amendment was brought up again.

MR. MACARTNEY hoped an alteration would be made in the clause. If the landlord obtained a decree of ejectment he had to go and take possession. He then put the tenant back for six months, during which he might redeem the farm; and it would be simpler that the decree should give possession to the landlord in six months from the date of the decree, and that the tenant should have the right to go on until then.

THE CHAIRMAN: The last two speakers have discussed provisions that are not in this proposal at all. The Question is whether this Amendment shall be withdrawn.

MR. MACARTNEY thought he was quite at liberty to discuss an alternative to the Amendment, and said he had heard several suggestions made by other hon. Members of a similar kind.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Sir MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY, Amendment made in page 10, line 25, after the word "holding," by inserting—

"But subject to the provisions herein contained such application shall not invalidate or prejudice such judgment or decree which shall remain in full force."

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made in page 10, line 28, after "tenant," by inserting "and on such terms and conditions as the Court may direct."

On the Motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Law), Amendment made, after sub-section 2, by adding, "or in the case of ejectment for non-payment of rent redeem the tenancy."

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT, in moving to introduce, in page 10, line 28, the words—

"Provided always that the Court shall be satisfied that such enlargement of time will not prejudice the landlord in the recovery of any rent or arrears of rent due to him or otherwise,"

said, that they had heard a proposal made by which the landlords were to lose a certain amount of their arrears by a certain payment being made to them; but he was quite certain that neither the right hon. Gentleman nor the Government would wish that that should be a precedent, but that they would wish all arrears of rent which were justly due to the landlord should be fairly and properly paid. There had lately been an exceptional period, which, of course, made a difficulty; but all hoped that this time would not recur in the future. It was because he believed that it would be unfair, unjust, and unwise that the landlord should not be able to recover his arrears, that he moved this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

"In page 10, line 29, after "sale," insert the words "Provided always that the Court shall be satisfied that such enlargement of time will not prejudice the landlord in the recovery of any rent or arrears of rent due to him or otherwise."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he did not think the hon. and gallant Baronet, on reconsideration, would deem the Amendment necessary. The clause as it ran now read—

"Where the sale of any tenancy is delayed by reason of any application being made to the Court, or for any other reasonable cause, the Court may, on the application of the tenant, enlarge the time during which the tenant may exercise his power of sale."

That made it clear that there must be a reasonable application, and that anything unreasonable, as prejudicing the right of the landlord, would be refused. The Court had also power to impose any conditions it thought fit before granting an application. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. and gallant Baronet would be satisfied with that provision.

MR. MARUM pointed out that this was not a compulsory proposal, but simply that if the landlord and tenant agreed an advance should be given. It was not a proposal cutting down rent, but an arrangement which the landlord might accept if he pleased.

Question put, and negatived.

Sir Walter B. Barttelot

MR. GIBSON proposed, in page 10, line 30, after the word "tenant," to insert the words "of a present tenancy."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he did not think the Amendment necessary, for unless the Bill was completely altered the right of appealing to the Court to fix a judicial rent would be confined to the present tenant.

MR. GIBSON said, he was aware that in the earlier drafting of the Bill no one but the present tenant could appeal, and that the future tenant could not appeal; but that was just his point. If hon. Members would read the drafting of the clause, they would find that it was an unqualified declaration, which might give a new right. It was in order to guard against that that he proposed this Amendment.

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made, in page 10, line 34, after the word "framer," by inserting "in such terms and conditions as the Court may direct."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he proposed to introduce a new paragraph after the last Amendment. The object of the clause was to enable the Court, in the case where an ejectment was brought for breach of the statutory conditions other than the non-payment of rent, and where the Court was satisfied that the landlord could be fully compensated by damages, to deal with the case accordingly. He proposed, therefore, that where notice to quit could be served by the landlord upon the tenant during the statutory term consequent upon a breach of the statutory conditions, the tenant might, at any time before the commencement of the actual proceedings, apply to the Land Commission, and, if ejectment proceedings had commenced, might apply to the Court to stay them; and then, if the Court or Commission was of opinion that adequate compensation for breach of the condition could be made by compensation, the tenant should be relieved of the liability to eviction on payment of damages to such an extent as the Court might award. There would then be no injustice done. It would, in effect, be simply the introduction into the clause for the enforcement of the statutory conditions the usual power given to a Court of Equity.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 41, at the end, to add as a new sub-section, the words,—“(4.) Where a notice to quit is served by a landlord upon a tenant for the purpose of compelling the tenant to quit his holding during the continuance of a statutory term in his tenancy in consequence of the breach by the tenant of any statutory condition other than the condition relating to payment of rent, the tenant may, at any time before the commencement of an ejectment founded on such notice to quit, apply to the Land Commission, and after the commencement, or at the hearing of any such ejectment, may apply to the Court in which the ejectment is brought, for an order restraining the landlord from taking further proceedings to enforce such notice to quit.

“If the Land Commission or Court to which such application is made are of opinion that adequate satisfaction for the breach of such condition can be made by the payment of damages to the landlord, and that the tenant may justly be relieved from the liability to be compelled to quit his holding in consequence of such breach, the Commission or Court may make an order restraining further proceedings on the notice to quit, upon the payment by the tenant of such sum for damages as they shall then, or after due inquiry, award to the landlord in satisfaction for the breach of the statutory condition, together with the costs incurred by the landlord in respect to the notice to quit and the proceedings subsequent thereto.

“If the Land Commission or Court are of opinion that no appreciable damage has accrued to the landlord from the breach of such condition, and that the tenant may justly be relieved as aforesaid, they may make an order restraining further proceedings on the notice to quit, upon such terms as to costs as they may think just.”
—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. LITTON observed, that the object in view seemed quite correct, except in one particular; and he would propose to add, after the word “thereto,” a second paragraph—

“Provided the Court may, if it think fit, in place of awarding payment to the landlord, direct the amount awarded to be laid out in making good any injury to the holding when the breach of the condition complained of relates thereto.”

It was true that a remedy was afforded by the clause; but it might so happen that the landlord might take the amount awarded and put it into his pocket, and allow the injury to remain a continuing injury where it affected a matter of repairs. It would be desirable that the Court should have the power to direct that that amount could be expended in restoring premises to their proper condition. That was the form of the Proviso he moved on the 4th clause, and he thought it would commend itself to the Committee.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

In line 20, after the word “thereto,” to insert the words “Provided the Court may, if it think fit, in place of awarding payment to the landlord, direct the amount awarded to be laid out in making good any injury to the holding when the breach of the condition complained of relates thereto.”—(Mr Litton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be inserted in the proposed Amendment.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he did not see that there was any necessity for the Amendment; but he was not unwilling to accept it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he saw no reason for the Amendment. The Court had power to award damages for breaches of conditions, and he did not think the Committee ought to travel beyond that. If this Amendment were accepted it would only give additional grounds for litigation between landlord and tenant.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY regretted that the Attorney General for Ireland had adopted the Amendment without further discussion. The Amendment would have no effect except to complicate the Bill, and that would greatly tend to litigation. If the Amendment were adopted, it would necessitate the appointment of a number of surveyors to determine how the money was to be laid out.

MR. HINDE PALMER observed, that the terms of the clause as to statutory conditions were very strict as against the tenant, who was to be subjected to forfeiture upon breach of any of the statutory conditions, some of which were very technical. The object of the clause was, as he understood it, that if the Court thought that, notwithstanding the breach of conditions, the landlord could be placed in the same position as he had been, the tenant should not incur liability to ejectment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am afraid the hon. and learned Member is going to a point which is not in the Amendment.

[Twenty-first Night.]

MR. HINDE PALMER added that he thought the Amendment hardly went far enough. His idea was that where a restoration was to be made in regard to damages or otherwise the Court should, if it saw its way to doing so, relieve the tenant from forfeiture. This mode of amending the Amendment did not go as far as he could wish; but, to a certain extent, it effected the object of the Amendment which he had prepared to move at an earlier stage of the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR pointed out that one of the statutory conditions related to deterioration of the soil, and asked how it would be possible for a tenant to pay a sum of money to be spent in restoring the soil? It took years to restore the soil, and it could not be done by lodging a sum of money in Court.

MR. LITTON remarked, that this was only a permissive and alternative clause, and that it was not necessary that the Court should direct that the money should be laid out in restoring the premises. The soil could be restored by the Court ordering money to be spent on manure for the land; but the point was that power should be given to the Court to have the damages awarded laid out as it thought fit. He believed it would have the contrary effect to increasing litigation. If the landlord was to have a sum of money paid to him he would always be on the watch for an opportunity of making a claim, and that was to be strongly deprecated. If, however, he knew that the Court might order the money to be laid out on restoration, he would not have that inducement. It was to the interest of the tenant to be sure that the money would be expended on the land, and to the interest of the landlord to have his premises restored to their former condition.

MR. SHAW said, he would suggest the introduction of more general words, instead of special directions. He thought it would be better to give the Court discretion to apply the money in some way for the benefit of both parties.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the last argument of the proposer of this Amendment was that the Court should be at liberty to expend the money to be paid into Court in certain agricultural operations at its own discretion. That would make the Court an agricultural machine for the whole of Ireland; but who were to be the skilled agriculturists who were to superintend these operations under the Court? Were they to be the County Court Judges? Were they to instruct the tenant how to lay out the money? The hon. and learned Gentleman had left the Committee totally in the dark on that point, and all he could make of the proposal was that it was to whittle away still further the security of the landlord. The Amendment cut directly against the statement of the Prime Minister that the Bill did not contemplate setting up perpetuity of tenure, and he hoped it would be withdrawn.

MR. GIVAN observed, that the Amendment gave an alternative to the Court to award damages, if it thought fit, where notice to quit had been served, and, instead of giving the money to the landlord to put in his pocket, to direct that it should be laid out in making good the breach of conditions. Surely the hon. Member for Cork County did not mean that the Court should wander from the specific complaint of the landlord and direct the money to be laid out in something else. He was opposed to statutory conditions; and he thought the Amendment, coupled with that of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), would so alleviate the stringency of the provision as to take away its effect altogether.

MR. GIBSON said, he questioned the wisdom of the Amendment to the Amendment, for there was nothing a Court so rigorously guarded itself against as making itself responsible for expending money. It was easy to say the Court should direct the money to be spent on the holding; but if they did that they must impose, as a corollary to it, the responsibility of seeing the order carried out. What machinery had the Court for doing that? He thought it would be better if the hon. Member would be satisfied with the discussion, and re-introduce his proposal on Report.

MR. MACARTNEY thought the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), that landlords would be on the watch for grounds of claim, an extraordinary one. Was a tenant to make compensation for the taking away of turf by sending the landlord so many cart-loads of turf, or so many cart-loads of stone for stone taken out of a quarry, or was the spreading of so much manure over the land to be compensation for deterioration of the soil? It seemed to him that the argument of the hon. Member was one of the strongest possible arguments for the proposal of the Attorney General for Ireland, for it would interfere with what had been already done.

SIR JOSEPH M-KENNA said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not persevere with the Amendment, and urged him to adopt the suggestion to bring it forward again on Report, so that it might be discussed after the Committee had seen it on the Paper. Having had a good deal of experience in such matters as a landlord, he believed the Amendment would lead to more litigation than any other Amendment of as many words in the Bill. A small fine in money would be sufficient to deter a tenant from injuring a holding.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he thought the Amendment a very innocent one; but he felt it would be better not to press it to a division.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) admitted that the proposal was deserving of consideration, and if the hon. and learned Member would withdraw it he would undertake to consider it before Report.

MR. LITTON said, he would assent to the right hon. and learned Gentleman's suggestion.

Amendment to Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 21, to leave out the word "appreciable," in order to insert the word "substantial."—(Mr. Givan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'appreciable' stand part of the proposed Amendment."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. Law) said, he could not accept the Amendment.

Amendment to the Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Amendment again proposed.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON said, he had now to offer a short criticism on the Amendment, and give the reasons why he could not support it. He objected to the Amendment because, in the first place, it retained a notice to quit, which was a long and most dilatory process, as the sole means by which a landlord, no matter how much aggrieved, could enforce the statutory conditions. He did not think it fair to tell the landlord that the only remedy he had was one which could only fructify in 12 or 15 months after the grievance complained of; but that was what was sought to be stereotyped in the early part of this Amendment. What was the power to be given to the tenant? Not the power of speedily going to the Court and asking relief. Suppose a landlord was compelled to serve notice to quit, what was it that the tenant might do to intercept the remedy of the landlord? They did not say that the tenant must come with all possible speed to the Court, and ask to be relieved on payment of damages or the performance of the just conditions of his statutory term. Nothing of the kind; but they proposed to give him, by the studious and deliberate drafting of the Amendment, not only the period of 12 months during which the notice to quit must run, but, as the proceedings could only be taken at the expiration of the 12 months' notice, and this might involve another period of six months, he would have a period of 18 months in which to make up his mind. If they gave an equitable right to the tenant to step in and interrupt the plain legal right of the landlord, they ought, at all events, to see that some equivalent should be conferred on the landlord. He would now come to another point that had been raised on this question—he referred to the question of sub-division. If there was one thing in the previous discussions that had taken place on this Bill that was clear and plain, it was contained in the statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, when he had, over and over again, in the clearest possible manner, indicated, in accordance with the requirements of simple justice, that he did not propose to hand over to the Court the power of making any decision enabling sub-division or sub-letting without the consent of the landlord. But, according to this Amendment of the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, the Court

would be enabled indirectly to sanction sub-letting without the landlord's consent, because it was not proposed to except from the operation of the clause, or the relief proposed to be given in case of the breach of statutory conditions, sub-letting, or sub-division. There was, in point of fact, nothing in the Amendment to indicate in any way that a tenant sub-dividing or sub-letting his holding might not claim the intervention of the Court, if the landlord, in the assertion of the right given to him by the earlier clauses of the Bill, were to say—"I cannot permit that; that is a power which no landlord having the slightest regard to his own interest would ever permit a tenant to exercise; I therefore serve you with notice to quit as a remedy in protection of my rights." There was nothing to indicate that the tenant might not, under such circumstances, apply to the Court to exercise its power of restraint over the notice to quit. In fact, under this Amendment, it was proposed to give the Court power to say to the landlord in such a case—"We consider that this is an objection you have no right to make. It is true that there is a statutory provision which says there is to be no sub-letting or sub-division without the landlord's consent; but we have the power given to us to say that that means nothing, and that this is a matter which we can decide as one of appreciable damage." He would ask, was this construction of the Amendment what was really intended. Because, if it were not intended, then the drafting of the Amendment had been so defective that unless it were altered it must of necessity work serious injustice to the landlord. In the earlier part of the Bill this matter had been discussed, and the Committee had refused to delegate to the Court the slightest control or means of fettering the action of the landlord in this matter. He therefore put it to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, was it meant by the wide manner in which this Amendment had been drafted to undo what the Committee had already done, and to do what the Government had said, at least half-a-dozen times over during the progress of the Bill, they would not do? He confidently asserted that the sub-section under discussion included in its terms power to the Court to indirectly condone or sanction sub-letting; that it gave the Court power to tell the landlord who might seek to assert his dominion over a farm that was being sub-divided or sub-let—"You may have damages if the Court thinks there is a case for damages; but if the Court thinks, in its discretion, that you have incurred no substantial damage, or that the damage is something less than 'appreciable,' it may regard the sub-letting that has taken place as a matter that may be compensated for, or treated as working no appreciable harm, and may make an order restraining further proceedings on the notice to quit upon such terms as to costs as the Court may think fit." It was obvious that this was an Amendment so prejudicial to the landlord's interest, and so subversive of the principle that had heretofore been laid down, that he was unable to give it any support. There was another matter of great importance, showing that the equitable power of relief proposed to be given to the tenant was absolutely and entirely one-sided. If it were fair to give the tenant—and he did not dispute that it would be unreasonable for the landlord to avail himself of what he might call a mere technical breach, which was a matter dealt with by an Amendment of his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley)—if it were fair to give to the tenant an equitable right of this kind, they ought to put the landlord in the position of being able to say to the Court—"I have served a notice to quit that must run under the law for 12 months, and which cannot give me possession until after further legal proceedings have been taken. This man on whom I have served the notice is, in the meantime, ruining my farm, and is employing the time which the notice gives him to make the land utterly worthless to me; give me a remedy." The Government ought, in the equitable clause which enabled the tenant to go into Court and ask for relief, to enable the landlord also, when there was a grievance which threatened the destruction of his farm, to say to the Court—"Give me an order, although the notice to quit is running, at once to resume possession, so that I may save my farm from absolute ruin." This would be fair and even-handed justice;

but it was not proposed to do it, and this was another reason why he was not able to give this sub-section any support whatever. He would offer one other observation. It had been said over and over again by hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House that this was a relief from forfeiture. This was not a proper way of putting it. It had been pointed out by the Prime Minister that it was not forfeiture, but the power of directing the tenant to sell. The tenant had power, under the earlier portion of the clause, to sell at any time, so that the Committee were dealing not with a forfeiture, but with a clause that would compel the tenant, on breach of the statutory conditions, to sell. He would support the Amendment to the clause that was to be moved later by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley), which presented the question fairly and reasonably to the Committee; and, of course, when that Amendment came on he was certain that his right hon. and gallant Friend could accept any Amendment that would render it more satisfactory to the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin had quite forgotten to take notice of one of the leading provisions in the Amendment before the Committee, which ran in these words—

“If the Land Commission or Court to which such application is made are of opinion that adequate satisfaction for the breach of such condition can be made by the payment of damages to the landlord, and that the tenant may justly be relieved from the liability to be compelled to quit his holding in consequence of such breach, the Commission or Court may make an order restraining further proceedings,” &c.

So that if the Court is of opinion that the injury to the landlord will not be fully satisfied by money damages, it might give its decision to that effect. It would be entirely discretionary to the Court after having heard the arguments upon it pro and con. This seemed to him to be a thoroughly reasonable Amendment, and he held that the objections made to it were entirely outside it. He had often thought that this matter of sub-letting would be possible between present and future tenants. He thought no real arguments had been urged against the Amendment in the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and he hoped the Committee would agree to it.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he was very much inclined to think that the proposed Amendment of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley) met his views of the real position of the case much better than the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton). He thought the better course would be for the last-named hon. and learned Member to withdraw his Amendment, so that the Committee might come to that of the right hon. and gallant Gentleman, which he believed would more nearly meet the justice of the case.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he would answer one or two of the grounds on which his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson) had objected to the Amendment. He had first dealt with the case of sub-letting and sub-division; and he thought he could relieve the question of all difficulty with regard to these breaches, by the simple statement that the statute prohibited sub-letting and sub-division, and consequently any such act by a tenant would be absolutely void, and the Court would have no power to make such a transaction good. When the Courts found that a statute said it should not be lawful to do a thing, any attempt to do it had been held to be absolutely void; so void, indeed, was it, that in the case of an assignment without the consent of the landlord, when required, the landlord could not even sue the assignee for rent. Therefore, sub-division, sub-letting, or assignment without the consent of the landlord, might be regarded as simple nullities. Under the 8th clause, too, the Court would have power to require the tenant to undo the sub-letting before it gave him the relief he sought. With regard to the time during which the notice to quit would run, it was not intended to give the landlord any new power. He hoped the Amendment would be accepted by the Committee.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said the matter was one that certainly involved great difficulty. His right hon. and learned Friend was perfectly accurate in his statement when he had said that the Court would have power to deal with cases in which there was sub-letting. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had said that this would not be the case; but he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) could only read the language of the Amendment, which said—

“If the Land Commission or Court are of opinion that no appreciable damage has accrued to the landlord from the breach of such condition, and that the tenant may justly be relieved, as aforesaid, they may make an order restraining further proceedings on the notice to quit, upon such terms as to costs as they may think just.”

That was plain and simple English language, and surely it gave power to the Commission or Court to deal with a case of sub-letting. The Court under that section might think it right that a 100 acre farm should be divided, and that the tenant ought not to pay damages for such sub-division. To empower the Court to take it out of the landlord, and authorize what he had striven to prevent during the whole time he had had possession of his estate, was neither equitable nor just. He asserted that this question was involved in the Amendment; and he held that sub-division, as carried on in many instances, especially in the West of Ireland, was a curse to the country. The Prime Minister, up to that moment, had endeavoured to provide that sub-division should not take place; but now they had an Amendment moved by the Attorney General for Ireland which would enable sub-division to proceed, and which gave the Court power to sanction it in cases where it might not be thought to be detrimental.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, there was no doubt that this clause did weaken the effect of the statutory conditions. He was not sorry to see some of the statutory conditions weakened; but he was exceedingly sorry to see the statutory condition against sub-division or sub-letting weakened in any way. As it was, no tenant could sub-divide or sub-let his holding without the most positive knowledge that he was doing that which was contrary to the law. There was no doubt that there was a class of tenants whose condition was the cause of much of the difficulty that had to be contended with; and the sub-division going on among this class in the West of Ireland was, as had been said, a curse to the country. To allow the feeling to grow up in the mind of the tenant that he might continue to sub-divide in the quiet and unostentatious manner in which he was at present doing it, and might afterwards trust to the clemency of the Court to get him out of the difficulty, would be highly injurious, not only to the property so dealt with, but to the tenants themselves. He had a tenant on his own property whose rent was £20 a-year. He had a fine farm of good grazing land, and was a prosperous man. He had four sons; and when he died, the sons wished to sub-divide, each to have a farm of the value of £5 a-year. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) very foolishly, and with absurd good nature, permitted them to do this; and what was the consequence? Two of those tenants had ever since been in a position of absolute pauperism, and the whole family were constantly quarrelling with each other, and there was no peace in the neighbourhood, and, except in the case of one of the brothers, who had some money, there was no prosperity. The same sort of thing would go on if this sub-section were carried. The tenants would do with the Court exactly what his tenants had done with him. They would sub-divide, and trust to the Court to condone the offence. He had condoned the offence; in fact, hitherto no one could help himself in such a case in the West of Ireland. He should like to know how was the Court to get rid of the persons who had been put on the land which had been sub-divided? If they resorted to the process of eviction, they would have all the difficulties which had arisen before with regard to eviction. He earnestly hoped that as the Attorney General for Ireland had excepted from the sub-section one of the statutory conditions—namely, the payment of rent—he would also except sub-division. He wished to see it impressed on the minds of the people that they must not sub-divide their small holdings, and hoped that in the interests of the small tenants in the West of Ireland the sub-section would be accordingly amended.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to put a question to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. What the Committee wanted more information on was this. It was clear that the tenant ought not to sub-divide or sub-let, and the Attorney General had said it was illegal.

Supposing a tenant had sub-divided or sub-let, and the landlord wanted to turn him out, and the tenant then went to the Court for relief, according to the sub-section the Court could declare that no appreciable damage had accrued to the landlord from the breach of the statutory condition, and might make an order restraining further proceedings on the notice to quit. In the earlier part of the Bill the Committee decided clearly that without the consent of the landlord no sub-letting or sub-division should take place, even with the consent of the Court. What he wanted to know from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was whether the landlord might not, under this Amendment, find himself saddled with tenants who might sub-let or sub-divide, and where he might not be able to show appreciable damage, the Court might grant relief as against the landlord?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that sub-letting or sub-dividing, one or the other, was alike forbidden by the Bill. It was not a mere matter of contract; it was a statutory prohibition. Any act of sub-letting or sub-division would therefore be simply void; and if people were in under it for 20 years, they would have no better title than if they had been in but for a day. Well, then, how was it to be got rid of? What would happen? The landlord would serve notice to quit, and the tenant would go to the Court for relief. By the statute, every application of the tenant was to be considered on its merits, and might be acceded to or not upon such terms and conditions as the Court thought fit. Suppose there was a sub-tenancy created, or attempted to be created—for without the landlord's consent such a thing could not exist in point of law, but only physically—and an attempted sub-division of the land, which again was a wholly illegal act, he did not believe that any Court would consider that the tenant could be justly relieved from such a wholly illegal act for which, technically, he could be prosecuted, unless he did his best to undo the wrong that he had done. His right hon. and learned Friend opposite and others seemed to confine their attention too much to the first point—namely, the question of damages. But there was a second and more important condition that the tenant must perform before he could get relief, and that was to show that he had a just right to relief; and a man who had deliberately broken the statute would not be entitled to relief. It was difficult, of course, dealing with a general clause like that, and statutory conditions of varying importance, to deal with them all in general words; and he did not see how to deal with them except by transferring to a proper tribunal the task of considering whether a particular case was entitled to relief or not. But what were they to do if they did not give to the Court the power to deal with a technical breach of the statute? Suppose a tenant did commit a breach of that kind—that, for instance, he had sub-let for a few days, but undid the wrong before he went to the Court—was the landlord to be at liberty to insist upon the technical breach he had committed, though the sub-letting had remained in force, say, only for a week? It might be said that no decent landlord would do so, and he did not think there were many who would; but such things were possible, and they must give the tenants some security against some landlords who would do so. The only way, therefore, to proceed was to devolve upon the Court the obligation of saying whether the tenant, under all the circumstances, could be justly relieved from forfeiture, and also to give them the power of imposing on the tenant any terms which they might think just. All the conditions except non-payment of rent were liable to be enforced by a notice to quit, followed by ejectment. He supposed it was not intended that for a mere nominal breach the tenant was to be left at the mercy of his landlord, as there were some, though he trusted but few, who would take advantage of it. If, therefore, they did not wish that for some technical breach, such as sub-letting for a day, the man should be without the slightest redress, let them leave the matter to the Court. Before the Court could act it must be satisfied that the tenant was justly entitled to relief; and no man could justly claim to be relieved from the consequences of his own acts if he persisted in those acts, knowing them to be illegal. He thought they might fairly trust the Court to deal with a matter of that kind.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the last sentence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was very different from his opening declaration that by the law, as it stood, and by that Act, sub-letting and sub-division were absolutely illegal, and, therefore, could not receive the relief purposed by that Amendment. By the last sentence, he concluded that the Attorney General for Ireland did look to certain cases of sub-letting which might be included in the provisions of the Amendment. Now, he should like very much to know which of these views the Committee was to understand was the real view entertained by the Attorney General for Ireland? The view placed before them by the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) was very clear and distinct. If the Attorney General meant that sub-division should be prevented by law and by the Amendment he had just submitted, he would suggest that the whole of the difficulty the Committee found itself in sprang from the phraseology of the first few lines of the Amendment. In the first few lines it was stated distinctly that where a notice to quit was served by a landlord upon a tenant for the purpose of compelling the tenant to quit his holding during the continuance of a statutory term in his tenancy in consequence of the breach by the tenant of any statutory condition other than the condition relating to payment of rent, the tenant might, at any time before the commencement of an ejection founded on such notice to quit, apply to the Land Commission, and after the commencement, or at the hearing of any such ejection, might apply to the Court in which the ejection was brought, for an order restraining the landlord from taking further proceedings to enforce such notice to quit. Well, now, what must be the conclusion the tenants would draw from that phraseology? They would say—"This clause is intended to relieve us from any one of the breaches of the statutory conditions with the single exception of non-payment of rent." Therefore, if it were the intention of the Government not to permit sub-division and sub-letting, he should say, in fairness to the tenantry, it was right that the words should be enlarged, and that sub-division and sub-letting should be made an exception, as non-payment of rent was already made. He would suggest, when they came to the Report—if the Amendment were carried, which he hoped it would not be —that the Attorney General for Ireland should insert words to that effect.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he really did not feel the difficulty which the noble Lord suggested about the matter, nor did he admit the irreconcilability of his statements. As a legal act, sub-letting and sub-division were null and void; but the fact remained, and perhaps the transgressor was on the land. That was not a legal question, but was simply a matter of fact. What the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry) wanted to know was what would happen then? The holder would have no legal title to the land, and the man who put him there could evict him at once. That had been done before. The difficulty of the noble Lord was to know how his words were consistent. How was the difficulty to be got over if the people were there and the land parcelled out? Under the clause of the Bill as it stood the performance of any condition might be required, and the tenant must show that he was justly entitled to the relief he asked for. Well, his answer to that was that no man was entitled to relief if, after having endeavoured to break a statutory condition and transgress the law, he insisted on still maintaining his unlawful position. But if he had undone the wrong and got back into the land, as soon as he had discovered that he had done wrong, and had then been proceeded against by ejection for the breach of condition, he ought to be deemed entitled to relief. The whole thing would work without the smallest difficulty. With regard to the exception made for the case of non-payment of rent, there was a reason for that exception, because there was a difference of proceeding in it as contrasted with other breaches. In cases of non-payment of rent there was the special form of ejection, with its complete provisions for redemption of the holding. They were now merely asked to allow the tenant in other cases to go to the Court and show that the landlord would be in just the same position as ever he was by the payment of damages, and that the tenant was justly entitled to relief, and to provide that if the Court were satisfied on those points, then they might grant the relief sought.

MR. GIBSON said, that his right hon. and learned Friend had just remarked that they might trust to the discretion of the Court. But he said that they could not trust the discretion of the Court if they allowed it to override what they had previously said should rest absolutely in the sanction of the landlord. Supposing a man on a farm of 200 acres were to sub-let it to four thoroughly respectable solvent men. It might be true that under the words "it shall not be lawful" they would have no legal estate; but if they had the possession the landlord had only the power of serving them with a notice to quit on which to found an ejectment. What good was that to him? The only remedy he had they took away by giving the Court the liberty of saying—"You have suffered no appreciable damage; you have four solvent tenants on your land, and therefore we will give you nothing."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he wished to call attention to the second condition, which was, that the tenant must be justly entitled to the relief he sought.

MR. MARUM said, he would not go into the details of the matter. He thought the objections to them had been satisfactorily answered. But, upon the general principle of the measure, he must remind the Committee that one of the greatest objections to the Bill was the difference between these present and future tenancies, which made the severity of the statutory conditions. Public opinion with regard to the acceptance of the Bill in Ireland depended very much upon the question of whether the severity of the statutory conditions would be mitigated or not. He assured hon. Members that that question was so strongly felt that a meeting of the Catholic hierarchy had been held, at which a most emphatic resolution was passed and forwarded to the Prime Minister, asking him to do away with the distinction altogether.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was so greatly against turning any man out of his holding for breaches of statutory conditions that he would be disposed to go even further than the Bill. He should vote for the Amendment, because he did not think it was a just thing to turn out men on that account. But he should vote with very much greater pleasure if the Attorney General for Ireland would put in some words which would make it compulsory on the Court not to give relief in cases of sub-division until the wrong had been redressed. Almost all the Gentlemen who had spoken in that debate had represented constituencies in the North and South, and they had not spoken of the West. His contention was entirely in the interest of the country. Sub-division was the curse of the Western portion of Ireland, and it was perfectly true that under that Bill sub-division would be illegal and perfectly null and void. It was illegal now; but it went on every day, and they could not stop it. What he wanted was to prevent the notion in the minds of the tenants that it was a thing that could be done, and that they could continue to sub-divide their holdings in the most reckless manner. Let them take the case of a farm at £20 a-year, sub-let to four solvent tenants. The Court might very well say that those four young fellows could just as well pay their £5 apiece as one pay £20, and, therefore, that no such injury was done as would compel those tenants to go out. Well, he thought the very greatest injury was done, not merely to the landlords, but to the tenants themselves. Where lands were sub-divided they became simply homes of pauperism. He would rather that the Attorney General for Ireland should consider on Report whether he could not insert some words which would make clear to the tenant classes that which ought to be made clear to them—namely, that the Court would not sanction sub-division, but that they would compel restitution of the holding in the condition in which it was before it was sub-let.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that before a tenant could go before the Court adequate measures would have to be taken to make everything in the nature of compensation for damage that had been done to the landlord. Those measures ought not to be limited to sub-letting only, but to all breaches of statutory conditions.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that if that were the opinion of the Prime Minister and his Legal Advisers, how easy it would be to introduce some words to carry it into effect at that present moment; and he would suggest that the words should be added—"And that the breach complained of no longer exists." The Attorney General for Ireland had stated that if the breach was in regard to some technical matter it would be very hard to turn the tenant out. But the first thing the tenant had to do was to say—"I see I was wrong, and the breach of which the landlord complains no longer exists." Those words would materially improve the Bill; and he ventured to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he would not add to his Amendment—"And that the breach complained of no longer exists."

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, that it seemed to him that the object of the Amendment was to enable the Court to exercise to some extent the faculty of mercy. Now, in most offences there was a maximum and a minimum punishment; but, without that Amendment, the Court would have no option but to allow the landlord to evict the tenant. A great deal had been said on the subject of sub-division, and they had been told that it was the curse of Ireland. It had been already stated, and it was true that in some cases sub-division was very injurious; and it was equally true that there was great opportunity for sub-division in many parts of Ireland, with great advantage to the public interest. He hoped the Amendment would be passed. He thought it a great hardship that for every breach of statutory conditions there should be only one punishment—namely, eviction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, that he was afraid the words suggested by the hon. and gallant Baronet would not be of any use. It would be difficult to insert the words now; but he was perfectly ready to undertake to consider before the Report, whether they might not insert some words providing that the tenant must restore matters to their former condition.

MR. BIGGAR said, that what the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) seemed to want was that someone else should put the law in motion against the tenants, instead of taking proceedings himself. The hon. Gentleman really had full power to make the tenants do as he wished; but, as he was Member for the County of Galway, he did not wish to have it announced that he himself was taking proceedings, as that would render him exceedingly unpopular among his constituents. He should like to corroborate the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) in stating that in some cases sub-division might be very beneficial, not only to the tenant, but to the community at large, and would certainly not be in the slightest degree injurious to the landlord.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 251; Noes 147: Majority 104.—(Div. List, No. 292.)

MR. BARRY, in moving, in page 11, line 5, after the word "ejectment," to insert—

"Upon a twelve months' notice to pay or discharge not less than twelve months' arrears of rent due at the date of such notice," and "so far as not herein otherwise provided," said, that unless some such Proviso as in this Amendment were inserted, the clause would operate hardly upon some tenants in circumstances largely beyond their control, and there would be no safety for a tenant in arrears. They knew very well that the fair landlords would not enforce the law harshly; but, on the other hand, there were landlords who would do so. Therefore, the effect of his Amendment would be to give the sanction of law to what was done by fair landlords at the present time. It would operate only against the harsh and mercenary landlords, and would not affect the fair landlord, who, at the present time, would not enforce the strict letter of the law. He therefore trusted that the Committee would accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 5, after the word "ejectment," insert "upon a twelve months' notice to pay or discharge not less than twelve months' arrears of rent due at the date of such notice," and "so far as not herein otherwise provided."—(Mr. Barry.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) said, he did not think it desirable to insert the proposed Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR said, this power of ejectment would only benefit the rack-renting landlords. He thought there was no harm in adopting his hon. Friend's Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. GIBSON said, his right hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Stanley) had on the Paper the following Amendment:—In page 11, line 8, after “ejectment,” to insert—

“As in the case of a power of re-entry upon condition broken contained in a lease. Provided always, that the tenant may (except in case of breach of statutory conditions as to sub-division or sub-letting) before any such proceedings are taken by the landlord, or during the pendency of the same, apply to any Court in which such proceedings might be commenced, or in which the same may be pending, for relief, and the said Court may grant or refuse relief as the said Court, having regard to the proceedings and conduct of the parties, and to all the circumstances of the case, thinks fit, and in case of relief may grant it on such terms, if any, as to costs, expenses, damages, penalty, or other matters relative to the breach, as the said Court thinks fit,” and leave out “founded on notice to quit.”

But he thought the more convenient course would be to wait and see how the whole clause would turn out on the Report, and then, so far as they thought it necessary, they would deal with it.

MR. BIGGAR, in the absence of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), moved the following Amendment:—In page 11, at end of Clause add—

“From and after the passing of this Act the fifty-second section of ‘The Landlord and Tenant Law Amendment Act (Ireland), 1860,’ shall be read as if the words ‘two years’ rent’ were substituted therein for the words ‘a year’s rent;’ the fifty-fourth section of the said Act shall be read as if the words ‘two full years’ rent,’ were substituted therein for the words ‘one full year’s rent;’ and the fifty-eighth section of the said Act shall be read as if the words ‘two years’ rent,’ were substituted therein for the words ‘one year’s rent.’ This section of this Act shall not apply in any cases of proceedings in ejectment for non-payment of rent commenced before the passing of this Act.

“So much of the 9th section of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, as enacts that in case of a person claiming compensation on the determination by ejectment for non-payment of rent of a tenancy existing at the time of the passing of the said Act, and continuing to exist without alteration of rent up to the time of such determination, the Court in said Act mentioned may, if it think fit, treat such ejectment as a disturbance, if the holding, subject to such tenancy, be held at an annual rent not exceeding fifteen pounds; and if the said Court shall certify that the non-payment of rent causing the eviction has arisen from the rent being an exorbitant rent shall be and the same is hereby repealed. In lieu of the words so repealed, it is hereby enacted that in case of a person claiming compensation under the said Act, as amended by this Act, on the determination by ejectment for non-payment of rent of any tenancy to which said Act applies, the Court in said Act mentioned may, if it think fit, treat such ejectment as a disturbance, if it shall appear to the said Court that the non-payment of rent causing the eviction has arisen from the rent being an exorbitant rent.”

This Amendment would apply to few landlords. A certain proportion of the landlords had been charging excessive rents; and they had got a special advantage by their own misconduct of being able to turn out the tenant without giving compensation. The object of this Amendment was to make that class of landlords give compensation for disturbance. If a landlord were a good landlord charging only a moderate rent for his land, and wished to get possession of his holding for any reason and turn out his tenant by notice to quit, he would have to pay compensation; but, on the other hand, an exceedingly bad landlord, who charged very much more than the land was worth, would be able to put out the tenant without compensation, because the tenant would not pay more than was due to the landlord. In fact, by this clause a premium was given to the bad landlords. For this reason, he thought that this Amendment should be accepted.

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. GLADSTONE hoped that the hon. Member would not persevere with the Motion he had made. The experience gained on this point under the Land Act of 1870 was not of a very satisfactory nature. There was, undoubtedly, a reason for the existence of the clause at a time when the Land Act made no effectual or general provision for getting rid of distress. This was then a great mitigation, or might have been a great mitigation, of exorbitant rents. But as they were now legislating for a machinery for getting rid of exorbitant rent and preventing its recurrence, it appeared to them to be quite unnecessary to keep alive a separate provision which contemplated the continuance of that practice. The proof before the Court had been found to be a matter of difficulty sufficient to deter the tenant to raise the question. They had now made a provision for dealing with excessive rent, and they were disposed to trust to that, and not to keep alive the fact of previous practices. It must be borne in mind that in every case now the tenant would be advantaged. He thought the proposed addition to the clause unnecessary.

[Twenty-first Night.]

MR. BIGGAR said, the difficulty with regard to that was this—the Amendment applied to rents which were now due. It would be a very small compensation to the tenant to sell the interest in the holding, when, in point of fact, the price for the holding would not be more than the arrears which were due. This question of arrears was likely to be discussed at very much greater length at a later stage; and, as a great many Amendments would be proposed on the clause of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he thought it better that this Amendment should not be pressed to a division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN, who had the following Amendment on the Paper:—
In page 11, at end of Clause, add,—

“Provided always that as to any arrears of rent of any agricultural holding not held under lease owing at the date of the passing of this Act, the Court shall have power to stay any proceedings for ejectment for non-payment of such arrears, save as follows:—

“(1.) In any such proceedings the Court shall judge and declare what would have been a fair rent for the holding during the three years next preceding the last gale day in 1880, having regard especially to the circumstances of holdings affected by any general failure of crops within such three years;

“(2.) The Court shall ascertain how much has been paid within the said three years for, or on account of, rent of such holding, and deduct the amount thereof from the amount of the three years’ fair rent declared as hereinbefore enacted; and the balance, if any, remaining may, at the option of the Court, be declared payable in half-yearly instalments over such period as the Court shall determine, and shall, for the purposes of this section, constitute during such period an addition as rent to the rent otherwise payable for such holding under this Act,” said, he had not had the advantage of hearing the very important and interesting statement which was made on the subject by the Government to-day; but he had heard of it. The Committee would excuse him if he thought his clause worthy of the consideration of the Government as a solution of this exceedingly delicate and difficult question. Of course, he was indisposed to put the Committee to the trouble of now discussing this question. He wished merely to ask the Government, between this time and the consideration of the arguments for their own proposal, to take into consideration one feature in his Amendment now before the Committee, which, as he gathered, was not included in the proposals stated to the House that morning—namely, some power to the Court to stay proceedings for ejectment on payment of arrears, where the Court should consider that the refusal on the part of the landlord of the terms suggested by the Government, was an unreasonable refusal. He should, therefore, ask leave of the Committee to withdraw his Amendment at this stage, in the view of considering the Government proposal when it was made later on.

“3. Where a civil bill decree has been obtained for not less than one year’s arrears of a statutory rent, it shall be competent to the plaintiff in such decree to apply for and obtain from the Court making the decree an order that, unless the amount thereof be paid within a time to be named in such order (not being greater than three months from the making of the decree), the interest of the defendant in the statutory tenancy should be sold by the sheriff in like manner as chattel interests in land are now sold under a writ of Fi Fa;

“Provided—(a) That the interest so sold should be assigned to the purchaser by a deed to be executed by the Court which has made the order for sale;

“(b) That the purchaser shall be entitled to an order from the said Court, in the nature of an injunction, from the sheriff to put the said purchaser into possession of the interest which shall appear by the said assignment to have been granted to the purchaser;

“(c) Where a sale takes place under such an order, the landlord shall have no right of pre-emption,” said, the Amendment was an attempt to simplify the procedure; and it was rather more to the interest of the tenant than to the landlord. At present, under a civil bill decree, a sale could not take place without one or two proceedings—an application to a Superior Court, and then a variety of other proceedings of rather an expensive character. This was an Amendment which sought to shorten that, and to provide machinery to control the powers of the Court. It enabled the plaintiff to make an application to the Court which must be made within three months, and then it safeguarded the whole thing by three Provisoes—namely, that the interest so sold should be assigned to the purchaser by a deed to be executed by the Court which had made the order for sale; that the purchaser should be entitled to an order to put him in possession of the interest, and that the landlord should have no right of pre-emption. The Amendment would be largely in favour of the tenant. The Amendment spoke for itself.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that what was proposed was, in effect, a process by which, passing over ejectionment for non-payment of rent altogether, the landlord might be facilitated in selling the tenant's interest by the process of a civil bill decree. No matter what the amount was, he might call upon the Court to make an order. He did not think such a provision was desirable, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, it was proposed to give to the sheriffs a new power which they never had before, to put the purchaser at once in possession, even though the title might be a bad one. Surely that was a power which the law had never before contemplated. It would place too much power in the hands of the sheriff, and he trusted that the Government would never consent to it.

MR. GIBSON said, the Amendment gave no power whatever to the sheriff, for there must be a judicial act. However, after the statement of his right hon. and learned Friend, he did not propose to carry the matter any further at that stage of the Bill.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 14 (Limited administration for purposes of sale).

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL moved, in page 11, line 14, after the word "fit," to insert these words—

"And who shall give such security for the due performance of the duties by this Act imposed upon him as the Court shall consider sufficient."

He thought it was necessary to provide that where the Court appointed an administrator, that administrator should give security, as he would be a person intrusted with the collection of monies, and he might have those monies in his possession for some time.

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIVAN wished to point out to the noble Lord that this Amendment was altogether unnecessary, inasmuch as when an administrator was appointed under the Act by the Court for the purpose of a sale, the money was invariably brought into Court and distributed under the direction of the Court, and it did not go into the hands of the administrator at all.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) explained that under the Land Act no security was required, because, as had been pointed out, the administrator did not carry out the sale.

MR. GIBSON was quite aware that that was so under the Act of 1870; but it had invariably been considered a great mistake, and it was right, in his opinion, that these words should be here inserted. As the clause stood at present, power was given to the Court to appoint an administrator, without there being a single word to indicate that the administrator was to give any security.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) was willing to make some alteration if it were thought necessary; but he wished to point out that the Amendment as proposed spoke of the sufficiency of the security. It would be better, he thought, to leave it to be provided for under the insertion of words "such as they may think fit."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL was quite willing to withdraw the Amendment, if the Attorney General for Ireland would propose another instead, carrying out the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own views on the subject.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) moved, in page 11, line 14, after the word "may," to insert the words "or such terms and conditions (if any) as they may think fit."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. P. MARTIN said, he really must object to the insertion of these words. He was most unwilling to enter any objection to what were merely and simply verbal Amendments; but if they went on amending the Bill in this fashion, and complicating its provisions, he did not know how it was to be worked. How did the matter stand? The very same words which appeared in the Act of 1870 were already in the Bill, and gave power to the Court, if they thought fit, to appoint an administrator for certain specified purposes. Now they had experience of the working of that Act. No one alleged that the clause had worked badly or required amendment. Administrators had been appointed in a great number of cases, and had been found to work effectively and properly—and now Parliament were asked to undo all this for the purpose of inserting an Amendment which the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland had very properly declared, as soon as it was moved, to be totally unnecessary. That was, in fact, a case of limited administration, where the administrator had not to pay debts or distribute the purchase money. He was merely a person who transferred, by virtue of his appointment, a legal title and possession. They were now asked to undo all this which had worked so well, and to insist upon a provision that where an application had been made to the Court for the purpose of setting up a limited administration, the administrator on being appointed should be compelled to give security. He understood that it was the object of the Government to avoid the probability or necessity of litigation in unnecessary cases; but an Amendment such as was now proposed would encourage the making of applications which in many cases would have the effect of seriously injuring the tenant. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. LAW) dissented.] His right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland shook his head; but he (Mr. MARTIN) had had some little experience of the course of litigation not unfrequent between landlords and tenants, and he knew how often it was that personal feelings were engendered on both sides, and that a good deal was frequently done for purposes of spite. Under such circumstances, he did not think the Committee ought to sanction such an Amendment as the one now proposed.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

TURKEY AND GREECE—THE FRONTIER QUESTION.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE inquired whether the Government were in possession of any information as to the occupation of the new Greek Frontier by the Greeks?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I am happy to be able to assure my noble Friend that progress has been made in the negotiations respecting the Greek Frontier. The Convention has been signed by the Greek and Turkish Plenipotentiaries, and General Hamley reported yesterday that the Turks retired that day from Dimario on the left Turkish Frontier, and that the Greeks crossed the Frontier and took possession. All was done in good order.

ARMY—DEATHS BY SUNSTROKE AT ALDERSHOT.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN asked the Under Secretary of State for War, If he could now give any information regarding the casualties which occurred among the troops at Aldershot on last Monday?

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I can now give to your Lordships more information as to what occurred on the field-day at Aldershot last Monday than when my noble Friend put his Question to me on Tuesday evening. As I told my noble Friend on that day immediately the report arrived at the War Office the Secretary of State for War at once called for a detailed account of the circumstances. The field-day was appointed for Monday four or five days previously. On Sunday and Monday, on the Fox Hills, where the field-day took place, it was somewhat hot, but a strong breeze was blowing. The troops went out as usual in field-day order—that is to say, they had nothing to carry except their water bottles. They started after breakfast at 8.30. The manoeuvres were over before 1 o'clock, and until then there were no casualties and few men fell out. About that time, however, the heat greatly increased; and, unfortunately, the usual anxiety to get back to their lines led to the regiments hurrying the pace, and this, in the heavy dust and increased heat, probably caused a good many men to fall out. Of the 19 men who were sent into hospital the greater part fell out then. Unfortunately, four men have died. Three died of sunstroke—one was an old sergeant of Militia, aged 45, who did not fall out; he was somewhat stout, and liable to suffer from the heat. The second was a man of long service, aged 32, and, on post-mortem examination, he was found to be highly predisposed to illness of this kind; the third was a perfectly healthy man, of long service, aged 33. There was a fourth death of a driver, from heart disease; but he was riding on a waggon all day, and had undergone no fatigue, nor did he complain till later in the day. It is remarkable that from the brigade which went over the most ground, and did the hardest work, the smallest number of men, only 12, fell out, and none went into hospital. At a time of exceptional heat all parades take place in the early morning, so that troops may be back in camp before the power of the sun becomes excessive. I do not think that beyond this well-understood rule, attention to which has been especially called by a Circular, issued on Tuesday, the discretion of commanding officers need be hampered. We are all greatly distressed by, and deeply lament, the deaths of these men; but I think I have plainly stated the exceptional circumstances under which they occurred.

LUNACY DISTRICTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(NO. 108.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that on behalf of his noble Friend (the Duke of Buccleuch) he begged to propose an Amendment in the Bill. He thought the Lord Advocate was not the proper authority for making the alteration in the lunacy districts. The Bill proposed that as the Prison Boards did not now exist, the power should be in the hands of the Lord Advocate, acting on the application of the General Board of Commissioners in Lunacy. He proposed to strike out "the Lord Advocate," and make the clause read—

"The General Board of Commissioners in Lunacy in Scotland shall have power, on the application of the Commissioners of Supply, to alter or vary the districts or divide the counties, &c."

He hoped the Government would have no objection to the Amendment, as it seemed a much better proposal for dealing with the question than that the Lord Advocate should have power of varying those districts upon the application of the Commissioners.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he had received no Notice of the Amendment, and he therefore asked the noble

Duke not to press it at present, but to bring it up on the Report.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that in the circumstances he would acquiesce in the suggestion of the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE moved to substitute the Commissioners of Supply of any county for the General Board of Commissioners in Lunacy.

Amendment agreed to.

The Report of the Amendment to be received To-morrow; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 152.)

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 99.)

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH asked the noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie), who had charge of the Bill, if he was now able to give an explanation to the question formerly put regarding the scale of costs which the Bill sought to enact in the Schedule, and which seemed inconsistent with the 4th clause of the Bill, laying it down that the maximum costs should not exceed £1?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, the explanation was that where the costs, according to the scale laid down in the Schedule, exceeded the maximum, the defendant would not be liable for more than that amount, and the surplus would have to be paid by the prosecution.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH said, the explanation did not in any way remove the objections he had to this enactment. It seemed a very extraordinary thing that a Bill was to be passed by this House limiting the amount which the defendant had to pay to £1, and mulcting the prosecutor, the injured party, in whatever extra amount of costs was incurred. While it was desirable to keep down costs when the amount of fine imposed was very trivial, yet why the defendant, who had been convicted, should be released at the expense of the prosecutor, was really an enactment which altogether passed his comprehension to understand. He hoped that before the House would consent to that they would have something in the nature of a justification of this curious enactment.

The Earl of Dalhousie

LORD WATSON said, he hoped the Government would re-consider this suggestion. On referring to the precise terms of the Bill, which was one of a useful character, defining the limits of costs, which were sometimes excessive in these summary prosecutions in Scotland, he found that there was a table of fees, according to which agents were to be paid for conducting those cases. If there were two witnesses, by the smallest scale of expenses the prosecutor's charges out of pocket would amount to £1 12s. 6d. The smallest possible expenses under this Bill would be about £1 5s., and yet it provided that in no instance whatever, when the penalty did not exceed £3, the prosecutor should be entitled to more than £1 of expenses. In short, the Bill enacted that while it was a fair and reasonable thing that the prosecutor should pay on a low scale of charges a sum of £1 10s. 6d., he should only recover £1, or, in other words, he should pay one-half or one-third of the whole costs. A Bill of this sort was always attended with a certain degree of danger. It was a proper thing to cut down the expenses of the law agents who charged too much for certain species of work; but there was a danger of laying down a hard-and-fast rule as to maximum expenses that put it in the power of persons liable to penalties—who were not acting independently, but as members of associations, and who were, therefore, furnished with ample funds for their own defence, or in cases of land and river poaching, offences against the Factory Acts, and others—to harass the prosecutors by protracting the proceedings, leading a great deal of evidence, and so involving them in expenses to the amount of £5 or £6, even according to this scale, so that when the penalty was inflicted the prosecutor would find that he had four or five times as much to pay as the defendant. He suggested that the 4th clause should be re-framed in terms that would prevent such a possibility.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, this was a legal Bill, to discuss which would require considerable legal knowledge on his part. As the noble and learned Lord gave no Notice of the Amendment, he asked him to be good enough to put it on the Paper.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he could not agree that to discuss the proposition of his noble and learned Friend required any legal knowledge. It was a practical matter on which their Lordships were perfectly able to give a judgment; and he believed the Lord Chancellor was well able to deal with it without the noble Earl consulting the Law Officers of the Crown.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, he preferred to postpone the consideration of the Amendment.

Report of Amendment (which stands appointed for this day) put off to Tuesday next.

ENDOWED INSTITUTIONS (SCOTLAND) ACT, 1878—THE PROVISIONAL ORDERS.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, When the five Provisional Orders relating to Endowed Institutions in Scotland, including the new Order for Burnett's Literary Fund, that were presented on the 21st of June, will be circulated: And to move for a Return showing why no Provisional Orders have been issued in the following ten cases in which the Commissioners under the Endowed Institutions (Scotland) Act of 1878 have reported to the Secretary of State: Spier's Trust, Beith; Boys' and Girls' Hospital, Aberdeen; Donaldson's Charity, Stonehaven; Graham Free School, Glasgow; Kellae's Trust, Haddington; Scott or Campbell Trust, Selkirk; Wilson's School, Fauldhouse; Wilson's School, Harthell; Wilson's School, Stane; and Wilson's School, Whitburn? said, he considered this was a Notice of a very important character. He had framed it in rather wide language, and he was not at all prepared to say that he would ask for a Return showing why no Provisional Orders had been issued in the cases named in his Motion; but what he really wanted to know was, what had become of those Orders? With regard to the first part of the Motion, he would like to ask the Government why the Provisional Orders relating to the Endowed Institutions in Scotland, including the new Order of Burnett's Literary Fund, presented on the 21st June, were not circulated? Their Lordships would recollect that in the early part of this Session he called attention to the scheme of Burnett's Literary Fund, and took occasion to speak somewhat strongly of the conduct of the Home Secretary in relation to this scheme; and he thought he was justified in coming to the conclusion that a strong case existed in his favour and against that Department of Her Majesty's Government. Not one word was said in its favour, and the Motion he made disapproving of the scheme of the Home Department was carried without a division. Now, these schemes related to most important subjects, and Parliament was so very careful and jealous with all that sort of property dealt with under the provisions of the Endowed Institutions (Scotland) Act passed in 1878, that all the persons interested in that Act should have every opportunity of being heard upon the subject. A clause was inserted in that Act which provided that the scheme, after being approved by the Secretary of State, should lie on the Table of both Houses of Parliament for 40 days, and if no action was taken anent the scheme during that period, that it should become law. That being the case, it appeared to him that it was the duty of the Secretary of State to see that the provisions of the Act were carried out strictly and to the letter. Now, what had happened in each of the five Provisional Orders to which he had called attention? The Order lists were presented to the House on the 21st June, and it was now the 7th July—that was 17 days—and up to that moment those schemes had not been delivered for their Lordships' consideration. He was told that they had been presented only yesterday in the other House of Parliament; and, therefore, practically by the conduct of the Secretary of State for the Home Department in this case, the parties who were interested in those schemes had been deprived of 16 days out of 40 in which they might make objections and consider what course they should take. He was quite ready to admit that in these days of rapid communication between this country and the North of Scotland such a loss of time was not so important as it would once have been. But it would be admitted that some considerable time ought to be granted to persons living in the extreme North of the Empire to consult together how the schemes affected their own interests, and whether any action, and if so what action, should be taken about it. He had a great interest in Burnett's Literary Fund, and he should have been very glad before now to have had the opportunity of communicating with those who were also interested, as to whether this scheme would be agreeable to them or the contrary. He was by no means saying—he had no means of knowing—that the Burnett Scheme might not have been altered in a manner satisfactory to the Governing Body; but what he did say was, that by the action of the Secretary of State for the Home Department they were deprived of 16 days out of 40 which they had to consider the situation. Now, it seemed to him there must be some most extraordinary influence—he hardly knew how to describe it—at work in the Home Office with regard to the printing and presenting of Papers to Parliament. He had a knowledge of one of the most important Papers, probably, that their Lordships could have before them—the Report of the Irish Assistant Commissioners. That Report was presented to the Secretary of State for the Home Department, through whom it must necessarily come for presentation to Her Majesty, on the 18th January. Of course, when the Commissioners had sent it to the Home Department their duty with regard to it ceased. Their Lordships would be astonished to hear that, notwithstanding the Secretary of State received the Report from the Irish Assistant Commissioners, in a matter of the very highest importance, on the 18th January, it was only printed and circulated on the 6th of July; therefore, there must be something very irregular in the manner in which the Home Office dealt with this question. With regard to the other schemes, though he did not press for a Return regarding them, he was deeply interested to know what had happened to those schemes. The Reports, according to the Commission, had been presented to the Home Secretary. He should like to know where those schemes were. What had become of them? Had the Commissioners been communicated with by the Secretary of State for the Home Department with regard to the action he had taken, or was taking, with reference to these subjects? The first scheme mentioned in his Motion was partly dealt with by the late Government. He had suggested to Sir R. Assheton Cross, then Home Secretary, certain objections he entertained to that scheme, one of which was the large outlay—£16,000—proposed to be made for buildings, and the other that a member of the School Board should be a member of the Governing Body. The latter proposition was stated to be ultra vires, and that question still remained unsettled when the late Government left Office. But why had not the Orders presented on the 21st June been circulated? He noticed some of them were circulated yesterday, so that his Motion had done some good. It had induced the Home Secretary to see that these schemes were circulated. He was told one of them was in their Lordships' House, and that the others would be circulated probably in the course of to-morrow; but he pointed out that great injustice had been done to those parties in having the time in which they could petition against the scheme curtailed in the manner he had described. He would be glad to know what had come of the other schemes which he had enumerated; and whether any, and if so what, communication had taken place between the Home Secretary and the Endowed Institution Commissioners in Scotland, if the Secretary of State was not going to agree with the recommendation of the body?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in reply, said, the noble Duke had really answered the first part of the Question himself when he stated, quite correctly, that one of these Provisional Orders had been circulated that day, and that others would be circulated in a day or two. In the case of the other schemes to which he referred, there had been some difference of opinion—in some cases very considerable difference—between the Scotch Education Department and the Educational Endowment Commissioners. There had not been time to adjust the issue in each of these cases, and the Secretary of State had therefore thought it advisable that they should be postponed, in order to be considered by the new Committee to be appointed by the Bill now before the House of Commons. In the case of two of those schemes there had been strong opposition on the part of certain local bodies.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, the noble Earl did not appear to have understood the drift of the Question of his noble Friend. The objection was, not as to the time the Secretary of State might have spent over a scheme, but that 16 out of the 40 days given by Government as a security and guarantee against bad administration on the part of the Commissioners had been taken away. The Government must provide some remedy against the recurrence of such delay if the terms of the Act were to be honestly carried out.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH wished to say a few words on the matter of the Endowed Schools Commission which had had to do with those schemes. The Chairman of that Commission was detained in Scotland by his judicial duties; and he had requested him, in consequence of this matter being brought forward, to state the facts of a few of the cases mentioned in the Motion. He need hardly say that no Member of the Commission would have thought it consistent with his duty to bring such a matter before the House, because, although they were always glad when the Reports which they had to give in were agreed to and acted upon, still it was a public duty they had been discharging, and it was in no degree a personal question whether any of the recommendations they made were given effect to or not. But there was one point in connection with the way in which these recommendations had been dealt with he should like to bring under their Lordships' notice. They, as a Commission, had never in any single instance received any intimation as to whether their recommendations were to be given effect to or not; and, therefore, they had been wholly unable to give any information to parties promoting those schemes, whether or not those schemes would obtain the sanction of the Government and be laid on the Table of the House. In a matter of this importance, he submitted that the Commission appointed to inquire into these schemes and to make recommendations was not quite fairly treated when they were never informed, either by the Home Office or any other Government Department, whether their recommendations were to be given effect to or not. In the case of Burnett's Trust, for example, their Lordships would remember how a scheme not only not the same as the scheme which the Commission gave their sanction to, but utterly inconsistent with it on many important points, was laid on the Table without one whisper of information that the Commission had dealt with the matter at all, and not a hint was given that an alternative scheme much more in consonance with the Founder's will had been transmitted by the Commission to the Home Office. With reference to the case of Donaldson's Endowment, Stonehaven, of which the annual revenue was £85, it was his opinion that if a Commission could not be trusted to deal with such small sums, it was very little use indeed appointing the Commission. In this case there was no opposition, and no new remit was made to the Commission; although a whole year had passed since the Commission had reported, yet the order was refused. Now, certainly, in such a case, the Governing Body had not been very fairly used. In the case of the Kellae Trust, Haddington, the net annual revenue of which was £37 6s., their recommendation was to vest the fund in the School Board, for the purpose of founding bursaries for children in Haddington, to be competed for by open competition, to be held within the leading school of the town, the sole surviving trustee, who agreed in the proposal, to be associated with the School Board in the discharge of the trust during his life. That recommendation was made on the 6th of August, 1880; no further communication of any kind had been made to the Commission, and yet this Order had been refused. Now, he had seen it stated in the public prints that effect had been given to certain opposition on the part of the Provost and Magistrates of Haddington, who disapproved because no special provision was made for clothing; but he could hardly believe such a thing possible, and he should be very glad to hear from the Government that that had not been the ground of their refusing this Order. He felt it his duty to himself and his Colleagues on the Commission to press, in accordance with what the noble Duke had said, for a full explanation of the principles which had governed the Home Office in refusing their consent to those schemes.

EARL SPENCER said, that, as the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) had observed, the Education Department had no responsibility for the action finally taken in regard to those schemes. That Department, however, was consulted, as the noble Duke well knew, on the schemes when they were submitted to the Home Office. As to the point which the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) had pressed on his noble Friend who represented the Home Office, he had to say that Her Majesty's Government regretted exceedingly that the Papers were not circulated immediately after they were presented. They were not presented, as the noble Duke seemed to think, in "dummy," but were presented entire; and he confessed that it was a matter of regret that they had not been circulated sooner. His noble Friend would inquire into the reasons for the delay; for he admitted that it was highly inconvenient that after those Papers had been laid on the Table they should not have been immediately circulated. With respect to the scheme generally, he would point out that out of the 10 to which the noble Duke had called attention, one of them was dealt with completely under the late Government. The noble Duke said he was not aware what the answer was as to the scheme having been ultra vires. No doubt, he was quite right in that. But that scheme was entirely disposed of by the late Government. Of the remaining schemes, as his noble Friend had said, some of them had not been proceeded with because there was a strong local opposition. As to the others, the Education Department held that there were various objections, in some cases of greater, in others of less importance, to them. Those objections were sent to the Home Office, and in one case the scheme was remitted again to the Commission. But when the Home Secretary found that there was a considerable difference between the Education Department and the Commissioners, and that there was not time for the proper consideration of the subject, he thought that the much more prudent course would be not to deal with it this year. It was not fair to say that there were 10 schemes, because in regard to the case of Wilson's Schools there was a desire evinced on the part of some of those concerned to amalgamate those small funds; and as there was no power under the Act which regulated those matters to make that amalgamation, it was thought desirable to defer the consideration of those subjects to another time. He was glad that the noble Duke had stated that he would not press his Motion as it stood on the Paper, because he (Earl Spencer) believed it would be unparalleled that the reasons why schemes had not been passed should be presented to Parliament.

THE SUGAR INDUSTRIES—PETITION FROM ISLAND OF BARBADOES.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY, in rising to present a Petition from merchants, planters, and others connected with the Island of Barbadoes, said: My Lords, I have taken the unusual course of giving Notice of an intention to present this Petition in order that I might preface that step with a few observations, not only because the Petition is from a distant Colony, and is, therefore, deserving consideration and attention at your Lordships' hands, but also because it expresses the feelings of a portion of Her Majesty's subjects who, like many others at the present moment, are complaining that their interests are adversely affected, and that their industry is being destroyed, by the fiscal action of foreign Powers. The growth of this feeling in the country must be familiar to your Lordships, and it is not necessary that I should dilate upon it. A very remarkable change of feeling has taken place in many centres of industry, and complaints or proposals are being made which, 10 years ago, would have been held impossible. But I will not propose to enter upon that portion of the commercial discontent of the present day which deals with the question of adverse fiscal duties, and which claims retaliatory duties as a protection. It is not necessary that I should discuss that subject; it is one of exceeding difficulty, and I should be sorry to say anything that might be interpreted to be at variance with those principles of commercial policy which this country has deliberately adopted. But the particular case which the planters and merchants of Barbadoes wish to bring before your Lordships, and before the English public, does not deal with the particular class of proposals which are commonly known under the name of Reciprocity. The fiscal measures of foreign Governments give advantages to their own subjects in two ways. They impose duties of protection which exclude our goods from their markets. In that case they give a bounty to their own traders at the expense of their own consumers. The case I have to bring before you does not belong to that class. It is the case of foreign Governments, by direct bounties drawn from the resources of the taxpayer, cheapening products of their own manufacturers and driving the manufactures of other countries, and especially of this Empire, out of the market. Now, the particular country whose legislation in this respect has given cause for the complaint of the West Indian planters is Austria, and the way in which the sugar industry is adversely affected is this. In Austria a tax is raised on the native beet-root sugar, which is largely exported, and a drawback is then given to the exporter; but the drawback is so calculated that it gives a large bounty to the exporter, giving him back a great deal more than he had paid to his own Government, and so enriching him that he is able to go to other markets with sugar at a much cheaper price than those producers who have not received similar advantages can afford to sell at. The result is that the Austrian raw sugar has been supported by the taxes of the Austrian subjects, and has been able to compete more and more with the sugar grown by our own planters, who have not such an advantage to support them. So keen, apparently, has the Austrian Government been in this policy that they actually at one time paid back in drawbacks more than the whole of the duty they received from beet-root. The results have been very severe on the West Indian planters. The consumption of sugar in this country has, as your Lordships know, grown enormously during the last 10 years, owing to the increase in wealth and population and the abolition of our duty; but, notwithstanding that fact, the import from the West Indian planters has been almost absolutely stationary, while the advantage of the State subsidy on the part of Austria is shown by the fact that within the last few years the export of beet-root sugar has increased from 600,000 tons to more than 1,500,000 tons. The sugar bounty question has engaged the consideration of successive Governments; and, after much negotiation with foreign Powers, it was thought by the late Government that the best course would be to allow the matter to be referred to a Committee of the House of Commons. It was so referred, and that Committee collected evidence and considered the matter with great care, and made, last Session, a very exhaustive and able Report on the subject. The Prayer of the Petition, and the considerations which I shall urge on the Government, do not go beyond the proposals of the Committee. I only ask that due attention should be given to these proposals, and that they should not be entirely neglected. The Committee said, and said in very distinct language, that very serious damage is being done by the policy of foreign Governments to which I have referred. It appears from the Report that much of the sugar industry of the West Indies has been destroyed, and that 50 sugar-growing estates have been abandoned; while, in 1879, 36 such estates were advertised for sale without purchasers being found for them. All the witnesses on this branch of the subject agree in looking for the general abandonment "of sugar cultivation" if the present state of things continues. If this is the consequence of the action of any foreign Government over whom we have any influence, the matter is one for the grave consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and ought to be dealt with before it is magnified into a very great grievance. It is impossible to mention such a state of things without bearing in mind a similar grievance which exists with reference to sugar refining. It is exactly the same complaint, applied to another branch of the same trade. The French Government gives a drawback to the sugar refiners who export the produce of their industry. That drawback is calculated too high, and the result is that a very considerable bounty is given out of the French taxes to those who export it, and the French refiner is able to sell at a price which utterly undersells and destroys the profits of the English manufacturer. The consequences have been, in the same way, most lamentable. Five or six years ago there was a very flourishing sugar-refining industry in this country. The competition of the French refiner, supported by the bounty out of the French taxes, has driven the English refiner out of the English market, and all the establishments which existed five or six years ago have now been closed, and the trade is absolutely destroyed. Now, do not tell me we are bound, by the principles of Free Trade, to look on coldly and calmly and see this destruction of British industries accomplished, because if you lay down that principle broadly and strongly, and say that nothing shall induce you to interfere when a foreign Government is destroying British industry, you may be quite sure that these undertakings which have been hitherto so successful will be imitated in other industries, and industry after industry will be destroyed by the co-operation of the foreign Governments with the foreign manufacturer, against which the British manufacturer is absolutely powerless. The foreign Government, practically speaking, is illimitably rich. It enters into partnership with its own manufacturers. It invests its property in the promotion of their industry, and the British industry, undefended as it is, must necessarily go down. If it really is the case that considerable benefit to the consumer results from this policy, that will, no doubt, be a very material consolation, and grounds for hesitating very much before pronouncing an adverse opinion; but the benefit to the consumer is, in reality, transient. It is always open to the foreign Government to enter into partnership with its own manufacturers to destroy British industry altogether and make British capital unproductive, and then, when that is done, there is no necessity that the bounty should be continued. Capital will not be invested in industries of this kind unless there is some prospect of stability of conditions, and if industry is always liable to be destroyed by a sudden incursion of a foreign Government using the taxes of its own subjects for the purpose of destroying that industry, the British capitalist will not risk his capital by sinking it in the machinery and buildings necessary for carrying on the trade. I cannot pass on without remarking that the French Government have made a further step along this path already. There is already a bounty given upon ships, sailing and steaming, and it is given in proportion to the amount of tonnage they actually carry. I do not know what effect these new measures will have on the British industry of shipbuilding; but it is looked on with considerable alarm, and I mention it as an indication of the policy which is guiding foreign Governments, and as a danger against which our own manufacturers and Government have to contend. It is well known that one of the great difficulties—as was pointed out in a memorable speech delivered by the Earl of Beaconsfield some years ago—is the network of Favoured Nation Clauses which now exist, and which would hinder us from taking any isolated action. The reason why I wish to press this subject on the Government at the present moment is because the Committee, at the close of their Report, make some important proposals. They recommend Her Majesty's Government to institute careful inquiry into the matter, and, in the event of its being found impossible to arrive at an International agreement for the suppression of bounties, they were prepared to recommend the adoption of such a course had it been practicable under our existing Treaties; and they were of opinion that on the renewal of those Treaties the opportunity should be taken of making such alterations as would leave Her Majesty's Government at liberty to deal with the question. With reference to the negotiations which are now going on with France, I think Her Majesty's Government are bound to see that some arrangements are made—if they do make a Treaty—for redressing this great injury under which a once flourishing British industry and a considerable number of workmen are now suffering. But they may go further. If they agree with the French Government in this matter of the sugar refiners I have very little doubt that Austria will be disposed to come to terms. The matter is one for negotiation, and, if advocated by England and France combined, there will be a greater chance of success than if urged by England alone. I earnestly trust Her Majesty's Government will not simply neglect the matter and pass by on the other side. There is a cry arising for remedies which may perplex the ablest statesman to discover and apply. I know that a great authority, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—the same authority who, 30 years ago, was so fond of telling us that all nations were likely at once to adopt Free Trade—now tells us that a demand for measures of a reciprocal or retaliatory character is a sign of lunacy. I have no wish that any action should be adopted inconsistent with sound Free Trade; but I should hesitate to apply the name of lunatics to those not of my own opinion, because I fear we should be in the awkward position of finding there are more people lunatics in the world than sane—an observation which always exposes to some doubt the sanity of the person who makes it. I do not think that by calling people lunatics Her Majesty's Government will stop this cry or apply any real remedy to the evils which exist. If they neglect it, if they do not take some pains to remove such grievances as these, I fear they will find themselves confronted, before long, with a political problem with which they will have some difficulty in dealing.

Petition for countervailing duties upon foreign sugar imported under bounty into the United Kingdom; of Planters, Merchants, &c. of Barbadoes—Presented (The Marquess of SALISBURY).

Petition read.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the noble Marquess gave a Notice which I will venture to read:—"To present a Petition from merchants, planters, and others connected with the Island of Barbadoes." Well, I wondered what might possibly be the subject which the noble Marquess intended to bring before us, because there are a good many different questions connected with Barbadoes. I then obtained the information that the subject had some connection with the sugar bounties. It seemed to me that upon a matter of such importance as one connected with Free Trade and Reciprocity, Notice should have been given that that was the subject which was about to be brought forward. I do not complain of the course taken by the noble Marquess so far as I am concerned; but, no Notice having been given, your Lordships were not prepared for the speech which the noble Marquess made. The noble Marquess said he would not go into the question of Reciprocity, or say anything which would be inconsistent with the principles of that commercial policy which has been adopted by this country; but the greater part of his speech, I thought, was intended to encourage those who wish to see those principles departed from. He attacked my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, one of the principal English advocates of Free Trade principles, and insinuated that the time would come when it would be wise to embark on a course of Reciprocity and Retaliation. I wish the noble Marquess had stated more fully what policy he was in favour of, because if he were in favour of Reciprocity and Retaliation, he might have indicated how that policy was to be pursued, and whether he would be prepared to introduce the system. I, for my part, think it is a great error to blame persons who happen to differ from me and others on the subject of Free Trade, because it is undoubtedly true that a very large number of educated men are still in favour of the policy of Protection; and we ourselves, not a very long time ago, thought it was a sound system. But if we are to discuss this question, let us discuss it face to face, and not on such a Notice as the noble Marquess has given. I have not lost faith in Free Trade, and I believe it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to form a practicable Tariff on this subject which can be submitted with any confidence to any body of men, and by which the Reciprocity system can again be introduced. The difficulties of the West India planters are of old standing. They are connected, as is well known, with the system of industry in that region and with many other causes. I sympathize with them, but I confess, as a consumer in this country, I am not altogether in favour of a movement which seems to be directed to taxing the consumers of sugar in this country, and especially to encourage the production of West India sugar. The noble Marquess has not given your Lordship any figures, but I understand him to say that there is a considerable decrease in the production of sugar in the West Indies.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, what I said was that the importation of sugar had, during the last few years, practically stood still; and whereas the importation of beet-root sugar was formerly 600,000 tons, it was now 1,500,000 tons.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The impression made on my mind during the speech of the noble Marquess was that there had been a great decrease in the production of sugar. However, the Petition presented to the House is from the planters of Barbadoes, and I will venture to ask the noble Marquess whether, in the face of the figures which I will read to the House, he will venture to say that the production has decreased? From a Return of the production of sugar in the West Indies, it appears that the average production of the West Indian Colonies for the five years ending 1869 was 166,000 tons, for the five years ending 1874 it was 181,000 tons, and for the four years between 1874 and 1878, 200,000 tons. There had, no doubt, at the same time, been a large increase in the production of beet-root sugar. For the three years between 1870 and 1873, which was the time when bounties began to affect the production of sugar, the average crop of cane sugar was 246,000 tons; between 1876 and 1879 it had fallen to 242,000 tons; while the corresponding figures for beet-root were 966,000 tons, and 1,607,000 tons. In Barbadoes, during the first term, the production of cane sugar was 91,544 tons; and during the latter three years, when bounties were said to have destroyed the production, it had risen to 132,000 tons. It is, then, rather remarkable that a Petition should be presented from Barbadoes asserting that the industry of the Island is seriously affected. It is quite true that the production of beet-root sugar has increased much beyond that of the sugar cane; but in Barbadoes, British Guiana, and Trinidad, although the sugar cane industry has not advanced so much as beet-root, it has progressed, and there is no symptom that it will decay. But there is another important consideration. When the financial position of these Islands is talked of, their condition as a whole ought to be regarded, and not merely with reference to one production. There has been a large increase in the production of cocoa in many of the West Indian Colonies, and, as I am informed, the production of cocoa, which is more profitable than that of sugar, is increasing to a remarkable extent in some of the Islands. It is the more important for the reason that the increased cocoa production has taken place mainly in those Colonies in which the sugar production has declined. The question of refined sugar, which is a very difficult and complicated one, is being inquired into with very great care, and, as far as the inquiry has gone, it has not been found that the number of persons employed has very largely decreased. The most important part of the speech of the noble Marquess was that in which he threw out general and vague hints that it might be desirable to embark in a system of retaliation. Does this indicate that the Party of which the noble Marquess is the Leader are about to demand a reverse of the Free Trade policy of this country in order to return to Protection? I hope that when the noble Marquess makes up his mind on this subject he will give us fair notice of the fact, in order that we may have a full, fair, and free discussion of the subject.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he did not see that the speech of the noble Marquess was open to the suggestion just made, or he would have formulated his Notice in different terms. It was scarcely possible to consider such a question as that raised by the Petition presented to the House without referring to the general topic of Free Trade, which just now so largely engrossed public attention. The case of the West Indian Colonies was an extremely hard one, and all the harder because the resources of those Colonies were naturally very great, and they could supply a very large portion of the demands which this country could make upon them if it were not for the somewhat unfair action of the Government of a foreign country. The French bounty system was one which inflicted undeserved hardship upon the trade of this country, a considerable branch of which it threatened to destroy. A very curious picture was presented by the present state of things. On the one hand we had large Kingdoms forming themselves into great commercial unions, self-supporting and independent of others, as was being done by France, Germany, and the United States. On the other hand we had the English Empire, scattered over the whole of the world, the different parts containing different products which each other part desired, but the parts kept separated from each other by different and sometimes by adverse Tariffs. More than this, we had almost the whole of Europe at this moment entering into a combination to get as much as they could for themselves, and as much as they could of what we had. France, in particular, had entered into a partnership with her own manufacturers to impose such a duty as must obviously have the effect of ruining the industries of this country in her market. There were, no doubt, several conclusions which might be drawn from that state of things which were quite apart from the question before the House. The first result was that the country was now touching a new phase and form of this question, and we had arrived at a new point of departure in the negotiations for the French Treaty to which his noble Friend had alluded. It was perfectly clear, as his noble Friend had said, that the consumer in England was not likely to gain anything from these bounties, and for this obvious reason, that until the necessity for the continuance of these bounties ceased, the foreigner would get a hold of the English market, and make his own terms. The English trade thus destroyed by him was one which demanded a vast amount of capital, and, though it might be destroyed in a few years, could not be re-established in a short time. He ventured, therefore, to hope that the Government would consider very carefully the conclusion which had been arrived at not long ago in the other House of Parliament, which was to the effect that unless we were to obtain a Treaty, not merely equivalent, but superior to that of 1860, it would be better to have no Treaty at all. He, for one, heartily agreed in that opinion. He had always had grave doubts as to the whole policy of Commercial Treaties, and in those doubts he expected many noble Lords opposite would concur. Certainly, unless a better Treaty were obtained than that of 1860, he thought it would be better that we should be perfectly unfettered.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not rise to continue this discussion, which, as my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has said, has been brought upon the House very much in the nature of a surprise. I entirely join in the protest of my noble Friend, and I think that if the noble Marquess intended to raise this most important question, he ought to have given us some indication of what he meant to do. I looked at the Notice Paper, as it is my duty, and when I read the Notice of the noble Marquess, I thought he was going to bring before your Lordships some local grievance with which my noble Friend near me would be able to deal. But I had not the most distant idea, nor do I think that anyone could have conceived that the noble Marquess was to a great degree about to raise the standard of Protection, under colour of the more plausible names of Retaliation and Reciprocity. That policy would have a great effect, a most mischievous effect, upon this country. My Lords, there is nothing that I could desire more than that this subject should be brought before your Lordships and worked out completely. But I do protest against two noble Lords settling between themselves to have this discussion without the Notice which it was proper to give. Could anyone imagine that if your Lordships had known generally that this subject would be brought before you, there would have been so few noble Lords present? Why, we should have assembled in large numbers on such a question as this. The only thing I have some satisfaction in hearing is the statement of the noble Lord opposite (the Earl of Carnarvon) that he would prefer no Commercial Treaty at all to one which would put our commercial relations in a worse position than that in which they are now placed. No doubt, Treaties of Commerce are an exception—it would be better to have no Treaties of Commerce. But the existing Treaty was made in peculiar circumstances, and was intended to give the two countries an opportunity of seeing what could be done with a greater relaxation of trade. If this subject is to be treated in such a manner that our commercial relations will be put in a worse position than they are now in, I think it would be infinitely better to have no Treaty at all.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, I only wish to say that I deny in the most categorical manner that I raised the standard of Protection, Retaliation, or Reciprocity. What I did was to urge the noble Earl at this juncture of the negotiations with France, to exercise his diplomatic ability for the purpose of protecting British industry and Colonial property, which are just now suffering from a deep grievance at the hands of Foreign Powers.

QUESTIONS.

NAVY—THE ROYAL MARINES—THE ORDER OF THE BATH.

MR. LEWIS asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he would state for what pre-eminent services the officer lately selected for promotion to K.C.B. in the Royal Marines is distinguished; whether it is not the case that the officer so selected has never served out of England since he was comparatively a junior lieutenant; and, whether there are not officers of the Royal Marines who have distinguished themselves in the command of battalions abroad and of brigades before the enemy, and whose services have been mentioned in Despatches, followed by C.B. and brevet rank of Colonel; if so, were their claims for further distinction not lost sight of when an officer who never served abroad except in the subordinate rank of lieutenant, and years junior to them in the Order of the Bath, was selected for promotion to K.C.B.?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir George Langley, K.C.B., was selected for that distinction, for long, faithful, and able services on the Staff of the corps of Royal Marines, and in early life he was highly distinguished in action. With regard to the rest of the hon. Gentleman's Question, I cannot undertake the responsibility of commencing what seems to me an innovation—comparing the relative claims of officers who have and who have not been recommended to Her Majesty for the honour of knighthood.

IRELAND—PRINTING THE "ANNALS OF ULSTER."

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state what progress has been made in printing the "Annals of Ulster," the publication of which was directed nearly three years ago?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the work would be begun during the present month.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—UNDERTAKINGS BY PRISONERS RELEASED.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether there is any difference in the form submitted to Mr. Farrell, J.P., on his release from prison under the Coercion Act, to that which has been submitted to any other political prisoner; if he will say since when these forms have been in existence; whether all prisoners on their release have been obliged to sign them; whether they have been tendered to any prisoners who have refused to sign them; and, whether any form was submitted to, or signed by, Mr. James Daly, of Castlebar, on his release?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the forms in question had been in existence since the 7th of last month. Prisoners released before that date were not required to sign any undertaking. None of the prisoners to whom the undertaking had been tendered had refused to sign it. Mr. James Daly was discharged on the 8th of May, before the form was brought into use; but, on being discharged, in view of the critical state of his health, he voluntarily tendered an undertaking that his future good conduct would justify the clemency of the Government.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—CASE OF MR. MARSHALL.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the prison doctors have made any report on the case of Mr. Marshall, a prisoner confined in Kilmainham, and said to be suffering from disease of the brain, causing the most intense pain?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the medical officer of Kilmainham had made a report with regard to the case of Mr. Marshall, from which it appeared that the complaint from which the prisoner suffered was a constant headache.

The medical officer was unable to detect any organic disease, and his general health had not suffered since his imprisonment. He had consulted with two other medical gentlemen, who were likewise unable to discover any organic disease.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman was aware that the general impression in the prison was that the man was mad?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had not heard of such an impression.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—THE COURT OF APPEAL.

MR. GREGORY asked, Whether arrangements have been made for completing the Court of Appeal, and filling up the vacancy caused by the death of Lord Justice James?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he thought that this Question was answered by what had occurred in the House of Lords. A Bill had there been introduced for the purpose of filling up the vacancy, by making the Master of the Rolls sit in the Court of Appeal.

THE JUDICATURE ACTS—REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE.

MR. GREGORY asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether any Report or Recommendations have been agreed upon by the Committee appointed to consider the operation of the Judicature Acts, and the procedure under them; and, if not, when such Report or Recommendations may be expected?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that the Report and the Recommendations were made some seven or eight weeks ago. They had been circulated by the Lord Chancellor among the Judges, in order that the Committee of Judges might act on the Report. The Lord Chancellor thought it better to place it in the hands of the Judges before he laid it on the Table.

SPAIN AND ENGLAND—GIBRALTAR—THE NEUTRAL GROUND AND MARITIME JURISDICTION.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Under Secretary or State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any objection to state the names of the Commissioners, officers or others, on both sides, engaged in deciding the limits of Gibraltar?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: It is not quite correct to describe these negotiations as relating to the limits of Gibraltar. They relate to the question of maritime jurisdiction. The negotiations are not sufficiently advanced for me to make any detailed statement on the subject.

THE NEW FRENCH GENERAL TARIFF.

MR. JACKSON asked the President of the Board of Trade, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Letter he has addressed to the Chambers of Commerce with reference to the English translation of the French Tariff, asked for by the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool; and, if he will give a list of the Chambers to which he has written?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, that if the hon. Member wished for this Return, and moved for a copy of the Circular, and also for copies of the replies that had been received, he should be very glad to give it, as an unopposed Return. He might say that the Circular had been addressed to 59 Chambers of Commerce, and the Board of Trade had received 20 replies—7 of the replies being in favour of having a translation, and 13, including the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce, against it.

LAW AND POLICE—THE MURDER ON THE BRIGHTON RAILWAY.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has made any inquiry into the conduct of the police with regard to the recent murder upon the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway, with a view of ascertaining on what grounds they allowed the man Lefroy, who must have been intimately acquainted with the circumstances of the murder, to leave the place where he was staying, without their knowledge; and, whether he is in a position to communicate the results of such inquiry to the House?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: It is a grave matter to pass judgment on the police. Although, of course, I have made inquiries into this matter, I should not consider myself justified at present in passing final sentence on the conduct of the police in this matter. At the same time, it is right that I should state that, as regards the Metropolitan Police, they cannot be regarded as directly responsible in the affair. The knowledge of this matter did not come to the authorities of the Metropolitan Police until after the escape of Lefroy. The police constables who had to do with the matter before were Sergeants Potter and Holmes. Although it is true that they are borne on the books of the Metropolitan Police, they are, by an arrangement which has hitherto been made, placed at the disposal of Railway Companies, who pay these officers; and although it is true that they still remain nominally members of the Metropolitan Police, for the purpose of pension and otherwise, they are not acting under the direction of the authorities of the Metropolitan Police. I doubt whether it is a good practice at all that persons who have passed out of the immediate jurisdiction of the Metropolitan Police should continue to belong nominally to that Force while they are attached to bodies like Railway Companies. I doubt whether in such a case their connection with the Metropolitan Police ought not to be severed; for, otherwise, the Metropolitan Police become nominally responsible for the actions of persons who are not under their control.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked, whether, as this was a matter that affected the public confidence in the Police Force generally, he would communicate the results of the inquiry to the House?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Certainly; it is my desire that the truth should be known as regards all concerned. It is necessary that the public should have confidence in the Police Force, both in London and elsewhere.

ARMY — DEATHS BY SUNSTROKE AT ALDERSHOT—THE WINDSOR REVIEW.

MR. H. R. BRAND asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that the troops at Aldershot were seven hours under arms during the greatest heat of the day on Monday 4th July, and that the result has been that four men have died from this exposure, and many more are in hospital invalided from the same cause; and, if this is the case, whether he will take steps to prevent in the future the exercise of the troops in summer weather at such unreasonable hours; and, whether any provision has been made for the shelter of the Volunteers engaged in the review on Saturday, who will in some cases be under arms from twenty-four to thirty-six hours? He wished also to ask a Question of which he had not given Notice—namely, Whether a great many of the men were not paraded at 7.30 on Monday, and whether they had to march in some cases four miles before the operations began; also, whether there were any water-carts accompanying the regiments in this review?

MR. MACFARLANE also asked whether the Secretary of State was aware that the troops at Wellington Barracks were being drilled on Monday, the warmest day of the year, at 2 o'clock in the day, without having anything but a skull cap on?

MR. CHILDERS: The Questions last put to me are Questions of which I have not had previous Notice, and I cannot undertake to answer them at present. With regard to the other Questions, I have to say, first, that as soon as I heard of the deaths at Aldershot on Monday last, I called for full information on the subject, and the following are the facts:—A field-day had been appointed for the 4th instant some days before, and the weather at Aldershot on Sunday and Monday being cloudy, with a strong breeze on the Fox Hills, the troops went out as usual in field-day order—that is to say, carrying nothing except their water bottles—at half-past 8, after breakfast. The manoeuvres were over before 1 o'clock, and until then there were no casualties, and few men fell out. About that time, however, the heat greatly increased, and, unfortunately, the usual anxiety to get back to their lines led to the Regiments hurrying the pace, and this in the heavy dust and increased heat, probably caused a good many men to fall out. Of the 19 men who were sent into hospital, the greater part fell out then. Three died of sunstroke—one a very stout man of 45, who did not fall out, and two men of long service, aged 32 and 33, one of them found, on post-mortem examination, to be highly pre-disposed to illness of this kind. The third was a healthy man. There was a fourth death of a driver, an officer's servant, from heart disease; but he was riding on a waggon all day, and had undergone no fatigue, nor did he complain till later in the day. It is remarkable that from the Brigade which went over the most ground and did the hardest work the smallest number of men—only 12—fell out, and none went into hospital. In reply to the next Question, I find that there is nothing in the Queen's Regulations limiting the hours for parades or exercises in this country; but it is well understood, and the practice is universally acted upon, that at times of exceptional heat all parades are to take place in the early morning, so that troops may be back in camp before the power of the sun becomes excessive. I do not think that, beyond this well-understood rule, attention to which has been especially called by a Circular issued on Tuesday, the discretion of commanding officers need be hampered. We are all greatly distressed by, and deeply lament the deaths of these men; but I think I have stated plainly the exceptional circumstances under which they occurred. With reference to my hon. Friend's last Question, it may interest the House to know what precautions have been taken as to the Volunteer Review by the Quartermaster General, who has been for some time past engaged in preparations for the comfort of the men taking part in the Review. With respect to the conveyance of the 52,000 men to Windsor, the Railway Companies have heartily co-operated with the military authorities, and all practical arrangements have been attended to. As to the supply of food during the day, this has always been arranged by the commanding officers of the respective regiments; but we endeavoured to help them by suggesting to some large firms accustomed to such business that they should establish booths for the sale of provisions on the ground, under arrangements with the Ranger of the Park. We found, however, that no well-known firm would undertake this; and it was then settled to revert to the ordinary plan, which seems most acceptable to the corps themselves; and I have authorized, as a special and exceptional arrangement, having regard to the unusual number of men assembled on the ground, the issue of a ration allowance of 1s. or 2s. a-head, according to the distance the men have come. Ample supplies of water and large blocks of ice will be in the rear of each division and at the railways, and great attention has been paid to the medical arrangements, both on the ground and at the stations. Should the day be very hot, care will be taken to keep the men under the trees as much as possible. I must apologize to the House for giving so long an answer; but it is perhaps justified by the public interest in this matter.

MR. H. R. BRAND said, he would be much obliged if the right hon. Gentleman could direct inquiries to be made how it was that the men were not able to take a rest after the Review, and before they returned?

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought he could answer that Question now. Nothing was more disagreeable to the men than not to go back promptly to their dinner; and certainly the greater part of the casualties which occurred took place directly in consequence of that somewhat natural desire, after being out all the morning, to get their dinners as soon as possible.

ARMY ORGANIZATION (THE AUXILIARY FORCES)—SERGEANT-MAJORS OF VOLUNTEERS.

COLONEL KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Sergeant Majors of the Volunteers, appointed as such before the Royal Warrant of 1878, may be allowed to retain their rank and enjoy all the advantages accruing to them under that title, as regards pension?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir. This question was fully and carefully considered by my Predecessor; and I am not prepared to alter the decision, which only gave to Volunteer corps an acting sergeant-major.

ARMY ORGANIZATION SCHEME—RULE 77—COMPULSORY RETIREMENT.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, If officers who entered the service above the age of twenty from the Militia, or as University candidates, and in whose favour a relaxation is made in the age of compulsory retirement, by Rule 77 of the New Army Reorganisation Scheme, will be allowed to benefit likewise by Rule 49, and consequently become available for regimental and staff employment up to the age of forty-five?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; those officers will be able to do what my hon. Friend suggests.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS).

SIR CHARLES FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether deputations from trading communities can be received now that the proceedings of the French Commissioners have been suspended; and, if not, whether any facilities can be afforded for making representations as to the manner in which particular trades will be affected by the proposed Treaty?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The sittings of the Royal Commission for the purpose of receiving deputations are for the present suspended; but the Commissioners will be very happy to receive any written representations which particular trades may have omitted to send in.

AFRICA (WEST COAST) — THE WAR WITH ASHANTEE — PAYMENT OF FINE.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is correct, as stated in the papers, that the 2,000 ounces of gold dust imposed as a fine on the King of Ashantee have arrived in this country; whether, as also alleged, the celebrated Gold Axe of Ashantee, an article held in great reverence by the King and people of that country as "an emblem of high sovereignty," and forming no part of the exacted indemnity, has, by the repeated importunities of a trading captain, Captain Barrow, been delivered up and brought to England as a present to the Queen; and, whether Captain Barrow was invested with any official authority to treat with the King of Ashantee for the surrender of this article?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that 1,200 ounces of gold dust had been received out of 2,000, and that bonds had been taken for the remainder in six months. Papers to be laid before Parliament would show the circumstances in which the King of Ashantee had decided to send the Gold Axe. The King stated that he surrendered it on the understanding that it would be sent to England to the Queen. Captain Barrow was not in the Merchant Service, but was a distinguished military officer who had acted as Political Secretary, and had been sent on various missions in the interior.

MR. HEALY asked whether the British Government claimed the right to exact tribute from every unhappy African King?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir.

MR. RICHARD asked whether Captain Barrow had any authority to treat with the King of Ashantee for the surrender of the Axe?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Captain Barrow was authorized to treat with the King of Ashantee, but not to demand the surrender of the axe.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND) — MAIL
TRAINS TO THE SOUTH AND WEST — STOPPAGE AT THURLES.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Postmaster General, Whether he has received several applications from public bodies and private individuals begging him to permit the mail trains to be stopped at Thurles, and thus enable passengers and mails to be more conveniently and speedily transmitted to Clonmel and other districts by the new line of Railway recently opened; whether he is aware that the line was constructed on a guarantee on the rates of the County; and, whether, considering the interests of the ratepayers, and the convenience of the public, he can now accede to these applications?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he had carefully considered the applications referred to in the Question, and found that no public advantage would ensue from complying with them. The disadvantage of stopping the trains would be that it would cause the trains to arrive somewhat later at Cork and Limerick. This would delay the letters, and would probably be inconvenient for the passengers. He was very sorry he could not accede to the request.

FOREIGN JEWS IN RUSSIA — EXPULSION OF MR. L. LEWISOHN, A NATURALIZED BRITISH SUBJECT.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Report of the Law Officers of the Crown on the case of Mr. Lewisochn has been received; and, if so, whether the illegality of Mr. Lewisochn's expulsion is confirmed by that report or not; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will alone, or acting in conjunction with those Powers whose Jewish subjects have been similarly ill-treated, address a protest to the Russian Government on the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have received a preliminary Report from the Law Officers of the Crown, and communications on the subject are passing.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND)— SCHOOL CHILDREN.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has had his attention called to the Report of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, for the year 1880, just placed in the hands of Members; whether he has noticed the following statement with reference to the great increase in the daily average attendance of pupils:—

"This unusually large increase of 33,503 in the average attendance is to a considerable extent due to the benevolent operations of the Committee organised by her Grace the Duchess of Marlborough, the Mansion House Committee, and the 'New York Herald' Committee, who, in the early part of the year, supplied clothing and rations of food to destitute children in the schools of the impoverished districts;"

and, whether, looking to the impossibility of dealing permanently with this sad form of want in Ireland by means of private benevolence, he will advise the Government to take into consideration the necessity for making some arrangement by which a ration of food shall be given daily, at the public expense, to destitute children attending school in the impoverished districts?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had seen the extract quoted by the hon. Member, but feared that if he acted on the suggestion he should be introducing a most important change. To give daily rations of food at the public expense would virtually be to give outdoor relief, and the hon. Member would at once perceive the great danger of taking such a course.

AGRICULTURAL DISTRESS (IRELAND) —REPORT OF THE DUKE OF RICHMOND'S COMMISSION.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a Report, issued to Members on the 5th July, drawn up by the Assistant Commissioners on Agriculture, and dated 1st January 1880; whether he has noticed the following statement in the Report with reference to the condition of the people in many parts of Ireland:—

"A succession of bad harvests has prevented them from paying up their accounts regularly. In this way debts have accumulated until many of the small farmers have come to owe the shopkeepers and others four, five, six, and even ten times the amount of their annual rent;"

whether he has noticed, amongst others, the following statements:—

"It appears to us that no industrial system could flourish under such conditions as we have described. Our experience justifies us in saying that there are many thousands of small farmers in Ireland who are paying away as interest an amount equal to the rent to their land;"

and again,

"We have already visited hundreds of these farms, and found the occupants of them in so deplorable a condition that we feel unable to describe it in a way which would enable His Grace (the Lord Lieutenant) to realise it fully;"

whether, looking to the fact that the revelations contained in the Report would, if supplied in time, have afforded valuable information to Members in considering the Irish Land Bill, he can inform the House why it was kept back so long; and, whether any further Report has been made by the Assistant Commissioners; and, if so, when can it be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he thought the hon. Member had asked him this Question by mistake. It ought to have been asked of some Member of the Duke of Richmond's Commission. That Commission was not under the control of the Irish Government. He supposed the hon. Member was induced to ask him the Question because of the presence of the words "His Grace" in one of the extracts. The words "His Grace" referred to the Duke of Richmond, and not to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

MR. DAWSON: The Report referred to was addressed to the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had the Report in his hand, and it began by stating—

"In accordance with your instructions, we submit to the consideration of His Grace the President of the Royal Agricultural Commission, &c."

ARMY DISCIPLINE AND REGULATION ACT.

VISCOUNT EMLYN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he can now lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of the Rules made by him under the provisions of the Army Discipline and Regulation Act, for the punishment of serious offences committed by soldiers upon active service?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; but I hope to be able to do so before the end of the month. I have not received all the strictly confidential opinions for which I applied to officers of experience in command; but I expect these inquiries will be completed in a few days.

TURKEY AND GREECE—THE FRONTIER QUESTION.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the evacuation of the first section of the territory to be ceded to Greece by Turkey not later than July 5th 1881, under the stipulations of the annex to the Convention of May 24th 1881, has been duly carried out?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: A telegram was received yesterday from General Hamley stating that the Turks had retired from the Frontier, and that the Greeks had crossed and taken possession. All had been done in good order.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (IRELAND—CO. CLARE.

MR. O'SHEA asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the smallness of the sums of money granted from any of the sources recently available for such purposes, towards the improvement of the fishing harbours and creeks in Clare; whether representations have been made to him as to the extraordinary way in which the fishermen of that county have availed themselves of every chance that has been afforded them, and as to the alacrity with which they have paid rents and other debts, out of their earnings under the first revival of their industry; and, whether under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government are disposed to afford any further facilities for the improvement of some of the fishing harbours and creeks on that dangerous coast?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Until I read my hon. Friend's Question, my attention had not been called to the smallness of the sums assigned to County Clare. I may say, however, that the apportionment of the recent Canadian and Parliamentary grants of £60,000 was made on the recommendation of a Special Committee, which carefully examined the proposals brought before it, and the Treasury have no reason for thinking that the claims of County Clare were not duly weighed. I have no special knowledge of the condition of the fishermen on that coast. Considering the terms on which the special grant of £45,000 was made last year, I cannot at present make any promise with respect to further free grants. Any application for a loan on sufficient security, however, will be carefully considered.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—FOREIGN COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

MR. JACKSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, following the precedent of 1872, when M. Kindt was present as the representative of Belgium at the discussions in Paris between the British and French Commissioners to settle the Compensatory Duties, Her Majesty's Government will take steps to secure that a representative of England shall be present at the Conferences about to be held to discuss the terms of Commercial Treaties between France and Belgium, and between France and other countries?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE. I would beg leave to point out to the hon. Member that there is no precedent in the case of the negotiations in 1872 for what he proposes should be done now. When M. Kindt was present at the discussions between the British and French Commissioners in that year, a Treaty between this country and France had already been signed, and it was considered that the presence of a well-qualified and impartial Belgian official would facilitate an agreement as to the rates of the Compensatory Duties. In the present case, however, no Treaty has been signed; and I can hardly think it probable that the French Government would consent to the unusual, if not unprecedented, course which the hon. Member proposes.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. CUNNINGHAM, OF LOUGHREA, A PRISONER UNDER THE ACT.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Mr. Cunningham of Loughrea, who has been imprisoned under the Coercion Act, and now lies in Dundalk Gaol on the charge of meeting to murder presumably the man Dempsey, is a relative of the murdered man?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was informed that Mr. Cunningham, who was now in Dundalk Gaol, was a second cousin of the man Dempsey. The warrant for his arrest stated that he was suspected of inciting to murder. He might remind the hon. Member that there had been three bad murders lately in the Loughrea district.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE WINDSOR REVIEW.

MR. SCHREIBER: I beg, before asking the Question which stands in my name, to request the permission of the House to read a short extract from the morning papers of Tuesday on which my Question is founded. The extract says—

"Enclosures will be reserved to the left of Her Majesty for the members of the Royal Household, the Press, the Four-in-Hand Club, the Eton Boys—at least, those of them who are not present with their corps on the field—officers on foot and in uniform. On the right of Her Majesty places will be reserved for the Park officials, the children of the Royal Schools, the students of Cooper's Hill Indian Engineering College, and with these exceptions the remainder of the line of view will be free to all comers"— that is to say, to Mr. Speaker, to the Lord Chancellor, and to Members of both Houses of Parliament. In answer to previous Questions on the same subject, I have hitherto been told that Members of this and the other House of Parliament could not have reserved places at the Review, because no places were to be reserved. After what has appeared in the newspapers on the subject, I have now to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether it could be arranged that Peers and Members of Parliament wishing to attend the Volunteer Review on Saturday should be admitted, on presentation of their cards, to the spaces which it now appears will be reserved on the right hand and on the left of the position to be occupied by Her Majesty?

MR. CHILDERS: My answer is that the whole of the arrangements rest not with me, but with the Ranger of the Park. I know nothing of, and have not even seen, the notice in the paper quoted by the hon. Member. I may add that I have no intention of making to the Ranger any representations on the subject.

MR. SCHREIBER wished distinctly to understand whether the right hon. Gentleman, having seen the Question on the Paper for some days past, had not thought fit to communicate with His Royal Highness the Ranger of Windsor Park on a subject of so much interest to Members of both Houses of Parliament?

MR. CHILDERS: I have already twice answered the Question, and have distinctly stated that I have no authority in the matter. I do not propose to address to the Ranger any communication on the subject.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked what Minister was responsible to Parliament for the action of the Ranger?

MR. CHILDERS: I myself most certainly am not. I believe the First Commissioner of Works is.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR asked what was the name of this Ranger who had put this snub on the House of Commons?

MR. CHILDERS said, that, in his opinion, the concluding words of the hon. Member were decidedly un-Parliamentary.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I beg to ask you, Sir, whether a right hon. Gentleman has a right to usurp your function, and describe as un-Parliamentary an observation made by another Member of the House?

MR. SPEAKER made no reply to this Question.

MR. CHILDERS: What I said was that, in my opinion, the use of the word "snub" is not Parliamentary.

MR. O'KELLY rose amid loud cries of "Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman was in possession of the House when the hon. Member rose.

MR. CHILDERS: I want only to add that the Ranger of Windsor Park is Prince Christian.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the right hon. Gentleman was entitled to say that in his opinion the language of the hon. Member was un-Parliamentary.

MR. MACDONALD asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would state what claim the Four-in-Hand Club had to a place at the Review?

MR. CHILDERS: I told the House five times as distinctly as I could that I have no authority in the matter.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: I do not wish to add to the numerous Questions which have been showered upon the right hon. Gentleman; but I should like to know whether the First Commissioner of Works is in the House? If he is present, I would put the question to him as to whether he can throw any light upon this Four-in-Hand question?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: No, Sir; I am sorry to say that I cannot throw any light upon it. The Ranger of Windsor Park is not under my control.

MR. CHILDERS: I have to apologize for having, by a slip of the tongue, misled the House by saying that the Ranger of Windsor Park was under the control of the First Commissioner of Works instead of the Commissioner of Woods and Forests, which is a Department subject to the supervision of the Treasury.

MR. SCHREIBER said, that, under these circumstances, he begged to give Notice that he would ask his Question of the Prime Minister.

ARMY — DECEASED SOLDIERS' EFFECTS.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that Private William Brooks, of the 1st Dragoon Guards, died in Zululand nearly two years ago (September 1879); whether repeated applications have been made to the War Office on behalf of his mother for her son's effects and for some money he had saved and desired should be remitted to her, with no other result than replies that no information had been received; and, whether he will cause some better arrangements to be made, to the end that more rapid justice may be rendered to the friendless relations of deceased soldiers?

MR. CHILDERS: The facts are as my hon. Friend states; but I am glad to say that the statement of Private Brooks' accounts was received at the War Office on the 5th instant, and the money will be paid to his relation forthwith. The officer commanding the regiment has been communicated with on the subject of the delay, which appears to have been excessive. The instructions on this subject are now perfectly plain.

MERCANTILE MARINE—PILOTAGE AT SWANSEA.

MR. PULESTON asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House, the Correspondence relative to non-compulsory pilotage at Swansea; and, whether he can state what action he proposes to take in reference to this and other questions which have been raised affecting the pilot interest?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN, in reply, said, the correspondence on this matter was not yet complete. As soon as it was complete there would be no objection to laying it on the Table. A letter had been addressed to the Trustees of Swansea Harbour asking some information, and until that information was received he was unable to say what action the Board of Trade would take in the matter.

FRANCE AND TUNIS (ADMINISTRATION).

MR. T. BRUCE (for the Earl of Bective) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the public press, that M. Roustan directs not only the Foreign Office of Tunis, but also most of the Government Departments, and that claims by the municipality and other bodies against Europeans are made by M. Roustan; whether he is aware that in one of the aforesaid capacities M. Roustan has adjudged to a French subject a portion of ground adjoining the English Church, and secured in perpetuity to the British Colony by a deed signed by the Bey and the Bishop of Gibraltar, a counterpart of which has been deposited in the archives of the British Consulate at Tunis; and, if he will communicate with Her Majesty's Agent and the Rev. E. Frankel on the subject, with a view to the protection of the British rights involved?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No confirmation of the newspaper report to which the noble Lord's Question calls attention has been received from Her Majesty's Agent and Consul General in Tunis. With reference to the second portion of the noble Lord's Question, and the reply which I gave to him on Tuesday last, I may state that I have this day received from the Rev. E. Frankel the information, which he appears to have already given to the noble Lord, with regard to the ground adjoining the British Church, of which Mr. Frankel states that Mr. Reade was ordered by the President of the Municipality to take possession, and did so by having it fenced in and levelled for a lawn tennis court. If Mr. Reade considers that any injury has been done to British subjects or property, he will, no doubt, at once communicate with Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—CLERKS IN THE LOWER DIVISION.

MR. OTWAY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the case of the clerks in the lower division, as stated in a Memorial from them which has been presented to the Treasury, and have taken any decision in the matter?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Yes, Sir; the Treasury has given a most careful consideration to the Memorial referred to in the Question, and their decision is stated in a Treasury Minute, which I shall be happy to lay on the Table of the House if my hon. Friend likes to move for it.

THE WEST INDIES—THE ISLAND OF BARBADOES.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government will take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the appointment of a new Governor of the Windward Islands to insist on the much-needed reforms in the constitution and government of Barbadoes, especially the reforms recommended by Lord Carnarvon in 1877; and, whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Instructions which have been given to Mr. Robinson on these points, or take an opportunity of making a statement on the subject to the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said that a number of Constitutional changes had been effected in the Barbadoes since 1877. The Executive Council had lately constituted an Executive Committee, which accomplished important works. The reforms proposed by Lord Carnarvon were for the most part ineffective, except that the officers of the Government were permitted to sit and speak in the Assembly without votes. Two such officers had been appointed for the last three years, and had introduced many Bills. Mr. Robinson had invited the Assembly to legislate upon various subjects, and hitherto the Assembly had shown itself quite ready to adopt his suggestions. No particular instructions had been sent to Mr. Robinson, as the Government had reason to believe that he was discharging his duties in a satisfactory manner.

PEACE PRESERVATION ACT, 1881—PRISONERS IN NAAS GAOL.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, During how many hours in the day, and in what amount of space, are the prisoners who are confined under the Peace Preservation Act in Naas Jail permitted to take exercise; and, if he would have any objection to permit such of the prisoners as the Governor of the jail might select to take exercise, under supervision, outside of the prison, on their pledging their word to hold no communication with their friends or other persons outside, and to return in obedience to rule?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the first part of the Question related to matters of detail, which he could not explain till he received information from Dublin. In regard to the second Question, he must state that the Government could not give the information desired.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT, 1875—IMPRISONMENT OF BRITISH SAILORS ABROAD.

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is not a fact that, under the Merchant Shipping Act, prisons used for the imprisonment of British sailors sentenced by naval courts abroad must be approved by the senior naval officer and certified in writing as proper for the purpose; whether, knowing that the gaols of Callao and Lima, always very bad, were in an exceptionally bad and dangerous condition during the Chilian occupation in February last, and without the necessary certification of their fitness, Mr. St. John, the British Minister at Lima, ordered the imprisonment in them of seven British seamen sentenced by a naval court for insubordination on board the merchant ship "Fort George;" whether Mr. St. John persisted in his attempts to have the men imprisoned in the gaols of Callao and Lima in spite of repeated remonstrances; and, whether he will lay upon the Table any Correspondence relating to the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: According to the 18th Paragraph of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1875, the senior Naval or Consular Officer present at the place where a Naval Court is held is to approve the prison in which men sentenced to imprisonment are to be confined. On the occasion referred to in the Question, no Consular Officer appears to have been at the Naval Court, and it is not known whether the Naval Officer approved the prison. Mr. Spenser St. John reports having found a portion of the Lima Prison in a proper condition; but it is not known why the sentenced men were not placed there. Further inquiries are being made into the question, and the Papers cannot, therefore, be laid before Parliament at present.

DR. CAMERON asked whether Mr. St. John made inquiries as to the fitness of the prison before these men were detained?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: That is one of the points upon which further inquiry is to be made.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANKS—FEMALE CLERKS.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware that the permanent officials of the Post Office have decided that (in Ireland), telegraphists who joined the Telegraph Service after the transfer to the State are not eligible for any vacancy occurring in the Accountant's Department (Ireland), and that telegraphists who were taken over by the State at the transfer are eligible; and, if bearing in mind his recent statement as to telegraphists in general, he can state what is the nature of the distinction which appears to exist?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Postmaster General, When the open competition for female clerkships in the Post Office Savings Bank will take place?

MR. FAWCETT: Telegraphists who have been appointed subsequent to the transfer are not eligible for appointment to vacancies in the Accountant's Department (Ireland), because the standard of examination for that office is higher than that prescribed for telegraphists. The standard of examination had not been prescribed at the time of the transfer; and it was held that the transferred telegraphists were eligible for appointment to any office to which clerks at that time in the Service could be appointed under the Regulations then in force. The Department of the Accountant of the Post Office in Ireland was one of those offices. In reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Mayo, I may state that the scheme for the open competitive examinations for female clerkships in the Savings Bank Department of the Post Office will come into operation almost immediately. The preliminary examination will be held on the 12th of August, by which the candidates will be sifted. The second and final examination will be held on the 2nd of September. The preliminary examinations will be conducted in 15 of the largest towns in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the final examinations in London, Edinburgh, and Dublin.

INDIA—THE FOREST DEPARTMENT.

MR. ROUND asked the Secretary of State for India, If admissions to the Forest Department under the Government of India are by competition, or if there are any recent cases on record in which officers have been appointed either by the English or Indian authorities without undergoing any previous examination?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Candidates in this country for nomination to junior appointments in the Forest Department in India are required to pass an examination, and from among those who attain the required standard a selection is made of such as are deemed best adapted to the service. No recent appointments have been made by the authorities in this country without previous examination. Under the rules for the selection of candidates in India no previous examination is required if applicants can produce satisfactory certificates of their acquirements. Candidates selected in this country undergo a special training at the Forest School at Nancy before receiving their appointments; and those selected in India are required to pass two years' training in the forests attached to the Government Forest School, or to serve as probationers for the same length of time before their appointments are confirmed.

PARLIAMENT—RULES AND ORDERS— ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether arrangements could be made by which, when Questions are asked which required mere Department information, the answers thereto might be printed with the Votes, and thus save the time which is taken up by the oral delivery of the reply of the Department in the House by the Minister in charge?

MR. GLADSTONE: This important subject would necessarily require a good deal of consideration. I think it could not be adopted as a general rule.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL AMSTERDAM LOAN.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the following advertisement which appears in the "Times":—

"The Coupons of the Transvaal Amsterdam Loan will be paid under the usual conditions on the 1st July next, by Messrs. Insinger and Co. at their offices in Amsterdam. This payment falling due within the period during which the Commission charged with the settlement of affairs in the Transvaal is still sitting, Her Britannic Majesty's Government has supplied the necessary funds, but it hereby gives notice that by so doing it recognises no obligation to provide for any subsequent dividends, and in no way guarantees the payment of either principal or interest in the future;"

and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to repudiate the obligations entered into and cancel the guarantees already given with respect to the principal and interest of the Transvaal Amsterdam Loan on the strength of and in faith of which numbers of British subjects and others have invested their savings in that loan?"

MR. GLADSTONE: This is a matter on which I have communicated with the Colonial Office, and what I understand to be the case is this. At no period has the British Government admitted any liability, or given any guarantee with respect to this loan. In order to guard the credit of the Transvaal Government, the Colonial Office have given instructions for the payment of the interest falling due within the period during which the Commission charged with the settlement of affairs in the Transvaal is sitting. Arrangements are now being made by the Royal Commission which will involve negotiations for the resumption by the new Transvaal Government of all obligations. Although arrangements have been made from time to time, it has always been with the distinct understanding that there would be no liability on the part of the British Government.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —SUCCESSION DUTY (IRELAND).

MR. NORTHCOTE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If it is his intention to make any provision for the repayment to Irish landlords, the rental of whose estates may be diminished by the action of the Court proposed to be created by the Irish Land Bill, of a proportionate amount of the Succession Duty paid by them on succeeding to real estates in Ireland since 1870?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he was not prepared to return any amount of the Succession Duty paid by Irish landlords on succeeding to their estates. The duty was fixed on the most lenient conditions, and was not liable to be returned according to the subsequent depreciation or decrease of value in the property.

CURRENCY—INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE AT PARIS—BI-METALLISM.

MR. MAGNIAC asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any engagement has been made by the Government, or any authority conferred on the British representative at the Silver Conference in Paris, which goes beyond the use of silver as at present permitted by Law for purposes of currency; whether the Treasury have made any communication to the Directors of the Bank of England requiring or requesting them to hold in silver any part of their reserve for the due payment of notes; and, if so, what; whether the Government have authorised or concurred in any engagement by the Secretary of State for India, by which the free action of the Government of India, in dealing with silver for currency purposes, would be restrained; whether he will state if there is any intention on the part of the Government to alter in any degree whatever the standard upon which our present system of currency depends; whether, having regard to the fact that speculation in silver, by which much temporary disarrangement would be imported into operations of trade, is likely to arise during the sitting of the Conference, he will instruct the British Commissioner to hasten the decision as much as possible, so as to put an end to the intermediate state of uncertainty; and, whether he can lay upon the Table any Papers bearing upon the question?

MR. GLADSTONE: 1. No engagement has been made by the Government, and no authority conferred on the British Representative at the Paris Conference, to alter the limits now imposed by law upon the use of silver as currency. 2. The Government were informed that an agreement might be possible between the silver-using Powers if, among other matters, the Bank of England would hold in the issue department part of its reserve in silver, and they communicated their information to the Bank, inviting the Bank Court to state its opinion upon such an exercise of the discretion entrusted to the Bank by the Act of 1844. The Court replied that it saw no reason why an assurance should not be conveyed to the Monetary Conference, if the Treasury thought it desirable, that the Bank, agreeably with the Act of 1844, will be always open to the purchase of silver, provided that the Mints of other countries return to such rules as would insure the conversion of gold into silver and silver into gold. The Treasury, noting the statement of the Bank that it saw no danger to the principle of the Act of 1844 in such an assurance, caused the Delegate of the United Kingdom at the Conference to be instructed to convey the assurance to the Conference. Mr. Fremantle informed the Conference accordingly at its meeting of yesterday. 3. The Secretary of State for India will state whether he has authorized the Delegate of India to convey any assurance to the Conference. 4. There is no intention on the part of the Government to alter the present Currency Law. 5. The Government could not undertake to make representations to the Conference as to its course of proceeding. 6. If the hon. Member will move for Papers, I will have such of them as explain the action of the Government presented.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The only engagement which the Representatives of the Government of India at the Monetary Conference have been authorized to make on behalf of that Government is that for a definite term of years it will undertake not to depart in any direction calculated to lower the value of silver from the existing practice of coining silver freely in the Indian Mints as legal tender throughout the Indian Dominions of Her Majesty. Such a declaration must, however, be conditional on the acceptance by a number of the principal States of an agreement binding them, in some manner or other, to open their Mints for a similar term to the coinage of silver as full legal tender in the proportion of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold, and the engagement on the part of India would be obligatory only so long as that agreement remained in force.

In reply to an hon. MEMBER,

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, he thought there would be no objection on the part of the Government to the publication of the proceedings at the Conference. He believed that a record of the transactions was being made; but it would be some time before it was completed. He should, perhaps, therefore, move that it be given as an unopposed Return. As the document would be so voluminous, he did not think it desirable to print it; but he would be able to place some copies of it in the Library of the House.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL PAPERS—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When the further Papers relating to South Africa will be published, and whether they will include Mr. Forssman's letter and any other Memorials addressed to Her Majesty's Government from the Transvaal; whether any communications have passed between Her Majesty's Government and the present Government of the Cape Colony with reference to the Basutos; and, if so, whether those communications will be included in the Papers?

MR. GLADSTONE: The Papers relating to the Transvaal will be placed in the hands of hon. Members to-morrow. The Memorials referring to claims only will not be included, as they are only documents of first instance which must be referred to the re-assembled Commissioners before the Government will be in a condition to ask for a judgment upon them. Upon the subject of Basutoland, there are certain communications between the Government and the new Ministry at the Cape; but they are incomplete, and will not be comprised in the Papers to be distributed to-morrow. In case we should, as I hope we may, conclude the Committee on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill in the course of next week, towards the close or by the close, we shall be ready to appropriate the Monday in the following week, the first clear day at our command, to take the debate on the Transvaal.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Am I right in inferring that we are to know nothing of the claims made for compensation until they are decided on?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have not said as much as that; but we do not propose to present to the House any document of that kind at the present stage.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE BEER BILL.

COLONEL BARNE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the Government intend to absorb Wednesday July 20th with their business, when the Bill for better securing the purity of Beer is the first Order for Second Reading?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he did not know whether the hon. and gallant Member saw a felicitous connection between a measure for promoting the purity of beer and the absorption of Wednesday by Government Business. He should be glad if the Committee were concluded before Wednesday. As he had stated, it was their duty to go forward with the Committee from day to day; and until it was concluded he was afraid the Bill referred to could not come on.

THE NEW FRENCH GENERAL TARIFF.

MR. MONK asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, considering the great importance to the commercial community of obtaining the earliest information respecting the Tariff upon which the French Government propose to base a Commercial Treaty with this Country, Her Majesty's Government will cause the necessary information respecting that Tariff to be laid, without delay, before Parliament? The hon. Gentleman said he pressed this matter on the attention of the Government, because the Return of the new General Tariff which had been presented to Parliament was calculated to mislead the public and the country.

MR. GLADSTONE: No doubt, the public would make a mistake if they were to assume that the new General Tariff has been laid before them, and that they have the final practical arrangements under which the commerce of the two countries is to be conducted. I hope it will not be so. We shall be glad when the communications between the Commissions now reach such a state as to enable us to give more practical information on the subject; but at present such projected Tariffs as have been produced to the Commission are considered as confidential at the request of the French Commissioners. We are, therefore, not at liberty to produce them.

VISCOUNT SANDON: It may be convenient if I put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman which is germane to the answer just given. It is—(1.) Whether he can hold out any hope of being able to make public the "Tarif à discuter"—that is, the secret terms for the new Commercial Treaty offered by France to England, before the close of the Session, and before Her Majesty's Government finally commits the country to the acceptance or rejection of a Treaty; (2.) And whether, during the month which is to elapse before the Anglo-French Commission re-assembles for final decision, Her Majesty's Government will communicate confidentially to the leading officers of each of the principal Trades Unions (registered under Act of Parliament) concerned with the trades affected by the French Tariff, and, so far as it relates to their own trades, the terms above mentioned—that is, the “Tarif à discuter,” in the same manner as these terms have been confidentially communicated by the Foreign Office to Chambers of Commerce and to manufacturers, in order that Her Majesty’s Government may have the advantage of becoming acquainted with the views and practical experience, not only of the master manufacturers, but also of the important and numerous bodies of handicraftsmen whose wages and means of living will be largely affected by the decision as to a Commercial Treaty with France?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it would be better to postpone the answer, because I am not able at present to give any positive engagement about producing the Tariff. On the other hand, I should be unwilling to abandon the hope of producing it, because we are most anxious to make it known as soon as we can do so without misleading the public or violating the consideration which we owe to those with whom we are in communication.

TURKEY—SULTAN ABDUL AZIZ—CONDEMNATION OF MIDHAT PASHA.

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he had any information from Constantinople with regard to the fate of Midhat Pasha?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can give no information upon this subject. The telegrams which have passed up to the present time do not show what are Lord Dufferin’s views; but representations are being made.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS.

MR. DILLWYN wished to ask the Prime Minister whether, in case the Land Law (Ireland) Bill were concluded as soon as he expected, he intended to take Tuesday nights for Government Business after the Morning Sitings, or to leave the Evening Sitings to private Members?

COLONEL BARNE: I should like to ask a similar Question with reference to Wednesdays, when the Land Law (Ireland) Bill is out of Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE: I was under a mistake in the answer I gave before when I said I feared that on the day the hon. Member referred to we should be in Committee. I was under the impression that he meant Wednesday in next week; I find now that he means Wednesday, the 20th. The authority the House has given us is simply an authority for precedence on behalf of the Land Law (Ireland) Bill on all the days when it is set down; but upon other days we fall back under the ordinary rules; and that will probably be the state of the case until we have disposed finally of the Land Bill. It must be two or three weeks, at any rate, before we have finally disposed of it. I therefore feel hardly prepared to say what, in reference to the state of Public Business, it may be our duty to do; but obviously some opportunities will be left to private Members.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WINDSOR.

MR. SCHREIBER gave Notice that to-morrow he would ask the Prime Minister whether he would personally communicate with His Royal Highness the Ranger of Windsor Park, for the purpose of obtaining admission, for Members of both Houses of Parliament wishing to attend the Review, to the reserved space enclosed in the Park on either hand of the position occupied by Her Majesty on that occasion?

MR. CHILDERS: The First Lord of the Treasury has asked me, with reference to the Notice just given, to read a letter I received two or three minutes ago after the Questions that were put to me. It is from Mr. Charles Gore, the First Commissioner of Woods and Forests. He says—

“I have made further inquiry to-day, by telegram, as to the possibility, if required, of making an enclosure for Peers and Members of Parliament. The existing enclosures are in front of the line of carriages. Any further enclosures will necessarily reduce the space available for the general public.”

Enclosed in that letter is another—not from the Ranger himself, who at the moment the inquiry was made was away, but from a gentleman in the Office, whose name I cannot be quite sure of; but which, as well as I can make out, appears to be Simmons. He uses these words—

“An enclosure could be formed of hurdles, either for the foot people or for carriages. There are no stands. Prince Christian thinks the enclosures would shut out the view of the general public.”

Viscount Sandon

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I beg to give Notice that on going into Committee of Supply I shall move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that the charge of Windsor Park be transferred from the Commissioners of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues to the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings.”

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 135.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [TWENTY-SECOND NIGHT.]

[Progress 6th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART IV.

PROVISIONS SUPPLEMENTAL TO PRECEDING PARTS.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 14 (Limited administration for purposes of sale).

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 14, after the word “may,” insert “on such terms and conditions, if any, as they may think fit.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. P. MARTIN wished to remind Members of the Committee who were not there yesterday of the circumstances under which this Amendment was moved. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had moved an Amendment which made it imperative upon the Court, in every case in which a limited Administrator was appointed, to require such Administrator to give security for the due performance of the duties imposed upon him by the Act. The Attorney General for Ireland, in contesting that Amendment, showed clearly and plainly how unnecessary it was, and pointed out that a limited Administrator would have very few duties to discharge. Under those circumstances he had thought that the noble Lord would not further oppose the clause; but, with the perseverance which distinguished the noble Lord, he pressed the matter still further, and at length induced the Attorney General for Ireland to introduce an Amendment which he (Mr. Martin) must characterise as, at the best, unnecessary, but which, in his judgment, would be mischievous and injurious to the interests of the tenants, and likely to give rise to considerable litigation. Turning to the 42nd clause of the Bill, it would be found that the fullest powers were given to the Court in regard to the making of rules, and giving directions of every kind for carrying the Act into effect. In point of fact, the Court had as full powers as he could conceive to be necessary. In this 14th section, which dealt with the appointment of a limited Administrator for the purposes of the Act, Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland now introduced words which must be taken by the Court as an indication upon the part of the Legislature that security must be given. The words of the Amendment were—“On such terms and conditions, if any, as they may think fit.” He thought it would not unfairly be contended that these words meant that in every case some security must be given, and that the terms and conditions on which that security was to be taken alone was left to the discretion of the Court. What reasons existed for calling on the limited Administrator to be appointed for the purposes of this clause, as a general rule, to give security? According to the general principles of law, when a limited Administrator was appointed in reference to large estates—for instance, under the Court of Probate, he was not required to give security. Now, in like manner, under this clause, the limited Administrator was the agent to transfer a tenant's estate; and though it was true he received the purchase money, yet the provisions of the Bill did not permit him to retain that money, but directed specially what he had to do—namely—

“Such limited administrator may pay to the landlord, out of the purchase money, any sums due to the landlord in respect to his tenancy, and may pay the residue of the purchase money to a general administrator (if any) or into Court.”

The 1st section of the Bill directed that in case of sale—

“Where a tenant sells his tenancy to any person other than the landlord, the landlord may at any time within the prescribed period give notice both to the outgoing tenant and the purchaser of any sums which he may claim from the outgoing tenant for arrears of rent or otherwise," and in such case the purchaser to whom notice was given paid the amount to the landlord, unless he received notice that the tenant disputed the landlord's claim, in which case he was bound to pay the amount disputed into Court. Thus the duty of paying money into Court was a nominal duty, imposed without any real significance. It was a statutory duty imposed on the purchaser to see that the amount of rent mentioned in the notice should be paid to the landlord. No doubt, Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland was anxious to protect the landlord; but he did not understand that the limited Administrator was to retain the money in his hands for any length of time before he distributed it. What were the express directions of the section? He was to pay the landlord any sums due to the landlord by the deceased tenant; and he was to pay the residue of the purchase money either to the general Administrator or into Court. He felt bound to protest against the costly system of procedure enforced by the Bill in respect of the unfortunate small tenants. They were not dealing in this instance with the case of a large tenant with large interests, but with the case of some 400,000 small tenants in Ireland, whose entire interest in the farm would, in the gross, not exceed £100. Then, why should the Committee force upon these poor tenants unnecessary costs? First of all, there was the cost of serving the notice on the landlord; then of ascertaining the amount due to the landlord; then of the payment of the sum in dispute into Court; then there was to be the appointment of a limited Administrator, who was to give security. Was this security to be given upon a cumbrous form with a stamp, with two sureties brought in from a distance? and was all this additional cost to be imposed upon the tenant simply for the purpose of warding off the temporary opposition of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock to the passing of this clause? They had further to provide for the additional cost of a general Administrator, and the costs of the proceedings necessary under the Act for giving security in the case of the appointment of a limited Administrator would amount, at the very lowest, to £9, or a deduction of about 15 per cent on the proceeds of the sale which would find their way into the pocket of the tenant. Under these circumstances, he would most certainly enter his protest against the Amendment.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he could not understand why the hon. and learned Member for Kilkenny (Mr. P. Martin) should consider it necessary, upon so very small a point, to make so very long a speech. If the same course were pursued in regard to every Amendment they would never get through the Bill at all. He only wished to point out to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland that if he thought the matter likely to lead to a prolonged discussion, or to occasion any serious difficulty, he (Lord Randolph Churchill) would not press the Amendment in its entirety, but would be content with part of it. When he proposed the Amendment yesterday, the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan) said it was not necessary, because the Administrator had to pay the money into Court. But, under the clause as it stood, the Administrator had not to do anything of the kind. If the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would insert the word "shall" instead of "may," in line 21, leaving out all the rest, in order that the clause might read—

"Shall pay within the prescribed period the purchase money into Court, and the same shall be subject to such order as the Court shall make, having regard to the claims of the landlord to the purchase money," that would be in accordance with subsection 9 of Clause 1, which gave the same direction. This would be an order to the Court to proceed as the Court of Chancery would proceed. There would not be a limited Administrator holding the money; but the Act would require it to be paid into Court within a week or a month, as the case might be. The sum of money to be handed over might be large, and if the Government would accept this Amendment, and say that the limited Administrator should pay the money into Court, he would withdraw the previous proposal.

MR. GIBSON, in expressing a hope that the Amendment would be withdrawn, said, the proposal now made by the noble Lord was well worthy of consideration and adoption. It was ren-to making his own remarks as concise as he could without interfering with hon. Members on that side. For the present he (Lord Randolph Churchill) withdrew the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 15 (Provision in case of title paramount).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he proposed to move, in line 25, after the word "holding," to omit the words "in respect of which," and insert "the estate of;" also to leave out the words from "being" to "otherwise;" and then, in line 27, after "tenancy," to insert "from year to year, whether subject or not subject to statutory conditions." The clause would then stand thus—

"If in the case of any holding the estate of the immediate landlord for the time being is determined during the continuance of any tenancy from year to year, whether subject or not subject to statutory conditions, the next superior landlord for the time being shall, for the purposes of this Act, during the continuance of such tenancy, stand in the relation of immediate landlord to the tenant of the tenancy, and have the rights and be subject to the obligations of an immediate landlord."

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 25, after the word "holding," to insert the words "in respect of which."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON could not say that, as far as he had followed them, he objected to the words of the first Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend; but he must really protest strongly against the way in which Amendments were placed suddenly in manuscript before the Committee. His right hon. and learned Friend would remember that very early, in fact upon the first night of the debate upon the Bill, he (Mr. Gibson) had drawn particular attention to this clause, and had pointed out its obvious and grotesque effects which rendered it unreadable and unworkable. In this case, Amendments had been put down in regard to the clause by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Preston (Sir John Holker). The Government knew all the points raised by those Amendments, yet, nevertheless, they waited until they came to the clause, and now proposed to re-cast it by means of manuscript Amendments across the Table. He protested strongly against such a course. Something very like it occurred yesterday. An important modification was proposed, which called upon them to consider at once the bearing of important legal changes. It was most unusual to require the Committee to decide upon Amendments of this nature without an opportunity being afforded for considering their real effect. They were now asked to consider the withdrawal of certain proposals contained in the clause, and the substitution of what practically amounted to a new clause, introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend. The proper course to take was to postpone the consideration of the clause, which would not take up much time when they came to it at the end of the Bill. He had no desire to protract or delay the progress of the Bill; but he should like to have time to consider what the effect of the words proposed to be substituted would be. He had no desire to question in a captious spirit any of the Amendments submitted by his right hon. and learned Friend; but he certainly would like to understand what they meant.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he would at once accept the suggestion of his right hon. and learned Friend and postpone the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

Clause 16 (Provision as to certain small tenancies).

MR. GIBSON said, that in the absence of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) it was necessary that he should move the Amendment which his hon. and learned Friend had placed upon the Paper. It was a very short one on a very short clause, although it dealt with a very important principle. The clause consisted of two paragraphs, each dealing with an entirely distinct and independent topic. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham dealt with the first paragraph, which was to the following effect:—

"A tenancy for a year certain shall, for the purposes of this Act, be deemed to be a tenancy from year to year."

11, line 14, to leave out the words "whom they think fit."

Amendment agreed to.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL moved, in page 11, line 21, to leave out the word "may," and insert "shall." The object of this Amendment was to compel the Administrator to pay the money into Court within a prescribed period. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said he did not want to force the tenant to go into Court, but the whole thing was already under the jurisdiction of the Court; and, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out, it was possible that the Administrator might have to hold the residue for some time. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) did not believe there was any precedent for such an arrangement. In all money transactions under the Court of Chancery, the money was always lodged in Court, and the Court gave a guarantee to the parties interested. The Administrator might hold the money for some time, perhaps six or 12 months, until it was ordered by the Court to be given up; but it would be much better that the Administrator should be compelled to pay the money into Court within a prescribed period. He therefore proposed to insert the word "shall," instead of "may."

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 21, leave out "may," and insert "shall."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) remarked, that if there was a general Administrator, giving security in the ordinary way to the Court, and who was competent to receive the custody of the estate of the deceased, he saw no reason why it should not be handed over. He quite admitted that there ought to be an obligation upon the man who received the money to pay it into Court or to the person entitled to it; and if the noble Lord would slightly modify the Amendment, so as to bring in the general Administrator, that would obviate his objection.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked if the Attorney General for Ireland would take it in this way—that the limited Administrator should pay the money to the landlord within a prescribed period, and should pay the residue to the general Administrator within a prescribed period? He took it that that would protect both the interests of the landlord and the tenant.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the Court might impound the grant of administration, so that no one else would be able to do anything with it, just as the Court of Probate at the present often impounded letters of general administration.

MR. LEAMY said, the 1st clause of the Bill gave power to sell, and he presumed that any sale would take place subject to the conditions prescribed in the 1st clause. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Yes.] The condition under the 1st clause was that the purchaser should pay the sum due, not to any Administrator, but into Court. How could they compel the purchaser to pay it to an Administrator and also to pay it into Court? Who was to pay the landlord, who might get nothing at all?

COLONEL BARNE pointed out that if "shall" were not inserted the Administrator might or might not pay the money. It would be purely a permissive clause, by which, if the Administrator did not choose to pay the money, there would be no legal power to compel him to pay the landlord his share, or the other people their share. He considered that the Amendment was absolutely necessary.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought they were wasting a great deal of time about a very small matter of this kind. He thought they might safely trust, in legal matters, to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was always inclined to defer to any legal opinion that might be expressed by the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland; but he declined to accept the rebuke of the hon. Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who, because hon. Members on that side of the House thought they had discovered a legal flaw in the Bill, charged them with disrespect to the Attorney General. He had seen the hon. Member frequently take up a much longer time with a speech of his own, and it would better become him in future if he would confine his attention tion an ordinary layman would place upon them. Certainly, in any other place than an Act of Parliament they would mean something very different.

MR. GIVAN said, the 69th section of the Land Act provided that any tenant, after the passing of the Act, should be entitled to compensation if the landlord resumed the holding. He presumed that the two lines which constituted the first paragraph of the clause were introduced in order to prevent the landlord from evading the Act by making an agreement to let the farm for a year certain. It would be easy to evade the Act by making the tenancy a tenancy for a year certain; and yet it was a curious fact that if a tenant executed an agreement making his tenancy less than a tenancy from year to year, he would not thereby be excluded from the benefit of the Act of 1870. As he understood the words now under consideration, their object was to prevent an evasion of the Act.

MR. GIBSON wished to point out that Section 69 of the Act of 1870, referred to by the hon. Member, only related to tenancies created after the passing of that Act.

MR. GIVAN said, he thought there might be some force in the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, if it were not for the 69th section of the Act of 1870, which turned all tenancies at will, and tenancies less than tenancies from year to year, into tenancies from year to year. It was hardly possible that there could now be any tenancies existing for a year certain; and, therefore, the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman had no application, and were wholly unnecessary. So far as the retrospective action of the clause was concerned, it was highly improbable that there were any tenancies existing at this moment to which it could apply; but the effect would be that, in regard to all future tenancies, the landlord would insist upon making them for a year certain.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that under the Act of 1870 landlords had been able to make contracts with their tenants for a year certain, and then to keep such tenants under an indefinite series of contracts of the same nature. It had, therefore, been deemed advisable to insert the present clause, which would prevent the continuance of this practice, adopted to defeat the Land Act. The question of what was the precise character of a tenancy for a year certain arose in a curious form a few years ago. The question raised was, whether a tenancy for a year certain was less than a tenancy from year to year? It was regarded as a very knotty point, and the Court to which it was submitted—the Court of Common Pleas—was divided in opinion upon it; but the majority held that it was not less than a tenancy from year to year. Eventually, the case went to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and there five Judges against three again held that a tenancy for a year certain was not less than a tenancy from year to year. This decision drew attention to the operation of the Land Act, and it was found that tenancies for a year certain were thus withdrawn from the operation of the 69th clause of that Act, although tenancies for nine months or for two months, or three months, or any other definite portion of time, would fall within it. A tenancy of six or nine months was less than a tenancy from year to year, and, therefore, came under the purposes of the Act; but a tenancy for a year certain was not less than a year by tenancy, and, therefore, was not under the Act. That was a very anomalous state of things, and it was desirable to remedy it. In deference to what had been urged by his right hon. and learned Friend, he did not think it would be reasonable to extend the retrospective operation of the Bill to tenancies for a year certain, because there could be no existing tenancies for a year certain before the present year. Such tenancies would now be covered, and he thought the Committee might adopt the phraseology of the Act of 1870. He was not opposed, therefore, to the spirit of the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend; but he thought the object would be better effected by introducing, after “certain,” in line 32, the words “created after the passing of this Act.” Such an alteration would provide that tenancies for a year certain for the purposes of the Act would be tenancies from year to year, and by that means all difficulty would be obviated.

MR. GIBSON said, he would frankly confess that he preferred his own Amendment; but he would, nevertheless, withdraw it in favour of the propo-

The Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend proposed to strike out this section altogether. He ventured to think that it would have been wiser not to have complicated the Bill with all the various considerations and difficulties that must arise by putting this clause in at all. Neither of the paragraphs dealt with a very wide class of tenants; but the principle involved in both of them was large, and might lead to substantial difficulties, especially in regard to this paragraph, which proposed to give the benefit of the statutory term and all the other equities of the Bill to a class even more narrow than tenancies from year to year—namely, to a man who went into possession for a year certain with the exact term indicated—namely, that it was only to last for a year. Was it not unreasonable, under such circumstances, to say that a man who was allowed to take possession of a farm for 12 months certain, the tenancy commencing perhaps last year, and from the very necessity of the case expiring this year—was it not unreasonable to say that in dealing with an existing tenancy for a year certain, they were to find at the middle of the year certain that, by the operation of this Bill, the year certain was turned into 15 years' certain, with the certainty of a renewal at the end of those 15 years? Was such a provision reasonable or necessary? Tenancies from year to year implied by the very term duration and continuance, and the history of this country showed that that was the principle taken. But, on the other hand, the Government now proposed, practically, to place on the same basis the tenant who might have been in the occupation of his farm for 100 years with the tenant whose tenancy implied not duration, but an absolute certainty of termination. Was that reasonable? He ventured to think, whatever they might do with regard to the poorer tenants, that they ought not, at all events, to break the contracts deliberately entered into for 12 months, which were now current, and say to the tenant that he was to be subject to ex post facto legislation now, which would deprive him of the status and conditions in which he entered upon the farm. He might give an instance. Suppose a man desired to go on the Continent, and he let the tenancy of his farm for a year certain, was it not unjust and unreasonable to say to the landlord without warning, who had not before him the slightest idea that such a Bill as this was coming, that he must now accept the man he had taken for a year certain, as a tenant in perpetuity? It would be unjust to include in the Bill tenants in future for a year certain; but there could scarcely be two opinions as to the unfairness of thus dealing with the existing tenants for a year certain. It came to this—that such tenants whose terms were, according to arrangement and stipulation, to expire within a given time, would be able, when the time came, to apply to the Court for a statutory term. He ventured to hope that when his right hon. and learned Friend considered the matter he would see his way towards dealing with the question in a more reasonable manner.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 32, leave out from "A" to "to year" in line 33, both [inclusive.—(Mr. Gibson.)

MR. BIGGAR said, the remarks of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin showed the desirability of leaving the clause as it stood. The word "certain" was a purely technical term. If he took a farm for one year certain he should imagine it meant that the tenancy would not be less than a year, and that it would be impossible to put an end to it in the course of six months. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had scarcely stated the case fairly when he said that the tenant who took a farm now would be converted into a present tenant, and would have the same privileges as another tenant who had been in the occupation of his farm for 50 years. [MR. GIBSON: He would become a present tenant.] He (Mr. Biggar) did not see how that could be so after the passing of the Act; and he thought that the interpretation put upon the clause by the right hon. and learned Gentleman was altogether fallacious. It proved very clearly the difficulty of understanding the legal phraseology of an Act of Parliament when it was declared by a very high authority that the words of a clause meant something very different from the construcable to contract themselves out of the Bill. As regarded the right of compensation for disturbance, it was regulated by the Act of 1870, which fixed the limit of contract at £50; but as he understood the position of future tenants under this Bill—although he would admit that he found a good many of his hon. Friends near him did not agree with him—if the landlords desired to evict them they would have no protection or security except under the compensation for disturbance clauses. He took it that the landlord, the day after the passing of the Bill, might give a future £100 tenant notice to quit, and such future tenant would be obliged to leave the farm, subject only to a claim to compensation for disturbance. It was quite true that if the landlord, instead of desiring to get rid of him, retained him, he would have protection under the Bill; but, without increasing his rent, it would be in the power of the landlord to turn him out the moment the Act passed. With regard to future tenants, he wished the greatest freedom of contract to prevail; but he wanted to know what would be the position of such tenants, or what security they would have if they contracted themselves out of the compensation for disturbance clauses? Therefore it seemed to him, as regarded future tenants, this clause would really afford no protection to them. He would like to see some arrangement under which there would be but one limit. As the Bill stood, and as he understood the matter, future tenants, if their landlord evicted them, would be entitled to compensation for improvements, and also to compensation for disturbance. He wished to draw the broadest distinction possible between present and future tenants, and he desired to see the position of the present tenant modified, so that, after being converted into copyholders, they might some day become proprietors. There was no reason why the English system should not be applied in the case of future tenancies, where the landlord had bought up the tenant right. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Question proposed, "That the words 'one hundred and' stand part of the Clause."

MR. SYNAN said, he was opposed, not only to the Amendment, but to the limit of £150 set down in the clause itself. As far as present tenants were concerned, he thought the provision perfectly nugatory, because, if the present tenant had power to go to the Court to revise his title, he was not bound to contract himself out of this Act. The limit, therefore, as far as the £150 was concerned, would only apply to future tenants. But this would result in great inconsistency. With respect to the present Bill, it required a £150 limit to contract, so far as the future tenant was concerned, out of the beneficial operation and provisions of the Bill. Of course, as far as the Bill was concerned, the future tenant could only apply the power of sale. But, taking the case of a tenant under the provision for compensation for disturbance in the Act of 1870, it would be found that a tenant at £50 could be contracted out of the benefit of compensation for disturbance, even upon the enlarged scale in this Bill. Whatever, therefore, the compensation for disturbance might be under this Bill, a £50 tenant could be compelled to contract himself out of the benefit of that compensation. He could understand the Government proposing to apply the £150 limit to the Act of 1870, as well as to this Bill, so that no tenant would be obliged to contract himself out of compensation for disturbance upon the enlarged scale in this Bill who was not rated at £150; and unless the limit of £150 was applied both to this Bill and the Act of 1870 a great injustice would be done to the tenants of Ireland, who might seek for compensation for disturbance.

MR. HEALY said, it would be a great inconsistency to place the limit of £150 in this Act, while the limit of £50 was left in the Act of 1870. He hoped that the Government would see their way to extend the limit contained in the Act of 1870.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government looked upon the limit of £150 as being the fairest limit. The limit of £50 in the Act of 1870 they regarded as materially too low, considerable pressure having been brought to bear upon small tenants to cause them to contract themselves out of that Act. He was bound to confess, having regard to the working of the limit of the Act of 1870, that the Government had been guilty of a mistake in the preparation of the words of the clause.

MR. PLUNKET submitted that some ground should be stated for departing from the limit of £50 contained in the Act of 1870. As far as he could see there was no reason for extending that limit. He would like to know whether there was any evidence upon the subject in the Report of the Royal Commission.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Report of the Bessborough Commission did not enter into details in connection with this subject.

MR. W. H. SMITH understood the Prime Minister to say that it was proposed to rescind the provision of the 12th clause of the Act of 1870, which enabled a tenant at £50 to contract himself out of that Act. He must say that the proposed change, together with the provisions introduced into this Bill in favour of the tenant, would make freedom of contract almost impossible. Unless freedom of contract was to be regarded as something that ought to be discouraged in every possible way; unless a man's independence was a thing that ought to be taken away from him, it did seem that the old limitation was one which it was desirable to maintain. It appeared to him that the extension of the limit contained in the Act of 1870 was entirely unnecessary if there was ever to be freedom of contract in Ireland.

MR. SHAW regarded the limit of £150, contained in the clause, as of great use. There was no doubt that the greatest pressure had been brought to bear upon tenants to get them to contract themselves out of the Act of 1870. It would be a decided advantage to take away from the landlord everything like an inducement to get tenants to contract themselves out of this Act.

COLONEL BARNE understood the Prime Minister to quote the Bessborough Commission as an authority for the £150 limit. He should have thought that it was hardly worth the while of the right hon. Gentleman to quote this Report, after the way in which it had been handled by one of his late Colleagues.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had been rather too cautious in his reference to the Bessborough Commission, which recommended nothing of this kind. The Commissioners recommended that certain descriptions of holdings should be excluded from the operation of the Act; but they did not recommend the introduction of any provision whatever for enabling parties to contract themselves out of the Act.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE regretted that the Government had not taken a middle course between the Act of 1870 and the present proposal—that was to say, to admit a limit of £100. He did not, however, attach much importance to these contract clauses one way or the other. He believed that the Irish tenants were acute enough to calculate what advantages they could get under the Bill. They would see they were placed in a strong position, and would naturally ask themselves why they should contract themselves out of the Bill at all. The landlord had hardly anything left that he could offer to the tenant as a valuable consideration to induce him to contract himself out of the Bill. Assuming, as he did, that it was desirable that free contract tenures should exist, the only way in which these could be created was by leaving the larger tenants out of the Bill. He did not, however, wish to re-open that question, which had been discussed at length on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage); but he wished to point out that, unless he had misread the paragraph in the Report of the Bessborough Commission, the Prime Minister was possibly mistaken. He thought the plain English of the paragraph, although he admitted it was not quite clear, was that grazing farms, and also farms which were above £50 rental, whether grazing farms or not, should be left to free contract.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 202; Noes 99: Majority 103.—(Div. List, No. 293.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 2, after "Act," insert "or of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act 1870."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) reminded the Committee that the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) had withdrawn an Amendment relating to cases in which tenancies under the Ulster Custom had been bought up by the landlord prior to the passing of this Act. The hon. Member having pointed out that it would be very hard upon the landlord, having such holdings in his hand, that they should be subject, when let, to the 1st section of the Bill, had withdrawn his Amendment on the understanding that a clause should be brought up to enable the parties to contract themselves out of that section. He therefore begged to move the Amendment now standing on the Paper in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 2, after "Act," leave out "but," and insert—"Where the tenancy in a holding subject to the Ulster tenant right custom or to any corresponding usage, has been purchased by the landlord from the tenant by voluntary purchase before the passing of this Act, then, if at the date of the passing of this Act the owner of any such holding is in actual occupation thereof, it shall be lawful, in the case of the first tenancy created in the holding after the passing of this Act, for the parties to the contract creating the same, by writing under their hands, to provide that such tenancy shall be exempt from the provisions of section one of this Act."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he accepted the Amendment as far as it went; but he was bound to say that it interfered with the Government definition of a tenancy. Because how could a landlord be prevented buying up the tenant right in a present tenancy, entering into occupation, and re-letting the farm subject to no tenant right? The Government contention had been that the tenant had the right of assignment in law fortified by the Act of 1870; that this right adhered to the tenancy and could not be got rid of. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) had never entirely admitted that; but if the proposed clause were added, that definition with regard to tenant right would be destroyed. He did not see how they could draw a distinction between the case where the landlord, before the passing of the Act, bought up the tenant right, occupied the holding, and re-let it, and therefore cleared the land of the tenant right, and the case where the landlord who, after the passing of this Act, bought up the tenant right, entered into occupation, and re-let the holding.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that one object of the provision was to liberate land for the purpose of being let, which otherwise might remain in the hands of the owner.

MR. BIGGAR considered the Amendment mischievous in character, because, although the number of cases to which it would apply was small, it really had the effect of putting a certain number of persons outside the provisions of the Bill. He was quite unable to see why a tenant who took land from a landlord in occupation of it at the time of the passing this Bill should not, at the end of 5, 10, or 20 years, get compensation for disturbance. No doubt, the number of cases to which the Amendment would apply was extremely small; but he could not regard it as in logical sequence with other parts of the Bill.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL pointed out that the Amendment only applied to cases where the tenant contracted with the landlord that the tenancy should be excluded from the operation of the 1st section of the Act. It left the right to compensation for disturbance untouched.

MR. BIGGAR said, that made very little difference, because the right of compensation only arose when the tenant was turned out. The point was that the tenant could not sell. He did not assume that his interest would be very great; but there was no reason why he should be placed in a different position to other tenants, because the landlord happened to have bought up the tenant right. The sale might have been more or less compulsory, or not bond fide at all.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether a tenant, in the circumstances defined in the Amendment, would have anything to sell when he went out?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the Amendment was intended to meet the case where a landlord had bought the tenant right, and would not let the holding except on certain conditions. A tenant could not be prevented taking the farm on these conditions, and if he chose to contract that he was not to sell, of course he could not do so. He would, however, have the right to compensation for disturbance.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked whether the Government would also except holdings reclaimed and occupied by the owner himself, which had never, in consequence, been subject to the Ulster tenant right?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR asked if the tenant might sell that security in his occupation which was given by the Act of 1870?

MR. H. R. BRAND said, the hon. Member opposite was right in saying that the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland did not entirely meet the case which, on a former occasion, he had submitted to the Committee; but he had not understood at the time that the right hon. and learned Gentleman committed himself to the extent of assenting to all that he had asked. When he moved the Amendment in question, he (Mr. Brand) pointed out to the Committee that there were three cases in which it was desirable to limit the right of free sale. First, where land was unlet at the time of the passing of this Act; secondly, where the landlord had bought up the tenant right previously to the passing of this Act and had it in his occupation at the time of the passing of this Act; and, thirdly, where the landlord had exercised his right of pre-emption and bought up the tenant right. He understood the Amendment to meet the case where the landlord had bought up the tenant right previous to the passing of the Act; and he believed, also, that the Attorney General was about to deal with the demesne lands in another clause. It therefore appeared that the only case which remained open was that mentioned by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill).

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the Government adopted such Protean forms of definition that one did not know where to catch them. A few days ago they were speaking of the interest in a tenancy as the value of the holding; and when he ventured to submit that these were two separate things, he was told that no distinction was to be drawn between the Common Law right and the tenant right of Ulster. In the case to which he now drew the attention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, he understood that the land would be clear of any tenant right at all. But it appeared that the tenant in that case still possessed a valuable interest—that was to say, the interest recognized in the 1st clause of the Bill destroyed under its old name of tenant right, but revived under the new name of “reasonable expectation of continuance.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the proposal was to enable the tenant to contract himself out of the 1st section of the Act; but, so far as his Common Law right was concerned, it was not touched by the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, he thought the words “in actual occupation,” a little too strong. The landlord might possibly have some person occupying the holding for him, but not as a tenant; and, therefore, he suggested that some words should be added to the Amendment of the Attorney General for Ireland to provide for such cases.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To leave out the word “actual” in line 4 and insert after “thereof” in line 5, “either by himself or any other person on his behalf.”—(Mr. Warton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that the words suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport were quite unnecessary, inasmuch as any person in occupation on behalf of the landlord would be in the position of servant.

Amendment to the said proposed Amendment negatived.

Amendment (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland) agreed to.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, in the absence of the right hon. Member for North Hants (Mr. Sclater-Booth), he begged to move the Amendment standing next on the Paper in the name of that right hon. Member. The object of the Amendment was to prevent the clause applying in such a way as to violate existing leases which might be proved to be contrary to the provisions of this Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 3, after “any,” insert “future.”—(Lord John Manners.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘future’ be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) drew the attention of the noble Lord opposite to an Amendment on the Paper, which would provide for the case of existing leases perhaps a little more distinctly than the Amendment just moved by him.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 4, after "contract," insert "made after the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 5, after "Act," insert "or with any of the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870."—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GIBSON said, he had understood the last Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, inasmuch as it was upon the Paper; but as it appeared he was now moving an Amendment from manuscript, he reserved to himself full liberty of considering the matter on Report. The statement that he wished to assimilate the restriction in the Act of 1870 to the restriction in this Bill was made for the first time by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that evening.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Limited Owner.

Clause 18 (Powers of limited owners).

MR. LITTON said, the object of the Amendment he was about to move was to provide a larger definition of the term "limited owner" than was given in the 26th clause of the Act of 1870. According to that Act, the term "limited owner" meant any person entitled under any existing or future settlement at law or in equity, for his own benefit and for the term of his own life, to the possession or receipt of the rents and profits of land, and so on. His object was to include persons who held estates for the benefit and for the life of others.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 8, after "1870," insert "and this Act."—(Mr. Litton.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 9, leave out "foregoing."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'foregoing' stand part of the Clause."

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he had been requested to ask the Government to enable trustees for collegiate institutions and other corporate bodies in Ireland to sell to the tenant in occupation under this Act as trustees.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn. The word "foregoing" was applicable only to the clauses which had been passed; it had no application to the remaining clauses of the Bill.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 11, after "Corporate," leave out "Commissioners," and insert "Public Commissioners, trustees for Charity Commissioners, or trustees for collegiate or other public purposes."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he believed the clause as it stood had been framed to meet some special cases. Perhaps the hon. and learned Gentleman would withdraw the Amendment, and if there was no objection to the insertion of the words they could be added on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON said, he was about to move a technical Amendment to insure that the interest of those who claimed after the life of a limited owner should be protected.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 12, after "not," insert "grant a judicial lease or."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, the object of the Amendment he was about to propose was the removal of all unnecessary obstacles in the way of creating fixed tenancies. The clause relating to fixed tenancies had been unanimously approved at meetings of tenant farmers in Ireland; but it appeared to him that the usefulness of the clause would be seriously curtailed by requiring the limited owner to obtain the sanction of the Court for the creation of a fixed tenancy. No doubt, the object of the provision was to protect the interest of the remainder men; but, in his opinion, that would be equally well protected by the simple giving of notice and the payment of the money into Court.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 13, leave out "the sanction of," and insert "notice to."—(Mr. Villiers Stuart.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) pointed out that for the purpose of the clause the giving of a notice would not be of the smallest value.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 17, at the end of the clause, add "Provided always, That the court may make any order by the said Act authorised to be made by any other court thereby empowered, with respect to the laying-out, investment, accumulation, and payment, in accordance with the provisions of the said Act, of any such fines or principal moneys paid into the bank in manner by the said Acts prescribed, and for such purpose shall have and may exercise all and the like power, authority, and jurisdiction as such other court as aforesaid."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) pointed out that the 40th section of the Act gave power to the Land Commission to refer any matter to the Land Judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court.

MR. GIBSON said, as the matter was connected with the administration of the Act he would not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

PART V.

ACQUISITION OF LAND BY TENANTS, RECLAMATION OF LAND, AND EMIGRATION.

Acquisition of Land by Tenants.

Clause 19 (Advances to tenants by commission for purchase of holdings).

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Amendment in the name of the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Major Nolan) was beyond the purpose of the clause, and could not be considered at that place. It was a proposition of a distinct kind, and should be brought up as a separate clause.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he did not wish the important question relating to the purchase of land for the benefit of labourers to be put off, and if it were possible he would prefer to move the Amendment at that place.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had consulted the authorities of the House, who were of opinion that the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member was clearly inconsistent with the clause, and could not be put.

MR. LITTON moved, in page 12, line 30, leave out from "purchase" to "three-fourths" in line 31, and insert—

"The whole of said principal sum, or in case the Land Commission shall be satisfied that the tenant is unable to give sufficient security for the whole of the said principal sum, then to advance to the tenant any sum not less than four-fifths."

If the Government would yield to the unanimous feeling that seemed to be entertained in favour of an advance of four-fifths, he would ask leave not to move the earlier part of the Amendment, and would simply move that the words "four-fifths" be substituted for the words "three-fourths" in lines 30 and 31. He begged to move that those words be inserted.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not know that the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite justified in leaving out the first part of the Amendment and moving only the second, because it would be seen that there were on the Paper Amendments by several hon. Members, among others one by the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer), who represented a population partly urban and partly rural; and one by the noble Lord the Member for County Down (Lord Arthur Hill), who had a very large rural constituency; while there were several Conservative Members from the North of Ireland who had given Notice of Amendments; and if the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) were altered as suggested by him it would stand in the way of the rest. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would do better to put the Amendment as it originally stood, and thus give to other hon. Members the opportunity of dealing with the subject.

MR. LITTON said, he thought there was some force in what was said by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), and therefore he asked leave to withdraw the Amendment he had just moved so that he might move it in its original form.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he would point out that no damage would be done by leaving it as it stood, because if the Committee decided on leaving out three-fourths, and any other Amendments were made, the words could be inserted before the Committee affirmed the words "three-fourths."

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the original Amendment, of which Notice was given by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan), was one that took in most of the other Amendments.

MR. LITTON: I will ask leave of the Committee to withdraw the Amendment as just submitted, and to move the Amendment as it originally stood in the name of the hon. Member (Mr. Givan).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 30, to leave out from the word "purchase," to the word "three-fourths," in line 31, in order to insert the words "the whole of said principal sum, or in case the Land Commission shall be satisfied that the tenant is unable to give sufficient security for the whole of the said principal sum, then to advance to the tenant any sum not less than four-fifths,"—
(Mr. Litton,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'any sum not exceeding three-fourths' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, upon this question I think it my duty to use great plainness of speech. When I look down the page of Amendments, near the head of which appears the one which has just been moved, the consensus and spirit of harmony which appear to prevail on this particular branch of the subject among Irish Members seems to me very touching, and really goes to my heart; but I may here say that Irish Members have not, upon this particular clause, that especial authority and weight which I feel to belong to them with regard to many provisions of the Bill; for the persons who are ultimately concerned—in whatever way we may proceed in regard to the provision of the funds for these purposes—the persons who must either immediately find the money, if it is to be used directly, or who must undertake the responsibility of finding the money, must necessarily be the taxpayers of the Three Kingdoms. We have a duty to discharge to them which I, above all, in respect both to this Bill and to the Office which I have the honour to hold, am bound to bear carefully in mind. Therefore, I must say that I am not prepared to accede to either of these Amendments. Her Majesty's Government have considered very carefully and very largely this subject, and they feel that they are undertaking a very great responsibility—although they have undertaken it freely, willingly, and deliberately—but still a very serious responsibility, in recommending the House to give its sanction to the very large and liberal advances proposed by the Bill. Now, Sir, I would say to my hon. and learned Friend behind me, and to other Irish Members in this House, let them consider what it is that we propose to do—let them consider what it is to advance three-fourths of the sum necessary for the purchase of land. I need not say that this is a thing totally unknown in all private transactions. No vendor of an estate will ever, under any circumstances, consent to sell to a person who leaves three-fourths of the price chargeable on the estate. It is always a great deal less than that, and if he leaves half of it charged on the estate it is a very heavy burden upon the transaction, and it is also a burden not very commonly allowed to remain. But I beg them also to consider—and this is really, in my opinion, quite the true view of the whole matter—that in this case the State is not going to deal with one party only, but with two. It has to deal with the tenant, and it has also to deal with the landlord, and these two persons, it is concluded, will be equally interested in driving on the transaction. Well, I ask what will be the position of the landlord if he is inspired with only one-hundredth part of the alarm that has entered into the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to the effect of this Bill—and I seriously believe that that alarm has been undergoing a gradual and considerable diminution during the progress of this Bill—but supposing he is inspired with any real alarm or anxiety, and is anxious to sell his estate, what will be his position?

His position will be this—he will be enabled at once to propose to his tenants that they should become purchasers, and he will be able to offer to them an irresistible attraction at very small risk and cost to himself. And it is essential, in order to appreciate this proposal, to remember that in these transactions there will be, not two principal parties, but three, the State being one principal party, as supplying in some shape or another the bulk of the money, while the other two, the landlord and the tenant, are also principals. The landlord who wishes to dispose of his estate will have only one sacrifice to make. He will have three-fourths of the purchase money assured to him at once from the public funds; and what is he called upon to do? He is only called upon to say to the tenants, I will leave the remaining fourth on mortgage on the property, posterior, of course, to the mortgage to the State. And what does his security consist of? It consists of this—first of all, in the belief that the acquirement of proprietorship will stimulate the industry of the tenants; next, in the fact that the amount he is allowing to remain as a mortgage on the property is a very limited amount—an amount that many a vendor of an estate is willing to allow to remain as a charge on it; because I suppose I shall be right in saying that while it is a very common thing to allow half to remain in the purchase of landed property, it is also a very common thing to allow one-fourth to remain as a charge on the estate. But the security of the landlord is not merely in the one-fourth of his own interest in the holding; it also consists in the value of the tenant right of the land which furnishes a part of the security upon it; and there is, again, this great feature in the transaction, that the landlord has the guarantee that it will be the duty or the necessity of the State to see that the tenant fulfils his part of the bargain by reducing from year to year, from the very inception of the transaction, that portion of the incumbrance which is due to the State; so that while the original advance made by the landlord is the small advance of 25 per cent to the tenant, he makes that advance on the undeniable security of the one-fourth part of his own interest, and of the whole of the tenant's interest in the holding, and does this with the full knowledge that the tenant will have every year to improve his position by lightening that portion of the incumbrance which is due to the State. Now, I want to ask whether, under these circumstances, Her Majesty's Government have not done everything they can reasonably be expected to do in a spirit of the utmost liberality for the facilitation of these transactions, if there is to be any regard to public prudence in finance? I know that there are hon. Gentlemen who think that under the provisions of this Bill the position of the tenant will be such that he will probably be satisfied with the modified proprietary interest which he will have in the land, and that the desire to acquire the absolute fee-simple which now prevails among Irish tenants will gradually die away. I cannot tell how that may be; it may be so, and it may not; but, at any rate, it is not our intention to force the tenants in that direction. We have given them, we think, very great facilities indeed; and what I wish to impress on the minds of the Irish Members is that the facility is not only as great as it appears to be on the face of the Act, but that it is really very much greater than it at first sight appears to be on account of this essential fact, the interest of the landlord, who, by the very nature of the case, is supposed to be interested in promoting the transaction by the smallness of the risk and the greatness of the inducement which he, as landlord, has to supply the only thing wanted, on allowing either the entire 25 per cent, or such portion as may be necessary, to remain as an incumbrance on the holding. Under these circumstances, I feel myself bound to speak plainly and decisively. As we have determined to ask Parliament to undertake these liabilities, and as we laid down in the original announcement of this plan a very important proposition relating to it, we cannot accede to any deviation from that plan in the sense of acceding to the propositions for enlarging these percentages. The announcement to which I referred just now was this—that we did not intend to ask Parliament to impose any absolute limit at the present time as to the extent of those transactions that may take place under this Bill. We wish, rather, to let them be tested by their merits, as they will be tested in the actual operations of the law. We know that Parliament cannot part with its power and responsibilities;

but we do not wish to fetter its freedom of action or its responsibility by asking Parliament to say—"We will allow purchasing to be done to the extent of this or of that number of millions; we would rather allow the operation of the powers under the Bill to expand in accordance with what may be the real needs and necessities of the case." Under these circumstances, I cannot but express a sanguine hope that my hon. Friend and the Members for Ireland generally will feel that Her Majesty's Government cannot divest themselves of their duties to the taxpayers of the three countries. It so happens that this question has been brought on at a moment when the opposite Benches are not very largely attended; but that circumstance is, I believe, an accident. But I am quite certain that those who usually occupy the Benches opposite—and especially those who occupy the Front Bench—will feel that they, too, have considerable responsibility resting upon them in this matter, and will not allow us—I will frankly use the expression—even if we were so disposed, to tamper rashly or wildly with the interests of the taxpayers or the Exchequer. This is not merely a question of the interests of the taxpayers, for anything like a loose disposition to bring the State into a position of proprietorship without effectual provisions for rapidly relieving it of its responsibilities would, I am sure, be strongly resisted from many quarters of this House. On the night when it was my duty to state to the House the leading provisions of this Bill, the first suggestion that occurred to the very acute mind of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition—than whom there is, undoubtedly, no person in this House or out of it who more thoroughly comprehends the finances of this country—the very first suggestion that occurred to him was one of scruple and difficulty as to our being allowed to involve the Exchequer of this country in liabilities that would be impolitic and excessive. I have made these comments at this point very much for the sake of my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Litton). I have thought it best to state my views at once, and I am sure he will not interpret my frankness as implying any disrespect; but I deemed it best that at first we should enable him clearly and distinctly to understand the conclusions we have come to in respect to our duty in this matter. We have felt it our duty to hold, as evenly as we can, the balance of equity and justice in the whole of our dealings with this Bill, not only as between the several classes it will affect in Ireland, but likewise as between the several portions of the United Kingdom, and the great mass of the people. I am convinced that were we to deviate from this principle, although there may be no great indications on the face of this Paper of reluctance to enter into this pecuniary responsibility at the present moment, if we were to show a spirit of recklessness in regard to our duty as guardians of the Public Treasury, opposition would spring up in many quarters of this House, including quarters in which the best disposition towards Ireland prevails, and we should, perhaps, involve the progress of this measure, which is just now more hopeful than it has ever been, in doubt and difficulty, and possibly even in danger.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL would at once say that he could not support the Amendment, which contemplated a state of things by which the whole of the purchase money might be advanced to the tenant. Everyone who had heard the statement of the Prime Minister could not but be impressed by it; but what he (Mr. C. Russell) wished to say to the Committee was in the direction of showing—though he was afraid, after what had fallen from the Prime Minister, he could hardly hope for a satisfactory result—that it would be in the interest of the State itself that if possible the limit of advance should be enlarged to four-fifths. He desired to state the grounds on which he rested this argument. He was one of those who regarded this part of the Bill as embodying to the greatest extent the principle of finality, and it was this portion that he wished to see made as wide and efficient in its provisions as the Government could allow it to be made. He would state one or two facts in support of his position. He might refer to the experience obtained in reference to the purchase of the surplus land of the Irish Church, and he would point out to the Committee that he had taken means to inform himself as to how the matter stood. Those Church lands had been sold under what he might call circumstances of considerable disadvantage to the tenants, because the primary object of the Church Commission was to obtain the largest price that could be got for the land, and the giving effect to the "Bright Clauses" of the Act of 1870 was merely a subsidiary object. More than this, he knew a good deal of the land that had been brought under that system, and, as a rule, it was poor land. Notwithstanding the high price paid by the tenants, and the fact that the land they purchased was not in the main of the best kind, and that they had just passed through three successive bad years, out of the annual instalment of £110,000 payable to the Church Commissioners, he believed only about £4,000 remained in arrear. He had been informed, on what he believed to be good authority, that the borrowing, in these cases, by the tenants of the remaining fourth of the purchase money, and its repayment, had been a source of greater difficulty and expense to the tenants than the repayment of the annual instalments of the rest of the money; because the repayments due to the Commissioners bore a comparatively small interest, while the rate they had to pay for the fourth they had borrowed elsewhere was such as to be a hindrance and burden upon them which they found highly injurious. He was informed, though this was a point that he did not wish the Committee to understand he had personally inquired closely into, that in some cases the amount of interest payable on this one-fourth was as much as 20, 30, 40, and even 50 per cent. Surely this was a state of things to be avoided if possible. He recognized most fully, as the Prime Minister had pointed out, that there would be great objection to putting the State in the position of a rent-gatherer, or a tax-gathering landlord, or whatever term they might choose to apply; but the State was already, by the provisions which had been passed, necessarily in that position, and the question was how that position could best be fulfilled without loss to the State. The advances made by the State were becoming year by year gradually less, while at the same time the security held by the State was becoming year by year gradually greater. If the Committee once realized the real condition of affairs, it would be seen that the class of people in Ireland who, if he might use the phrase, aspired to be their own landlords, would, when once they had agreed to purchase their holdings and made but one instalment good, go to work with a sense of security, with a vigour, and with promptings and aspirations such as they had never known before, and would struggle to the very death before they would do anything that would imperil the loss of that which it had been the greatest aim and object of their lives to acquire. He was exceedingly unwilling to discuss this point any longer than was necessary to bring fairly and fully before Her Majesty's Government the views of those who regarded it in the same light as himself; but he did most strongly feel the force of what he had just stated, and unless the Prime Minister had made up his mind resolutely and determinedly on the matter, he would respectfully ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible, though he did not urge them to accept the Amendment and advance the whole, to accept the modified proposal that the Commission should be empowered to advance four-fifths? It was proposed to intrust to the Commissioners very large powers, and he thought it was not too much to permit them at their discretion to advance money to the extent of four-fifths of the purchase.

MR. DAWSON said, from his knowledge of Ireland, North and South, he could inform the Committee that the hearts of the people were more set upon the Proprietary Clauses than upon any efforts, however well intended, to bolster up an untenable position in which they would find themselves in an uncommercial arrangement as between landlord and tenant. He hoped the Government would strain every effort and extend the well-intentioned proposals that appeared on the face of the Bill more prominently in the clauses they were now discussing than in any other part of the measure. These, he held, were really the clauses that would lead to finality, if finality was to be achieved. He considered that the arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister went exactly to prove the case for the Amendment, although they were not brought forward with that view. The right hon. Gentleman had laid great stress on the security the tenants would have to offer; but every security the tenant had to offer to the landlord would also be available for the Government, and as much a source of security for the Government advance as it was to the landlord, or to those persons from whom the tenant might borrow in the money market in the ordinary way. By refusing to extend the advance the Government might be forcing the tenants into the hands of those who, as had been stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. C. Russell), had been charging interest at the rate of 20, 30, 40, and even 50 per cent. Was not this a strong reason why the Government should concede this point, and even a stronger reason why they should concede the other fourth? The right hon. Gentleman had said the provisions of the Bill, as it stood, were so good for the landlord that he would jump at the offer of three-fourths of the purchase money down; but he (Mr. Dawson) contended that the landlord would even more readily jump at the offer of four-fourths. The whole of the purchase money could be easily advanced by the State, and the landlord would be far more ready to sell his estate if he had all the money at once than if he only got three-fourths. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had said he should not like to see the Government a rent-gathering Government; but his (Mr. Dawson's) idea was that this would be the very way to settle the question, and that instead of throwing in the face of the Irish people the magnanimous British taxpayer, there need be no money taken from the British taxpayer at all if the Government would only do as the German Government did, pay the landlord in land bonds, redeemable in 50 years or 40 years, at 5 per cent, the purchaser paying back the purchase money in the meantime, and the landlords getting 4 per cent, while the other 1 per cent would form a sinking fund to wipe out the debt. This 5 per cent was not more than the tenantry would be willing to pay, and pay cheerfully, and they could very well earn it, under the circumstances, through the industry and thrift that a sense of the rights of proprietorship would inspire in them. If this were done, the landlords would be induced to sell, as he would then be receiving not three-fourths, but four-fourths, while the passage of the Bill would be facilitated in regard to the only portions that had any real solidity.

He had no faith in the appeals to the Courts and the statutory conditions and complicated machinery which only made confusion worse confounded; but he had great faith in the Proprietary Clauses, and did not think it was at all beyond the feeling and scope of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to deal with the matter as he (Mr. Dawson) had pointed out was done in Germany. If this were done, the question would be settled without calling on the taxpayers. If it could not be done, it would be useless to obstruct a great measure like this; but he hoped the Government would see their way to advancing the other fourth.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had observed that some difficulty was likely to be created by the Amendments from all parts of the House, and he thought they ought to be exceedingly grateful to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister for the firm manner in which he had put his foot down. If the right hon. Gentleman were capable of being charmed by any Irish Member it would be the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell); but he (Sir George Campbell) was afraid that on this subject the hon. and learned Gentleman must consider that his efforts in that direction had been thrown away. They had been told that heretofore, when the Irish Church land had been purchased, and three-fourths of the money advanced by the Commissioners, the remaining fourth had frequently been borrowed at a ruinous rate of interest by the Irish tenant; but the deduction he drew from this fact was different from that drawn by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell). In his opinion, if the Irish tenant could not pay one-fourth of the purchase money, and was obliged to borrow it from a usurer, he had better not attempt to purchase at all. In the case of the prudent and thrifty man, who had saved up enough money to pay for one-fourth, the advance of the remaining three-fourths by the Government was a very liberal proceeding; and where the tenant had not been prudent and thrifty, and had saved nothing, the worst thing the Government could do would be to advance him three-fourths of the money with the knowledge that the remainder would be obtained from the usurer. They had heard a good deal about some of the purchases made under the Act of 1870 being attended with success; but he had been a good deal struck by reading the Report of the Assistant Commissioners under the Richmond Commission, who said with regard to this question of purchase under the Irish Church Act, that in the county of Armagh, one of the best counties in Ireland, in almost all cases where the tenants had not the money to meet the payment of the fourth, but had to borrow it, the operation of the Act had been unsuccessful. He hoped that this would not be general under this Bill; but he confessed he was not very sanguine on the subject, although some hon. Members seemed to be. In his opinion, what was required was that the thing should be done gradually. They ought not to have Irish tenants rushing into the arms of the Land Commission and getting three-fourths from them and the fourth part of the money from usurers. He was heartily glad that the first part of the Bill had been passed in the interest of the Irish tenants; but what he hoped to see was, that having got the advantages conferred on them by that part of the measure they would not be in too great a hurry to purchase what they had not the money to pay for, but would gradually endeavour to acquire the means by which to pay part of the purchase.

MR. MELDON said, he had bestowed a good deal of consideration on this subject, and he desired to offer a few remarks upon it. He was quite ready to admit that he could be no party to asking the Committee to affirm the proposition that the State should lend money except on good security. He pointed out that the security was not the subject-matter of the sale, but the subject-matter of the sale plus the landlord's interest; and the Prime Minister had said the landlord would be perfectly safe and secure. Therefore, he assumed that four-fifths of the purchase money would be perfectly safe, and he was not asking the Government to do anything that would cause a loss to the State; but the Prime Minister's argument was that the State was doing enough in advancing three-fourths, and the landlords should advance the additional sum required. It did not matter to the tenant where he got his money so long as he got it, and if experience showed that landlords would be prepared to advance the difference the tenant would not object to the Government proposal; but the experience of the past showed that the last person from whom the tenant could expect any benefit or assistance for the purchase of his land was the landlord. That was likely to be the case in the future, and the tenant would in that case have no hope of becoming the owner of his land. Then it was said that it was not desirable that pauper tenants should be encouraged to purchase their land; but the proposal of the Government would bring about that result, because if every sixpence was extracted from a tenant who had to purchase his farm, he would be without capital to carry on his business, and so the proposal would pauperize him more than any other plan. He did not say the Government ought to advance the whole of the purchase money; but he believed the Government, having the security of the landlord and of the tenant, would be safe in advancing four-fifths. That would be in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee which sat three Sessions ago, and of which the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was the Chairman. The recommendation was approved by Members of both sides of the House, and therefore the proposal was not a new one. He believed the security to the State would be perfectly good, and that it was fair to allow tenants to become their own landlords—not as paupers, but with capital to carry on their farms. The proposal, he maintained, was just and fair and reasonable, and he believed the Irish Members would be unanimous in wishing that the recommendation of the Committee of 1878, that four-fifths of the purchase money should be advanced by the State, should be given effect to.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not very precisely see why the hon. and learned Gentleman stops at four-fifths. It seems to me that his argument would rather imply that the State had better lend the whole purchase money, and I could have understood an argument founded upon that principle. I remember an old story of Mr. Sydney Smith, when he was talking with an Irish priest many years ago, when there was a question whether the Irish priests should or should not be paid by the State. The priest said—"The priests would never receive it." And Sydney Smith said—"Do you mean to say that if you had £300 a-year placed to your credit in a bank in a neighbouring town you would not consent to draw it?" The priest replied—"Oh! Mr. Smith, you have such a way of putting it." With regard to these advances to tenants it is such a way of putting it. It might be said to a tenant—"Would not you like to purchase your holding?" And he would say—"Yes; but I have not got the money." "Oh, but we will lend it—the State will advance it." And the man, at the request of the State, borrows the State's money—the State is very indulgent to men who are not only able to pay, but men who are not willing to pay—to make purchase on those very easy terms. I am one of those who are by no means sanguine as to the result of a wholesale purchase of land by the tenants. I believe entirely in what is called tenant proprietorship if it arises in this way. If a man by his own industry and by his own prudence has contrived to save a little money, and desires to invest that money in the purchase of land on which he lives, I have little doubt if he is able to get the money he requires on reasonable terms, it will be a good thing for him and for the country. The man then would bring his industry, his knowledge, and his moral qualities—power of self-denial, and all those qualities which the farmer has in countries where peasant proprietorship has grown up by natural causes—to bear on his holding. In that case it would be very beneficial. But where you tempt a man to come in and offer to purchase with very little trouble on his part, and everything is advanced by the State, I am not very sanguine on the subject. But I am quite ready to fall in with the proposals of the Government to give additional facilities beyond those at present given to the tenants to become the owners of their properties. I think at present the State advances two-thirds. It was proposed to increase it to three-fourths, and that is a considerable advance. I am not indisposed to agree to that proposal. I think more advantage is to be gained from somewhat relaxing the somewhat minute rules under which the advance is made. I look more to that than to the sum advanced. But while I am prepared to go as far as three-fourths, we ought to think a great many times before we go beyond that; and if we were prepared to go beyond, we might just as well go the whole length and advance the whole. It is said a tenant may borrow the additional one-fourth. He might do so; and where he borrows at a high rate of interest it is probable the arrangement would turn out a bad one for him, and he would be a loser. I am afraid we cannot help that, and that would be the case with any man who borrowed recklessly; but the man would have saved a certain amount of money, and would be prepared to invest that with a certain proportion from the State in the purchase of his holding. I think you may fairly suppose that a considerable proportion of those who would make purchases would purchase with money which they have of their own, or may be able to borrow from their landlords or from members of their family on reasonable terms, or in some other way. But if they are prepared, after all the excellent arrangements made for them to go on with their holdings in this Bill, to make sacrifices in order to become owners of land and have not the wisdom to refuse to borrow money at 10, 15, or 20 per cent, I am afraid they are people with whom you will not do much good. I think, on the whole, the Government are making a very liberal proposal; but I am restrained by my financial conscience from going the length of three-fourths, and I shall be very sorry if the Government were induced to give more than that.

MR. A. MOORE said, he thought if more Members had been present earlier during the discussion their unanimity on this subject would have been better seen. With regard to the cases under the Church Act to which the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had referred, the tenants in those cases were only about 10 per cent in arrear; while those who purchased under the Land Act were a trifle over 6 per cent in arrear. Those who bought under the Church Act bought land which was not very productive, which had been highly-rented, and which was dearly bought in years of commercial depression; but, in spite of those difficulties, they managed to pay their debts with only 10 per cent in arrear. He thought there were very few landlords in Ireland or in England who could point to the same result during the last few years. They were giving the tenants an additional interest in their holdings, and that would mean an additional security to the State. When the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) introduced his clauses in the Act of 1870 it was thought that a social revolution would take place, and that a great number of tenants would avail themselves of those clauses; but during 10 years hardly £500,000 had really been spent in that way. That was, no doubt, owing in a great measure to the difficulties thrown in their way by the Treasury officials; and, through the prices being based on valuation, instead of getting two-thirds of the whole, they only got about one-half. If the Committee were anxious to increase the number of owners, and, at the same time, to guard them from excessive liabilities, why should they not fix the sum which they would spend annually? They might say how much they would advance in a year on good security, and then leave the Land Commission a wide discretion in the distribution of the money, not limiting every advance to two-thirds or three-fourths, but allowing them, in some cases, to advance a larger proportion.

MR. GREER said, the Amendment appeared to cover an Amendment of his own in favour of advancing the entire sum. It would be optional with the Commission to advance the money or not, and they would not do so unless they were satisfied with the security. Therefore, the Government would be quite safe in advancing the whole amount. Still, he would be content with four-fifths; and he thought the Government might very well consider that it would be an immense advantage to many tenants to get the whole of the money in that way, and at a lower rate of interest than they otherwise could by borrowing from ordinary money-lenders.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY confessed that he felt rather ashamed to take part in this discussion, which he thought was not very creditable to the Irish Members. The difference between three-fourths and four-fifths was not very large, and those who advocated four-fifths as though the whole interest of the tenants was bound up in this question were supposed to be the friends of the tenant; but, by-and-bye, the tenants would understand what it all meant. The Government proposed to advance £75 out of every £100; and yet, with a boon of this kind, such as had never been offered in the history of this country to any class of people engaged in agricultural or commercial pursuits, hon. Members were disputing whether the State should advance £5 more in every £100. That was the sole question. Hon. Gentlemen had argued in favour of the whole amount being advanced, and the discussion had been upon the question whether the Government should advance £5 more than the £75 they conceded. Why should they not argue whether the Government should advance five-sixths and give £83 out of every £100? And, of course, anybody who advocated five-sixths would be a greater friend to the tenant than the man who advocated £75 or £80. The Purchase Clauses determined that, as a general rule, a sum not exceeding £3,000 should be advanced by the State. This £5 took £150 out of that £3,000. He wanted to know whether, when a country composed of England, Scotland, and Ireland was to be burdened with this provision, a man to whom £3,000 was to be advanced could consider it a hardship if he was expected to find £150 himself? The thing did not bear arguing. The fact was, the Irish Members ought to be most grateful to the Government for proposing to advance three-fourths, and they ought not to disgrace themselves by looking a gift-horse in the mouth. It was perfectly true that what were called the "Bright Clauses" had not had as large an operation as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Bright) and others wished; but under the present Bill the tenants would be placed in a totally different position. The Committee appointed to investigate the working of those clauses recommended four-fifths instead of three-fourths; but that was under a totally different law to that now proposed. His belief was that the Irish tenants would find it to their advantage to put the Purchase Clauses in this Bill very much in operation. They would be so protected by this Bill that they would prefer to keep £25 out of every £100 in their pockets for working the farm. Then what would this Bill do? Any particular tenant on an estate might agree with his landlord for the purchase of his particular tenancy. In the case of a holding at £10 a-year, the State would advance three-fourths of

that a-year and fix the amount of purchase money on the basis of 22 years. What was to prevent a landlord from being willing to take this money on the bond of the tenant to pay the remainder? A landlord was not bound to find the tenant the money; but he would be content to rest the repayment of that which was not fully paid by the State on the future of the tenant, and he would have three times the security which the State would have. Under the circumstances, he could only conclude that the reason why, when this matter was being discussed, there was so empty a House and so many of the Irish Members were absent, and when the argument for an advance of four-fifths was urged with so much feeling, was because everybody felt that this was no light thing. It was not a true thing, it was not a creditable thing; and he would take part in any division as to the question whether £5 more per £100 was to be advanced to the Irish tenant.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought one part of the hon. Member's (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) speech contradicted the other; for first he said a great boon was being given to the tenants, and then he said the tenants would make very little use of it. That simply showed that the argument was more or less not exceedingly logical; but he thought the position of the great bulk of the Irish Members was not so untenable as the hon. Member thought. The Government had proposed that facilities should be given for creating a peasant proprietary; but he was afraid that if more liberality was not shown the result would be rather inoperative. If, however, the clause was made more liberal, it would be a great advantage to the tenants and no disadvantage to the landlords, and no loss to the State. It was proposed by the Amendment that the Commissioners should have the power to advance up to the full amount which was paid to the landlord; but that did not represent the full value of the holding, because it took no note of the interest of the tenant over and above the interest of the landlord. And so far from its being proposed by the extreme advocates of this Amendment to lend the whole value of the holding, it was only proposed to advance four-fifths of the value. And while under this Bill it was proposed to lend three-fourths by the State, under the Act of 1870 only two-thirds were advanced; and he held that the State would have immeasurably better value for the three-fourths under this Bill than they had for the two-thirds under the Act of 1870, because the tenant had a saleable interest over and above what the landlord would get for his interest in the holding. Then as to the security the landlord would get if he gave credit for one-fourth, the Prime Minister seemed to forget that the landlord would be only a secondary mortgagee. But if the security was so good for the landlord, would it not be as good for the State, seeing that the State would be in the position of sole mortgagee, and could sell out the holding, while a secondary mortgagee had usually great difficulty in realizing his security? He therefore thought the Government would not be very far wrong in agreeing to the Amendment, leaving the Court to decide whether there was adequate security.

MR. SHAW entirely agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) that, in lending the whole amount, the Government would have perfect security in nine cases out of ten, for they would not only have the fee-simple on the property, but the security of the mortgage. But the people of Ireland were choosers in the matter, and the State seemed to have put down its foot, and he feared they could not get the two distinguished Financiers on the two sides to yield more. He did not think it was a matter of great importance, because he hoped the operation of the present Bill and the operations of the Act of 1870 would be very different. The Act of 1870 failed because the clauses were thrown almost entirely into the hands of the Board of Works, and that was the merest echo of what was called the Treasury in London. The Board laid down such restrictions and rules that any extensive operation was impossible; and what he complained of now was, not so much that only three-fourths were offered, but that there was no elasticity in this clause, and some discretionary power left to the Court to advance a larger amount than that named. He had, in many cases, aided tenants to purchase their holdings—not only the fee-simple, but also long leases—and he had known of cases where it would have been impossible for the tenant to advance one-fourth of the money without injury.

primary object of the Church Commission was to obtain the largest price that could be got for the land, and the giving effect to the "Bright Clauses" of the Act of 1870 was merely a subsidiary object. More than this, he knew a good deal of the land that had been brought under that system, and, as a rule, it was poor land. Notwithstanding the high price paid by the tenants, and the fact that the land they purchased was not in the main of the best kind, and that they had just passed through three successive bad years, out of the annual instalment of £110,000 payable to the Church Commissioners, he believed only about £4,000 remained in arrear. He had been informed, on what he believed to be good authority, that the borrowing, in these cases, by the tenants of the remaining fourth of the purchase money, and its repayment, had been a source of greater difficulty and expense to the tenants than the repayment of the annual instalments of the rest of the money; because the repayments due to the Commissioners bore a comparatively small interest, while the rate they had to pay for the fourth they had borrowed elsewhere was such as to be a hindrance and burden upon them which they found highly injurious. He was informed, though this was a point that he did not wish the Committee to understand he had personally inquired closely into, that in some cases the amount of interest payable on this one-fourth was as much as 20, 30, 40, and even 50 per cent. Surely this was a state of things to be avoided if possible. He recognized most fully, as the Prime Minister had pointed out, that there would be great objection to putting the State in the position of a rent-gatherer, or a tax-gathering landlord, or whatever term they might choose to apply; but the State was already, by the provisions which had been passed, necessarily in that position, and the question was how that position could best be fulfilled without loss to the State. The advances made by the State were becoming year by year gradually less, while at the same time the security held by the State was becoming year by year gradually greater. If the Committee once realized the real condition of affairs, it would be seen that the class of people in Ireland who, if he might use the phrase, aspired to be their own landlords, would, when once they had agreed to purchase their holdings and made but one instalment good, go to work with a sense of security, with a vigour, and with promptings and aspirations such as they had never known before, and would struggle to the very death before they would do anything that would imperil the loss of that which it had been the greatest aim and object of their lives to acquire. He was exceedingly unwilling to discuss this point any longer than was necessary to bring fairly and fully before Her Majesty's Government the views of those who regarded it in the same light as himself; but he did most strongly feel the force of what he had just stated, and unless the Prime Minister had made up his mind resolutely and determinedly on the matter, he would respectfully ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible, though he did not urge them to accept the Amendment and advance the whole, to accept the modified proposal that the Commission should be empowered to advance four-fifths? It was proposed to intrust to the Commissioners very large powers, and he thought it was not too much to permit them at their discretion to advance money to the extent of four-fifths of the purchase.

MR. DAWSON said, from his knowledge of Ireland, North and South, he could inform the Committee that the hearts of the people were more set upon the Proprietary Clauses than upon any efforts, however well intended, to bolster up an untenable position in which they would find themselves in an uncommercial arrangement as between landlord and tenant. He hoped the Government would strain every effort and extend the well-intentioned proposals that appeared on the face of the Bill more prominently in the clauses they were now discussing than in any other part of the measure. These, he held, were really the clauses that would lead to finality, if finality was to be achieved. He considered that the arguments used by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister went exactly to prove the case for the Amendment, although they were not brought forward with that view. The right hon. Gentleman had laid great stress on the security the tenants would have to offer; but every security the tenant had to offer to the landlord would also be available for the Government, and as points to do what they considered right for the tenants, would strain another point to enable the tenants to become proprietors of their own holdings.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that as Chairman of the Select Committee which recommended that four-fifths of the purchase money should be advanced to tenants, he was most anxious to disclaim any responsibility for that proposal. In the Report he presented, he proposed no more than three-fourths. For his part, he thought the advance of three-fourths of the money reasonable and sufficient. If a larger proportion than that were advanced they would be approaching very nearly the amount of the previous rent. By this Bill, they were not only increasing the proportion to be advanced from two-thirds to three-fourths, but they were also removing the former restrictions upon these transactions, and particularly the restriction in regard to mortgages. He was confident that the removal of the latter restriction would do more to facilitate these transactions in the future, even than the raising of the proportion of the purchase money to be advanced. If they departed from the proposal of three-fourths and went to four-fifths, they might as well advance the whole of the money. There were very strong arguments to be urged against that. It would, indeed, be possible to advance the whole of the purchase money by spreading the instalments over 43 years; but if a great number of such transactions were to take place there would arise in Ireland a universal agitation on the part of all the other tenants to be put in that favourable position. Such an enactment would inevitably give rise to an agitation for the expropriation of landlords. He was against the expropriation of landlords, and it would be most unwise to put a large number of tenants in Ireland in a position which would give other tenants a cause to complain. For these reasons, he agreed that it would be unwise to raise the proportion to be advanced by the State beyond three-fourths. He believed the Government had gone to the extreme limit of what was just and reasonable in the matter, and that the Committee should accept the proportion named in the clause.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman as to some tenants seeing their neighbours better treated than themselves was not one which appealed to his judgment as against the Amendment. What the Irish Members wanted was to see tenants treated in such a way as to make their neighbours anxious to be equally well treated. As to the difficulty of the Court advancing a large proportion of the money in every case, there was nothing in the Bill to suggest that the Court should be compelled to advance four-fifths, or three-fourths, or even one-tenth. The clause only provided that they might advance a certain proportion when they were satisfied with the security; and he believed it would be better to allow the Court to go the whole length of the purchase money where they thought it well. His own impression was that a great many of those who would make applications under this Bill would seek to get as little as possible from the Court—to get just as much as would enable them to tide over a difficulty; but in other cases it would be an advantage to allow the Court to advance even the whole amount. This part of the Bill had for him an especial attraction. He believed there would be found great practical difficulty in adjusting all the niceties of arrangements about ownership, joint-ownership, landlords' and tenants' share and interests, and all those intricate and delicate questions which must arise under the first portions of the Bill. He did not feel the same doubts about this part of the measure as about the earlier parts, and therefore he urged the Government to accept the Amendment—although he would rather see it pushed further still, leaving the Court a discretionary power to advance the whole amount. The hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) said it was no use discussing this question because the Government had put its foot down; but he was not greatly alarmed by that announcement, for they had had some experience of that performance with this and other Governments. They had seen statesmen put their foot down quickly, and as quickly take it up; and, furthermore, a Government which put its foot down and kept it down would naturally not make very much progress with any measure it undertook. But he would credit the Government with being willing to take its foot up if, by so doing, the progress of this Bill would be 1870 being attended with success; but he had been a good deal struck by reading the Report of the Assistant Commissioners under the Richmond Commission, who said with regard to this question of purchase under the Irish Church Act, that in the county of Armagh, one of the best counties in Ireland, in almost all cases where the tenants had not the money to meet the payment of the fourth, but had to borrow it, the operation of the Act had been unsuccessful. He hoped that this would not be general under this Bill; but he confessed he was not very sanguine on the subject, although some hon. Members seemed to be. In his opinion, what was required was that the thing should be done gradually. They ought not to have Irish tenants rushing into the arms of the Land Commission and getting three-fourths from them and the fourth part of the money from usurers. He was heartily glad that the first part of the Bill had been passed in the interest of the Irish tenants; but what he hoped to see was, that having got the advantages conferred on them by that part of the measure they would not be in too great a hurry to purchase what they had not the money to pay for, but would gradually endeavour to acquire the means by which to pay part of the purchase.

MR. MELDON said, he had bestowed a good deal of consideration on this subject, and he desired to offer a few remarks upon it. He was quite ready to admit that he could be no party to asking the Committee to affirm the proposition that the State should lend money except on good security. He pointed out that the security was not the subject-matter of the sale, but the subject-matter of the sale plus the landlord's interest; and the Prime Minister had said the landlord would be perfectly safe and secure. Therefore, he assumed that four-fifths of the purchase money would be perfectly safe, and he was not asking the Government to do anything that would cause a loss to the State; but the Prime Minister's argument was that the State was doing enough in advancing three-fourths, and the landlords should advance the additional sum required. It did not matter to the tenant where he got his money so long as he got it, and if experience showed that landlords would be prepared to advance the difference the tenant would not object to the Government proposal; but the experience of the past showed that the last person from whom the tenant could expect any benefit or assistance for the purchase of his land was the landlord. That was likely to be the case in the future, and the tenant would in that case have no hope of becoming the owner of his land. Then it was said that it was not desirable that pauper tenants should be encouraged to purchase their land; but the proposal of the Government would bring about that result, because if every sixpence was extracted from a tenant who had to purchase his farm, he would be without capital to carry on his business, and so the proposal would pauperize him more than any other plan. He did not say the Government ought to advance the whole of the purchase money; but he believed the Government, having the security of the landlord and of the tenant, would be safe in advancing four-fifths. That would be in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee which sat three Sessions ago, and of which the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) was the Chairman. The recommendation was approved by Members of both sides of the House, and therefore the proposal was not a new one. He believed the security to the State would be perfectly good, and that it was fair to allow tenants to become their own landlords—not as paupers, but with capital to carry on their farms. The proposal, he maintained, was just and fair and reasonable, and he believed the Irish Members would be unanimous in wishing that the recommendation of the Committee of 1878, that four-fifths of the purchase money should be advanced by the State, should be given effect to.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I do not very precisely see why the hon. and learned Gentleman stops at four-fifths. It seems to me that his argument would rather imply that the State had better lend the whole purchase money, and I could have understood an argument founded upon that principle. I remember an old story of Mr. Sydney Smith, when he was talking with an Irish priest many years ago, when there was a question whether the Irish priests should or should not be paid by the State. The priest said—"The priests would never receive it." And Sydney Smith said—"Do you mean to say that if you had £300 a-year placed to your credit in a bank in a neighbouring town you would not consent to draw it?" The priest replied—"Oh! Mr. Smith, you have such a way of putting it." With regard to these advances to tenants it is such a way of putting it. It might be said to a tenant—"Would not you like to purchase your holding?" And he would say—"Yes; but I have not got the money." "Oh, but we will lend it—the State will advance it." And the man, at the request of the State, borrows the State's money—the State is very indulgent to men who are not only able to pay, but men who are not willing to pay—to make purchase on those very easy terms. I am one of those who are by no means sanguine as to the result of a wholesale purchase of land by the tenants. I believe entirely in what is called tenant proprietorship if it arises in this way. If a man by his own industry and by his own prudence has contrived to save a little money, and desires to invest that money in the purchase of land on which he lives, I have little doubt if he is able to get the money he requires on reasonable terms, it will be a good thing for him and for the country. The man then would bring his industry, his knowledge, and his moral qualities—power of self-denial, and all those qualities which the farmer has in countries where peasant proprietorship has grown up by natural causes—to bear on his holding. In that case it would be very beneficial. But where you tempt a man to come in and offer to purchase with very little trouble on his part, and everything is advanced by the State, I am not very sanguine on the subject. But I am quite ready to fall in with the proposals of the Government to give additional facilities beyond those at present given to the tenants to become the owners of their properties. I think at present the State advances two-thirds. It was proposed to increase it to three-fourths, and that is a considerable advance. I am not indisposed to agree to that proposal. I think more advantage is to be gained from somewhat relaxing the somewhat minute rules under which the advance is made. I look more to that than to the sum advanced. But while I am prepared to go as far as three-fourths, we ought to think a great many times before we go beyond that; and if we were prepared to go beyond, we might just as well go the whole length and advance the whole. It is said a tenant may borrow the additional one-fourth. He might do so; and where he borrows at a high rate of interest it is probable the arrangement would turn out a bad one for him, and he would be a loser. I am afraid we cannot help that, and that would be the case with any man who borrowed recklessly; but the man would have saved a certain amount of money, and would be prepared to invest that with a certain proportion from the State in the purchase of his holding. I think you may fairly suppose that a considerable proportion of those who would make purchases would purchase with money which they have of their own, or may be able to borrow from their landlords or from members of their family on reasonable terms, or in some other way. But if they are prepared, after all the excellent arrangements made for them to go on with their holdings in this Bill, to make sacrifices in order to become owners of land and have not the wisdom to refuse to borrow money at 10, 15, or 20 per cent, I am afraid they are people with whom you will not do much good. I think, on the whole, the Government are making a very liberal proposal; but I am restrained by my financial conscience from going the length of three-fourths, and I shall be very sorry if the Government were induced to give more than that.

MR. A. MOORE said, he thought if more Members had been present earlier during the discussion their unanimity on this subject would have been better seen. With regard to the cases under the Church Act to which the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) had referred, the tenants in those cases were only about 10 per cent in arrear; while those who purchased under the Land Act were a trifle over 6 per cent in arrear. Those who bought under the Church Act bought land which was not very productive, which had been highly-rented, and which was dearly bought in years of commercial depression; but, in spite of those difficulties, they managed to pay their debts with only 10 per cent in arrear. He thought there were very few landlords in Ireland or in England who could point to the same result during the last few years. They were giving the tenants an additional interest in their holdings, and that would mean an additional security to the State. When the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) introduced his clauses in the Act of 1870 it was thought that a social revolution would take place, and that a great number of tenants would avail themselves of those clauses; but during 10 years hardly £500,000 had really been spent in that way. That was, no doubt, owing in a great measure to the difficulties thrown in their way by the Treasury officials; and, through the prices being based on valuation, instead of getting two-thirds of the whole, they only got about one-half. If the Committee were anxious to increase the number of owners, and, at the same time, to guard them from excessive liabilities, why should they not fix the sum which they would spend annually? They might say how much they would advance in a year on good security, and then leave the Land Commission a wide discretion in the distribution of the money, not limiting every advance to two-thirds or three-fourths, but allowing them, in some cases, to advance a larger proportion.

MR. GREER said, the Amendment appeared to cover an Amendment of his own in favour of advancing the entire sum. It would be optional with the Commission to advance the money or not, and they would not do so unless they were satisfied with the security. Therefore, the Government would be quite safe in advancing the whole amount. Still, he would be content with four-fifths; and he thought the Government might very well consider that it would be an immense advantage to many tenants to get the whole of the money in that way, and at a lower rate of interest than they otherwise could by borrowing from ordinary money-lenders.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY confessed that he felt rather ashamed to take part in this discussion, which he thought was not very creditable to the Irish Members. The difference between three-fourths and four-fifths was not very large, and those who advocated four-fifths as though the whole interest of the tenants was bound up in this question were supposed to be the friends of the tenant; but, by-and-bye, the tenants would understand what it all meant. The Government proposed to advance £75 out of every £100; and yet, with a boon of this kind, such as had never been offered in the history of this country to any class of people engaged in agricultural or commercial pursuits, hon. Members were disputing whether the State should advance £5 more in every £100. That was the sole question. Hon. Gentlemen had argued in favour of the whole amount being advanced, and the discussion had been upon the question whether the Government should advance £5 more than the £75 they conceded. Why should they not argue whether the Government should advance five-sixths and give £83 out of every £100? And, of course, anybody who advocated five-sixths would be a greater friend to the tenant than the man who advocated £75 or £80. The Purchase Clauses determined that, as a general rule, a sum not exceeding £3,000 should be advanced by the State. This £5 took £150 out of that £3,000. He wanted to know whether, when a country composed of England, Scotland, and Ireland was to be burdened with this provision, a man to whom £3,000 was to be advanced could consider it a hardship if he was expected to find £150 himself? The thing did not bear arguing. The fact was, the Irish Members ought to be most grateful to the Government for proposing to advance three-fourths, and they ought not to disgrace themselves by looking a gift-horse in the mouth. It was perfectly true that what were called the "Bright Clauses" had not had as large an operation as the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Bright) and others wished; but under the present Bill the tenants would be placed in a totally different position. The Committee appointed to investigate the working of those clauses recommended four-fifths instead of three-fourths; but that was under a totally different law to that now proposed. His belief was that the Irish tenants would find it to their advantage to put the Purchase Clauses in this Bill very much in operation. They would be so protected by this Bill that they would prefer to keep £25 out of every £100 in their pockets for working the farm. Then what would this Bill do? Any particular tenant on an estate might agree with his landlord for the purchase of his particular tenancy. In the case of a holding at £10 a-year, the State would advance three-fourths of

that a-year and fix the amount of purchase money on the basis of 22 years. What was to prevent a landlord from being willing to take this money on the bond of the tenant to pay the remainder? A landlord was not bound to find the tenant the money; but he would be content to rest the repayment of that which was not fully paid by the State on the future of the tenant, and he would have three times the security which the State would have. Under the circumstances, he could only conclude that the reason why, when this matter was being discussed, there was so empty a House and so many of the Irish Members were absent, and when the argument for an advance of four-fifths was urged with so much feeling, was because everybody felt that this was no light thing. It was not a true thing, it was not a creditable thing; and he would take part in any division as to the question whether £5 more per £100 was to be advanced to the Irish tenant.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought one part of the hon. Member's (Mr. Mitchell Henry's) speech contradicted the other; for first he said a great boon was being given to the tenants, and then he said the tenants would make very little use of it. That simply showed that the argument was more or less not exceedingly logical; but he thought the position of the great bulk of the Irish Members was not so untenable as the hon. Member thought. The Government had proposed that facilities should be given for creating a peasant proprietary; but he was afraid that if more liberality was not shown the result would be rather inoperative. If, however, the clause was made more liberal, it would be a great advantage to the tenants and no disadvantage to the landlords, and no loss to the State. It was proposed by the Amendment that the Commissioners should have the power to advance up to the full amount which was paid to the landlord; but that did not represent the full value of the holding, because it took no note of the interest of the tenant over and above the interest of the landlord. And so far from its being proposed by the extreme advocates of this Amendment to lend the whole value of the holding, it was only proposed to advance four-fifths of the value. And while under this Bill it was proposed to lend three-fourths by the State, under the Act of 1870 only two-thirds were advanced; and he held that the State would have immeasurably better value for the three-fourths under this Bill than they had for the two-thirds under the Act of 1870, because the tenant had a saleable interest over and above what the landlord would get for his interest in the holding. Then as to the security the landlord would get if he gave credit for one-fourth, the Prime Minister seemed to forget that the landlord would be only a secondary mortgagee. But if the security was so good for the landlord, would it not be as good for the State, seeing that the State would be in the position of sole mortgagee, and could sell out the holding, while a secondary mortgagee had usually great difficulty in realizing his security? He therefore thought the Government would not be very far wrong in agreeing to the Amendment, leaving the Court to decide whether there was adequate security.

MR. SHAW entirely agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) that, in lending the whole amount, the Government would have perfect security in nine cases out of ten, for they would not only have the fee-simple on the property, but the security of the mortgage. But the people of Ireland were choosers in the matter, and the State seemed to have put down its foot, and he feared they could not get the two distinguished Financiers on the two sides to yield more. He did not think it was a matter of great importance, because he hoped the operation of the present Bill and the operations of the Act of 1870 would be very different. The Act of 1870 failed because the clauses were thrown almost entirely into the hands of the Board of Works, and that was the merest echo of what was called the Treasury in London. The Board laid down such restrictions and rules that any extensive operation was impossible; and what he complained of now was, not so much that only three-fourths were offered, but that there was no elasticity in this clause, and some discretionary power left to the Court to advance a larger amount than that named. He had, in many cases, aided tenants to purchase their holdings—not only the fee-simple, but also long leases—and he had known of cases where it would have been impossible for the tenant to advance one-fourth of the money without injury.

The object of the lender should be to leave the farmer with full power of manufacture; but in a case where the State was entering upon an operation which might extend over the whole of Ireland, it was, perhaps, too much to ask for more than three-fourths. He would, however, press the Government to give the Court some power of varying the amount. He did not expect there would be a rush all over Ireland into the system. He hoped the result would take the direction indicated by the Leader of the Opposition; for if people were tempted by any extravagant amount of money to enter into the system, that might do them more harm than good. He would rather stimulate them to exercise this privilege, and give the Court an optional power in cases where they saw honest, industrious men, who had created property on their farms anxious to purchase. He did not urge that the whole amount should be given; but he thought more than three-fourths might be given. That very day an Irish landlord had told him he was going to sell some outlying portions of his property, and that in every case the tenant provided half the amount, and for the remainder he had arranged to take the tenant's bond. That, he was sure, would be sufficient security for any landlord where a tenant was found to be industrious. He thought the people of Ireland ought to try to do something for themselves. There was a great deal of farmers' money lying in the banks. He did not wish to see that money going to the banks; for if the industry of the country could be stimulated, the farmer, although he might lose his capital for the moment, would get it back in a short time with ten-fold interest. Something might be done in this way by forming tenants' trust funds; and he should not be surprised if the Prime Minister were to give them £200,000 or £300,000 out of the Church Surplus Fund for that purpose. If they could create such a fund in every district in Ireland, tenants would be able to provide one-fourth of the purchase money. He hoped the hon. and learned Member would withdraw his Amendment, for he did not think any good could be done by going to a division upon it.

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, that from the landlord's point of view, he should like to make the clause work more practically than it would in its present form; and he could not agree with the roseate hue the Prime Minister had given to the position of the landlords under this Bill. He should be only too glad to get rid of the property he had in Ireland when the Bill became law; and he should be glad to see greater facilities given to the landlord to do that, for he was certain no capitalist in Ireland or England would, at the present moment, invest money in land in Ireland. The only persons landlords would now have to look to to purchase their land would be their tenants, and he was anxious to see every facility given to the tenants to become peasant proprietors. He believed the tenants would be better off under this Bill if they were not all proprietors; but, as far as he was concerned, he was quite willing they should become so. He should, therefore, vote for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone in preference to that of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), because they need not stop at four-fifths. The Prime Minister had suggested that the landlords might allow 25 per cent of the purchase money to lie on the property. He agreed that if a landlord gave a mortgage on the property he might be able to obtain the interest for his advances as a mortgagee. But, as a landlord, how could he get his money? He would simply be a landlord with three-fourths of his property gone, and only one-fourth left for himself. He did not think the Prime Minister would like to be a landlord in Ireland looking for 25 per cent from the tenant after the Government had got their 75 per cent. The hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) had alluded to bills. But were the Irish landlords to become bill-brokers for 25 per cent which would practically be rent? The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell) had suggested a gradual way of dealing with the tenants; but what would that be? The men who were able to buy their holdings were the most solvent tenants and the most necessary for the landlords; but the plan of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy was that they should become owners, and the landlord should be left with all the small tenants. He hoped the Government, having strained many points to do what they considered right for the tenants, would strain another point to enable the tenants to become proprietors of their own holdings.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that as Chairman of the Select Committee which recommended that four-fifths of the purchase money should be advanced to tenants, he was most anxious to disclaim any responsibility for that proposal. In the Report he presented, he proposed no more than three-fourths. For his part, he thought the advance of three-fourths of the money reasonable and sufficient. If a larger proportion than that were advanced they would be approaching very nearly the amount of the previous rent. By this Bill, they were not only increasing the proportion to be advanced from two-thirds to three-fourths, but they were also removing the former restrictions upon these transactions, and particularly the restriction in regard to mortgages. He was confident that the removal of the latter restriction would do more to facilitate these transactions in the future, even than the raising of the proportion of the purchase money to be advanced. If they departed from the proposal of three-fourths and went to four-fifths, they might as well advance the whole of the money. There were very strong arguments to be urged against that. It would, indeed, be possible to advance the whole of the purchase money by spreading the instalments over 43 years; but if a great number of such transactions were to take place there would arise in Ireland a universal agitation on the part of all the other tenants to be put in that favourable position. Such an enactment would inevitably give rise to an agitation for the expropriation of landlords. He was against the expropriation of landlords, and it would be most unwise to put a large number of tenants in Ireland in a position which would give other tenants a cause to complain. For these reasons, he agreed that it would be unwise to raise the proportion to be advanced by the State beyond three-fourths. He believed the Government had gone to the extreme limit of what was just and reasonable in the matter, and that the Committee should accept the proportion named in the clause.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the argument of the right hon. Gentleman as to some tenants seeing their neighbours better treated than themselves was not one which appealed to his judgment as against the Amendment. What the Irish Members wanted was to see tenants treated in such a way as to make their neighbours anxious to be equally well treated. As to the difficulty of the Court advancing a large proportion of the money in every case, there was nothing in the Bill to suggest that the Court should be compelled to advance four-fifths, or three-fourths, or even one-tenth. The clause only provided that they might advance a certain proportion when they were satisfied with the security; and he believed it would be better to allow the Court to go the whole length of the purchase money where they thought it well. His own impression was that a great many of those who would make applications under this Bill would seek to get as little as possible from the Court—to get just as much as would enable them to tide over a difficulty; but in other cases it would be an advantage to allow the Court to advance even the whole amount. This part of the Bill had for him an especial attraction. He believed there would be found great practical difficulty in adjusting all the niceties of arrangements about ownership, joint-ownership, landlords' and tenants' share and interests, and all those intricate and delicate questions which must arise under the first portions of the Bill. He did not feel the same doubts about this part of the measure as about the earlier parts, and therefore he urged the Government to accept the Amendment—although he would rather see it pushed further still, leaving the Court a discretionary power to advance the whole amount. They had seen statesmen put their foot down quickly, and as quickly take it up; and, furthermore, Government which put its foot down and kept it down would naturally not make very much progress with any measure it undertook. But he would credit the Government with being willing to take its foot up if, by so doing, the progress of this Bill would be promoted. Therefore, he urged hon. Members to bring as much pressure as possible to bear on the Government to go as far as it could towards agreeing to allow a four-fifths' advance. There was no principle whatever involved in this question; for when once they granted any part of the purchase money they could not say there was any hard-and-fast line between three-fourths and four-fifths. It was all a matter of convenience for that peasant class whom they wanted to help to become proprietors; and he supported the Amendment because he thought it better than the proposal of the Government.

MR. LITTON said, it appeared to him that, having regard to what seemed to be the feeling of the majority of hon. Members, it would not be wise to press the Amendment to a division or to occupy further time in discussing it. In this view he was influenced by the observations of the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), and also by the generous and considerate and handsome manner in which the Prime Minister had spoken of the Amendment. He was also influenced by the anxiety which prevailed to make progress with the Bill; and, therefore, he would ask permission to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. DALY pointed out that if in the case of a £10 holding for 22 years, the State only advanced £165, leaving the tenant to find the remaining £55, the tenant would have to pay 8s. 4d. more per annum than if the larger sum proposed were advanced, and for the disadvantage of paying that extra amount, the tenant would have £5 more in his pocket for the purchase of seed. He held that, in the interest of the Government, it would be better to advance four-fifths, and that they would have better security than on three-fourths. In the case of a small tenant the £55 deficit, if only £165 were advanced, would have to be obtained from the "gombeen" man, and would be liable to such interest as to cost nearly as much as the interest on the £165 advanced by the Government. If they applied the Bill to the poor tenants, the more generously they did so the greater would be the security for the advances. The Jews had been expelled from Russia through being driven into the position into which the Government would drive the Irish tenants if they compelled them to borrow on the principle of mortgages. Four-fifths was only 5 per cent advance on the sum proposed by the Government; and he trusted the Government, having made a proposal which he recognized as large and generous, would give to those who had so long been under English misrule and injustice this additional benefit.

MR. ILLINGWORTH remarked that nothing was more wonderful than the unanimity which had been shown by Irish Members upon this question, and he would purchase at a great sacrifice such a marvellous unanimity on any great Irish question. If this were not a comprehensive Bill and did not contain extraordinary provisions in the interest of tenants who might not be able to buy their farms, an appeal might be made for a lavish advance. When there was, however, this alternative proposal by which, when the Bill was passed, tenants who were without spare capital would find themselves in a good position, he thought a substantial boon had been offered to them by the British House of Parliament. Those tenants might be advised to be content for the present to remain tenants, hoping in the future, by their own prudence and thrift, to become owners of their holdings. But how did the matter stand when the State interfered? Ought the State to run any risk in advancing the purchase money? He unhesitatingly said the State ought not to run the slightest risk. If the money was to be given, let it be a gift; but if it was to be a prudent financial operation, for which the State was to be liable and to assume the position of a lender, then he thought an advance of three-fourths was as much as the Government should be asked to give. The State was to advance the money at a low rate of interest, and that implied that there ought to be no risk to the State. With regard to the argument of the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) a landlord could discriminate as to the tenant, and it might be said that the landlord could exercise a wise discrimination. But how could the Commissioners possess such an intimate knowledge of the character of the men as to make it safe to give them the power proposed? Supposing there were many cases in which the tenant could not provide one-fourth, if he could raise one-eighth that would be a deposit which to many landlords would be satisfactory, and would justify them in giving a tenant an opportunity of obtaining the remainder. He should be very sorry if the Government were pressed to go beyond their fair and reasonable offer.

MR. FITZPATRICK said, he thought the fact of so much unanimity amongst the Irish Members ought to induce the Government to accept the Amendment at once. There was an old story that if one Irishman was going up a ladder there were generally two Irishmen trying to pull him down. In this case it was apparently the other way. All the Irishmen in the House were trying to help the tenant up the ladder, and therefore he thought the Government might accept the proposition. A good deal had been said about "gombeen" men, and that was all very fair; but there was another element which was equally dangerous, and that was the advancing of the excess quarter by the banks. At the present time the banks charged an enormous rate of interest; and although he agreed with the hon. Member for the County of Cork that as a financial arrangement that might be suitable to the banks, still the unfortunate tenant might get himself into hot water if he was not able to redeem at the right moment. He had reason to believe that in the year before last 22,000 processes were issued in Munster alone by the banks to recover rents; and he believed the distress in Ireland during the last two years was in many instances due more to the extreme action of the banks than to the action of the landlords. For that reason alone he thought the Government ought to be glad to keep the tenants as its debtors, and not to let them become the debtors of banks and "gombeen" men. He hoped the Government would give way a little on this point, and help the Committee to be unanimous for that night at any rate.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The speech of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has afforded the Committee a good deal of amusement. He remarked upon the fact that the Irish Members were unanimous on this occasion. I think it is quite correct to say so, because it is quite evident that a rather more reasonable view is taken on this side of the House by the Irish Members than by some hon. Gentlemen on that side. But still that unanimity is of a kind which may be always purchased by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I do not say that with regard to Irishmen only—but there is a mode of pleasing people all round by sacrificing the public interest. Now, in this case, as I understand, a part of the Amendment proposed is almost universally given up. I think no sensible man, notwithstanding the speech of the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), would really wish that the Government should undertake to pay the whole sum, and bring all the tenants in Ireland instantaneously into the field to demand that they should be made proprietors. I suppose at present landed proprietors of Ireland are in despair, and that they will be as ignorant in the future as they have been ignorant in the past. The Irish proprietors, if we are to judge from the speeches we have heard to-night, would be as anxious to sell as the tenants would be anxious to buy if the Government would step in and pay the whole of the purchase money. I should be very sorry to see anything so sudden and so extravagant as that undertaking. I believe nothing could be more dangerous—nothing could set a worse example for the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer of this country—and I suspect it would be bad also for those whom hon. Gentlemen opposite serve. Let us look at the condition of things with regard to the price of land in Ireland now, and to the price of the produce of the soil. I do not know how far the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Blake) is correct; but, as most of us are aware, he has travelled extensively in Canada and the United States since last Session. He has written letters to the papers, published a pamphlet, and set forth a very formidable statement as to the probable reduction in the price of the product of the soil of Ireland in the next five or six years. My impression is that he has very much overstated the case. If there be anything like reason or truth in it, it may be that within the next five or six years, if you had 100,000 tenants made into proprietors at anything like the present prices for land, or sale, or rent, you may have a vast number of them coming back to the Government and saying—"You have led us into the expensive purchase of our farms at prices which were fixed looking to the past, and with little or no knowledge of the future;"

and the Government might be involved in the greatest possible anxiety if this state of things, predicted by the hon. Member, should be true. Therefore, I believe—and no one in this House will doubt my anxiety—that this clause should act, that this Bill throughout should act, and that this clause especially should act in the direction I have pointed out on so many occasions. But, with that feeling, I am the more anxious the purchase of farms should go on, not with extraordinary and perilous rapidity, but with steady growth and action springing from the experience we have from year to year that the purchase and sale of land and the creation of a proprietary class is found to be an increasing advantage to the country. Now, my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) pointed out what is on the surface of this question—that the difference between hon. Gentlemen from Ireland and the Government is a difference of merely £5 in the £100. The Government propose to give £75; Irish Members ask for £80. The sum is so small that, on either side, a person might be at liberty to say it is hardly worth differing about; that probably the £80 would be no loss to the Government. I do not say that it would be; but it must be admitted that £75 is a very large and liberal offer. It must not be forgotten that the proportion under the Act of 1870 was only two-thirds, and yet we have never heard, and I do not believe it to be true, that any sensible portion of the failure of that Act is to be traced to the fact that only two-thirds was to be paid; while under the Irish Church Commission the proportion advanced was three-fourths, as proposed in this Bill, and I have never heard it asserted by anyone intimately acquainted with the transactions under that Commission that it has not succeeded because the advance was only three-fourths. If that be so, I think Irish Members may comfort themselves with this knowledge which they derived from the experience of the past, that three-fourths is better than the sum offered under the Act of 1870, and equal to that which was offered under the Church Commission. It is equal to everything you have had under the experiments in this matter, and in no case can it be said to have failed. Therefore, I think the wise course to take would be to accept the proposition which the Government now make, and which the Head of the Government has, with such unanswerable arguments to-night, defended; and I know no man—the House knows no man—in the confines of the country who is to be more trusted on a great financial question than my right hon. Friend. After the discussion which has taken place, I presume, from what has been said, that hon. Gentlemen opposite will have a division, and that the Amendment will not be withdrawn. I wish it might be, and that not only Englishmen but Irishmen could be unanimous. I am most anxious for the success of these clauses, believing that they will be in the future—and not only in the immediate future, but in the distant future—as important as the other portions of the Bill. If I thought £80 would be better, or sensibly better, than £75, I would recommend it; but I believe £75 is a just and sufficient proposition and meets the requirements of the case, and is consistent with a regard for what is due to the Exchequer, and I therefore ask the Committee strongly to assent to the proposition as it stands.

MR. GIVAN said, he was exceedingly glad that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had adopted the course of explicit argument in this matter, because there was no man in the world at the present time to whom all sensible Irishmen would submit so readily than to the right hon. Gentleman who, by the Act of 1870, had done more to ameliorate the condition of the people of Ireland than any living statesman. He was supported in that view by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), to whom the people of Ireland also owed a debt of gratitude; but he must press on the Committee that there was a necessity for extending the amount to be advanced to the tenants. This difference of £5 was a matter of vital importance to the Irish tenant; and he contended that in the case, for instance, of a holding at £20 rent, with a fee-simple value of £400 and a tenant right of £300, the Government, advancing £300, would have an ample margin of security. In the case of the Irish Church Act the Commissioners knew now that they would have been better off if they had advanced the tenants the whole of the purchase money rather than a proportion which sent them to the money-lenders for the balance. He believed the only system that would work would be a system of advancing either the whole amount, or such proportion of it as the Land Commissioners were convinced the tenant could give security for. In the Probate Court, where administration was granted, the Court took a bond of personal security to the extent of several thousands of pounds from two or three individuals, and the Land Commissioners might adopt a similar plan.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he rose for the purpose of expressing the hope that hon. Members opposite would allow the Amendment to be withdrawn. He should not vote for it, and he wished to point out why he should not. He recognized the force of the arguments used by the Prime Minister against the advance of the whole sum, because he held that the Government proposal was a boon which ought to be held out to thrifty tenants who had given good guarantee by their conduct for the repayment of the money. He further objected to the Amendment because it did not leave any discretion to the Commission to advance up to four-fifths, but made it compulsory on them to advance a minimum of four-fifths. On these two grounds he should certainly not vote in favour of it. If the Amendment were not pressed he should certainly, without discussion, ask the Committee to take a division upon an Amendment which stood in his name later on, and which gave a discretion to the Commission as to the amount they might advance up to four-fifths.

MR. PARNELL: If I saw any disposition on the part of the Government to agree to the proposal of four-fifths, I should say that there might be some reason for the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), because we should be gaining something by the discussion we have had to-night. But so far as there is any principle involved in the question which might and ought to induce us to take a division, although we know we cannot carry our Amendment, it appears to me involved in the question of advancing the whole as compared with advancing only a small portion. I cannot see that there is much principle involved in the question of whether the State shall advance £75 or £80, and so far I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright). If, however, we could gain the concession of that additional advantage for the tenants, they would only have to pay £20 in the £100 instead of £25. In that case, as we should be gaining a substantial advantage, we might waive the right of taking a division on the question of principle. But I have seen no indication from the Government Bench of that concession, and, failing such an indication, I do not think we should be justified in allowing the Amendment to be withdrawn. Now, it appears to me that this question has been treated very much as if some pull was going to be made upon the British taxpayer and the British Exchequer. But that is really not so. All we ask is this—that having deprived us of the right, by the Act of Union of pledging our own credit, you will allow us to use your credit to this extent. If we had the right to pledge the credit of the counties in Ireland for this purpose, I am quite sure that we could borrow the money at very little over the rate at which the State seems disposed to lend this money, for which I think something like 3½ per cent is charged. I feel quite sure that any public body in Ireland authorized to borrow money for this purpose could borrow it at 3½ per cent per annum. So, it is not really a question of asking any money from the English whatever. We want no money from the taxpayer. We merely desire the right of pledging our own credit as regards our own land; and, as you refuse us that right, we think it only reasonable that you should pledge your own credit for us. Now, this matter might be effected in a great variety of ways. There is no reason why the landlords should receive cash for their property. Why not give them State paper? Offer them State paper bearing 3 per cent per annum interest, and let them make the best they can out of the transaction. The landlord selling his property would be perfectly willing to take State paper which would fetch par at the present rates of money on the London Stock Exchange. Therefore, no cash is actually required from the State. It is simply a question of the way in which the money is to be advanced, and the landlords have no right to ask that the State should give them cash if the State offers them paper. Well, now, what would the security be? You have the security in this case of the landlord's interest at a time when land is very much depreciated in the Irish market, and you have the tenant's interest. You have these two interests as security for the repayment of the money. It has been pointed out that every year that goes by will give the tenant an additional interest in his holding, and consequently will give the State a greater security for the punctual repayment of the loan. I fear very much, from the stand which the Government have made upon the question, that they intend to make the fixing of rent the main portion of their Bill, and that they do not propose to follow the lines indicated by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India when he said that the Government only proposed the rent-fixing clause as a present expedient, and that they looked for the permanent settlement of the question to the creation of a greater number of owners of land in Ireland. It appears evident that the Prime Minister has a prejudice against allowing a large number of Irish tenants to become debtors to the State to any large extent. He may fear that hereafter some movement may be commenced for the purpose of repudiating their debts; but I would remind the Committee that there is a very great difference between repudiating a debt which has been entered into entirely of their own accord on the part of the tenants and repudiating unjust rents which they have been forced by the circumstances of the case to undertake to pay, whether they could or not, to the landlord. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that it is not desirable, in view of foreign competition, that a very large amount of land in Ireland should be bought by the tenants at the present moment, and I do not think that the Irish tenants would have any disposition to plunge into such transactions with that hot haste which the right hon. Gentleman has assumed that they would exhibit in the event of their being able to obtain an advance of the whole of the purchase money from the State. I think the Irish tenants would be very cautious about undertaking to buy holdings at the present moment, even at no very high figure, or at any figure, which they would be still liable to pay, no matter what the depreciation of produce might come to in consequence of foreign competition. But, after all, the Government are inviting tenants with the utmost confidence to enter into a 15 years' statutory term at a fixed rent; and it is, after all, only a question of degree, whether you shall enter into a 15 years' statutory term at a fixed rent, or whether you shall enter into the ownership which should be paid off by paying a fixed rent for a period of 35 years. In the one case the tenant would in all probability, at the end of the 35 years, have doubled the value of the holding by the improvements he would have been able to effect on it, owing to the security he would feel from his ownership; in the other case he would feel that he had a very uncertain future, and would leave the holding at the end of the term in no better condition than it was at the commencement. So that, from every point of view, I think the argument is overwhelmingly against the Government in refusing this very small concession to the Irish tenants and also to the Irish landlords. Now, how would it act in the case of estates in the hands of trustees? The Prime Minister invites the Irish Members to allow the remaining fourth of the £100 to stand out as a second charge. But in the case of lands in the hands of trustees they would not be permitted, if they held a first charge, to take a second charge; and it might be their duty either to insist upon the payment of the whole sum, or else to refuse their assent to any portion of it being allowed to stand out as a second charge. In fact, no trustee under the circumstances would be able to assent to the arrangement, because he would be violating his trust, and taking a responsibility on himself which no trustee could be called upon to take. Then, again, the landlord, if he sells his estate, may wish to go elsewhere. His remaining interest in it—namely, the collection of the interest and purchase money—would be very small, and it would be an exceedingly expensive matter to keep an agent and bailiffs on the spot for the purpose of collecting these annual payments. The State, on the other hand, would have their legal tax-gatherers and all the other machinery, so that they would have an inexpensive means of collecting the charge which would come in their way to make the annual charge much more cheaply than in the way of the landlords. I fear that what the Government are really driving at is this—They do not like to trust the Irish people. They like to keep the Irish landlords as a buffer between themselves and the tenants. In no self-governing country would such a miserable concession as this have been refused. We have the example of Prussia, where the State advanced the whole of the money necessary for compensating the nobles. We have the example of Russia, a country very much poorer than England, where the State advanced the whole of the money to emancipate the serfs and to compensate the nobles. We have the example of Prince Edward's Island, one of our own Colonies, where the owners and landlords had been planted in times gone by by the English Legislature, and where the State advanced the whole of the money for the purpose of buying out these English landlords who had been planted in the Island when it was found that the conditions of their landlordship had become intolerable. It is only in the case of a country like England governing another country like Ireland that we see this want of confidence, and this refusal to allow the people to come into contact with the Government. It is one of the misfortunes of foreign rule—one we meet at every turn. The method of reconciling the respective interests of the landlord and tenant is a question still to be answered by the Prime Minister. It will pursue you to the end of this Bill; and if anything causes the failure of this Bill, it will be that want of trust of the Irish people which is so evident, and that desire to introduce a foreign and small class between the great bulk of the people of Ireland and the Government of England.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that the Committee upon the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act on which he sat was almost unanimously of opinion that four-fifths of the price might be safely advanced. The arguments used that evening by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) and by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) would, perhaps, be unanswerable, if it were not that the best way to answer them would be by referring to the meetings of that Committee. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Reading had taught the Committee how safe it would be to trust the Irish. He had said that there was no chance of the tenant failing to pay, because there were no less than three different sources of rent. In the first place, there would have been some payments by the tenant on his improvements. Then there was the goodwill; and no one used to point out so strongly to the Committee as the right hon. Gentleman what the importance of that goodwill was, and what a great difference there was between land in occupation and land not in occupation in Ireland. Of course, the right hon. Gentleman was now representing the Government after having been so largely representing the Committee; but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman was nearly so strong in opposing Irish interests as he had been in advocating Irish interests; and he thought they still owed a balance of gratitude to the right hon. Gentleman. Now, he looked upon that question as one of the utmost importance, and for two reasons. The first was the consideration of the property element, as a man would naturally work harder on his own property than he would on anyone else's. The second was the political situation. That Land Bill would still leave 30 tenants to one landlord; and he thought anyone who knew anything about the question would say that those 30 tenants, supposing household suffrage was conceded, would always be striking against the landlord's interest. They were obliged to face that situation in Ireland. Of course, anything established by centuries of usage and property must be respected. But a great debt was owing by England to Ireland. For 100 years England had prevented the free sale of land. They had placed the property of the country in a few hands, and maybe they had placed the political power in the hands of the many, and consequently they had the many arrayed against the few. Whatever Land Bill they brought in, they would still have agitation between landlord and tenant. The only way to prevent that was by increasing the number of tenants. The present disproportion between landlords and tenants was too great; and he contended that the whole object of the Government ought to be to see how they could increase the number of small proprietors in Ireland.

Now, the difference between four-fifths and three-fourths would bring, at least, purchasers in the proportion of five to four, and perhaps much more. He believed that it was a well-known fact that if they sold an article for 1s. instead of 2s., they sold a double number of them. If they raised the advance, he believed the purchasers would be increased likewise in the proportion of three to two. He entirely repudiated, though on different grounds from the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), the idea that the Irish people would come to beg for English money. His reason was that every year about £3,000,000 of Irish money went into the English Exchequer, and were devoted to Imperial purposes that were almost totally disconnected with Ireland. The maximum sum that they could pledge would be nothing like what Ireland sent to England—would, in fact, be a very small proportion of it. He thought it might amount to £3,000,000, or only one year's amount of the surplus brought over from Ireland to England. In that state of circumstances, he denied that they were begging for English money.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he fully agreed with one of the observations of the Prime Minister—that that was a question which affected the British taxpayer. He was willing to consider the merit of the British taxpayer and his Representative in that House by the attitude they took up upon that point. He had been very much amused by, he would not say the Pharisaical, self-complacency with which Englishmen, and especially Members of that House, had congratulated themselves and lifted their hands in admiration of their own generosity, because they were engaged in passing a Bill like that for the benefit of the Irish people. But in examining the causes and motives of that attitude, he was bound to come to the conclusion that if the Liberal side of the House was dealing generously with the Irish tenant on the question of the relation between landlord and tenant, they were dealing generously not with their own property or supposed rights, but with the property and supposed rights of other people. They were now dealing, not with the property of Irish landlords, which, of course, was dearer to English Liberal Members than their own property or lives, but they were dealing with an amount of money which Irishmen, out of their own pockets, were willing to pay in their desire for justice. His hon. Friend the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had drawn a very effective contrast between the attitude of the English Government towards Ireland and the attitude of Native Governments towards their own country. His hon. Friend mentioned the case of the Russian Government, which to all Liberal Englishmen seemed simply barbarous, antique, and tyrannical. But he asked the Government to imitate the generosity of Russia towards its subjects. He was reminded by some of his hon. Friends round him that it was unnecessary to recommend the example of the Russian Government to the present Ministry, because they had given to the Ignatieffs and other high authorities of Russia the sincere flattery of imitation in some of their worst coercive measures. As they had been such humble admirers and followers of the coercive side of Russian policy, might he also suggest to them that they should take the step of imitating the benevolent proceedings of the Czar? Now, one point which had been raised by the Prime Minister was his duty as the custodian and holder of the public purse. Well, he believed that there was nothing less secret than the deliberations of Cabinet Ministers; and he ventured to think that the attitude of the Prime Minister with regard to that question was more than a confirmation of the very common rumour that the right hon. Gentleman himself was the main obstacle to that portion of the Bill being conceived in anything like a generous spirit. He did not see the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in his place; but they all would remember that famous speech in which he declared that force was no remedy, a speech which he dared say the right hon. Gentleman did not too willingly remember at that moment. But, in the same speech, the right hon. Gentleman made the observation—

“Why should we quarrel about figures when the question is that of reconciling the Irish people and doing justice by them? Supposing it takes £5,000,000 or £10,000,000, or even £20,000,000, why should we hesitate about spending that money when we have not hesitated to spend £20,000,000 in an unjust and an unnecessary war with Afghanistan?”

Where were the £20,000,000 now? They had gone to some limbo of departed convictions such as "force is no remedy." He wished to point to the evidence given on this question by W. L. Bernard, whom, he thought, was one of the gentlemen employed in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners Office. This gentleman had said that he should be in favour of a discretion being given to the Board of Administration to allow the whole of the purchase money to be acquired on mortgage. This gentleman, who for 10 years had been engaged in this very matter of establishing a peasant proprietary, brought forward his high authority in support of the view that it was desirable in some cases to give the whole purchase money to the tenant. His hon. Friend (Mr. Parnell) had alluded to the case of Prince Edward's Island. Well, he (Mr. O'Connor) had examined one of the Acts—that of 1853—regarding the change of proprietors, and he had found that 20 per cent, or one-fifth only, was demanded; and accordingly, so far as precedents were concerned, even in the British Dominions themselves, they were in favour of a larger proportion of money being granted to the tenants. Finally, he would impress this on the Committee—that this clause, if properly amended, would be more effective in establishing just and harmonious relations between landlord and tenant than the vast complicated machinery of the previous part of the Bill. They had conceded power to the Commissioners to purchase the land and give it to the tenant. The Commissioners might purchase a piece of land, and give it to a tenant on one side of a ditch, and that holding would cease to be rented in a certain time by the payment of a certain amount of money. Did they think the tenant on the other side of the ditch would remain one minute longer than he could help it a tenant in place of a lord of the soil? The result of this Amendment would be that the landlord who wished to retain his territorial power and his friendly relations with the tenant would treat the tenant properly, because he would know that the moment he became anything like an oppressive landlord the tenant would have the right to go to the Court and force him out of his possession. The indirect effect of the clause would be to establish tenant right more effectually than any previous portion of the Bill. He quite agreed that this was a point the Irish Members ought to fight with a certain amount of determination, and he was willing to go to as many divisions as necessary.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that, of course, the Committee were anxious to get through with the Business; but if there was any truth in the assertion made on the part of the Government—as there was—that this, the peasant proprietary portion of the measure, was the portion of it of the greatest magnitude, in their conception the main object up to which all the other lines of this measure were to lead, he appealed to the Committee to give a patient hearing to the Irish Members whilst they made not speeches, but a few brief observations on this point. What he had to say was this. They had heard the speech—a speech of marked ability, though characterized by his usual combativeness—of the hon. Member for Galway City (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) who acted upon their national motto by wherever he saw a head hitting it. In the argumentative part of the hon. Member's speech he agreed; but he did not share the hon. Member's view as to the motive which he seemed to think animated the Government in resisting the Irish Members in this matter. He had no doubt that the Government sincerely believed that they were extending to Ireland in these Purchase Clauses a generous boon, and he should presently show how far he agreed with the hon. Member in this matter; but it would have been a noble act on the part of Abraham Lincoln, and a splendid deed upon which his memory might have rested, if, instead of emancipating the American slaves at a stroke of the pen, he had granted emancipation to all who might be born 50 years after his time. It would have been a splendid deed in the days of Wilberforce if the same course had been adopted with regard to the slaves of the West Indies. It was, no doubt, a generous deed on the part of Her Majesty's Government to propose to assist the Irish peasants to purchase their holdings. It would have been even a generous deed to advance half the amount, it would have been more generous to advance two-thirds, and still more so to advance three-fourths; but what did they ask of Her Majesty's Government? They asked the Government to dare to be bold, and to be generous, and to be wise. The Government of the day had acted upon the principle which was moving Her Majesty's Ministers when they emancipated the British slaves. The House of Commons of to-day conceived it to be wisdom to half or three-quarters to do a generous deed. They thought they had accomplished some great statesmanship by taking a piece out of a generous deed, just as at first did the Parliament in the time of Wilberforce. But they had to follow up the first attempt with a completing effort, and in the same way Her Majesty's Government now seemed disposed to make two bites at the cherry. Their measure of apprenticeship had been a mistake, and they simply asked the Government now to make a concession which would clearly and completely enable the peasants of Ireland to become proprietors of their holdings. There could be no doubt that the mass of the English Members who were listening to him now regarded this question in their own minds as a vote of public money to Ireland. If it were, he entirely sympathized with their resistance. If it was said that the Irish Members were asking for a vote of public money, his reply was that they wanted no gift, and that he, for one, disclaimed the idea of asking for it. If they were not able to give any commercial security for this money he, for one, said they would have no mere almonizing aid from the House of Commons for their country. If, however, there were a margin of commercial security sufficient to warrant Parliament and the Ministry in making the advance asked for, why did they hesitate? What did the records of the House say as regarded advances to Ireland; and what had Parliament lost? ["Hear, hear!"] He rejoiced than an hon. Member cheered that question. He knew what was in his mind, and the hon. Member would see that he (Mr. Sullivan) had it in his. Out of the public taxes millions had been voted to Ireland, which had had subsequently to be wiped out. [An hon. MEMBER: So there have been to England.] An hon. Friend reminded him that so there had been for England; but he would deal with the Irish case. Their Votes of millions of money to the propertied and landed classes of Ireland had been wiped out. Take the Fishery Commissioners, who had had to deal with the industrial classes of Ireland. Look at the Blue Book Reports of the re-payments made to the Commissioners. Look, again, at the records of the Church Temporalities Commissioners, and he would ask how far had they met with repudiation from the tenant farmers of Ireland? Though they had wiped away millions advanced to the Irish landlords—and he was sure they had had a good case for the remission—they had never had to confront repudiation on the part of the masses of the people of Ireland. He did not wish to interfere with the argument of his hon. Friend; but he disassociated himself entirely from the charge that the Government mistrusted the people on this occasion. They merely had not the courage to go the full length that their convictions would carry them. They were afraid of the doctrinaires who sat behind them. There was nothing so popular in the House as to sneer at the unanimity of the Irish Members when they desired to have a pull at the public purse. It was one of those jokes which a Member even as dull as himself might always rely upon securing a laugh and a cheer from the House with, if attention were at all flagging from the subject under debate. But he put it beside him, and said that this was no application to their public purse. He had as strong views as even the Prime Minister himself as to the demoralization caused in Ireland by grants of public money, unless granted on sound principles. This question of the difference between three-fourths and four-fifths was no matter for the Government to stand upon, was no matter upon which to resist the Irish Members, Conservatives and Home Rulers alike. They ought to rejoice to see some sympathy between the Irish landlords that remained to them and the Irish tenants, and should be prepared to give way when they saw the Irish Members, irrespective of the quarter of the House in which they sat, combining, as at present, for one purpose.

Question put.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he wished to move an Amendment which was not on the Notice Paper, the object of which was to draw a distinction between residential tenants and grazing tenants. The Government, he thought, should give more to the residential than to the grazing tenant.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 31, after the word "three-fourths," insert the words "except in the case of a residential tenant, when they may advance four-fifths."—(Major Nolan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL wished to know whether, after the vote they had just taken, this Amendment was in Order?

THE CHAIRMAN: Really, so many Amendments have been handed to me in this way that I have not had time to consider whether they are in Order or not.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the Committee had just decided that the Commission might advance to the tenant for the purposes of the purchase "any sum not exceeding three-fourths of the said principal sum." Now, the hon. and gallant Member proposed that in certain cases the Commission might advance four-fifths. This could hardly be in Order, as the Committee had fixed a sum to apply to the whole range of purchases. ["No, no!"] Yes; it appeared so to him.

MAJOR NOLAN said, his was not an artificial exception. It was a clear and tangible exception, recognized in many Bills, and, in particular, recognized by the Prime Minister, who had brought in this measure, because he practically excepted all grazing farms. He was following up the principle of the Bill in this proposal, although his exception was much less in degree than that made in the measure.

THE CHAIRMAN: If residential tenants are distinct from ordinary tenants the Amendment will be in Order.

MR. GLADSTONE: As a matter of fact, out of every 100 tenants in Ireland 99 are residential. ["No!"] I think I am within the mark in saying that. There can be no doubt at all about the fact that the great mass of the tenants are residential. We have spent the whole evening in debating, as we thought, the case of the whole mass of the tenants—of 99 out of 100—and have come to a decision of three to one in favour of the proposal of the Government; and now the hon. and gallant Member asks that we should re-discuss the question, as it affects 1 per cent, with a view to accepting the opinion of the minority. I need not say that the Government, having been reluctantly compelled to accept the Amendment made a short time ago in so becoming a manner, cannot accept the present proposal.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, that no doubt the Government had opposed them on the last division; but he had absolute information to the effect that they had done so through a want of acquaintance with the official facts. Evidently the Government had not studied the document which had been received that morning. He would tell the Committee what he referred to. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), who was incapable of—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he rose to Order. Had it been decided whether the Amendment could be moved or not?

THE CHAIRMAN: As I stated, if residential tenants are an exception to ordinary tenants the Amendment can be moved.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was saying that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who was incapable of intentionally misleading the Committee, or anyone else, made a serious statement, a while ago, which greatly influenced the Committee, and which, unknown to the right hon. Gentleman, was totally devoid of foundation. He stated that the failure of the Church Temporalities advances could in no case be attributed to the advances being only three-fourths. The right hon. Member was not aware, when he made that statement, that there was issued this morning, or yesterday, a Report of Messrs. Baldwin and Robertson, in which it was said that in one district 11 out of 18 failures in the advances offered out of the Church Temporalities Fund were due to the terms on which the remaining one-fourth had to be borrowed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have the Report in question in my hand.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the distinction he proposed was not a flimsy one, and, in proof of this, it was sufficient to say that from Ballinasloe to Galway nine-tenths of the land they saw along the railway was in the hands of non-residential tenants. The same, perhaps, could not be said of other parts of Ireland. For several years he had brought in a Bill especially and essentially founded on a distinction between residential and non-residential tenants, and, having brought in such a Bill, he was entitled to move such an Amendment as this.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the Prime Minister had spoken deprecatingly of the Committee being asked to accept the opinion of the minority. Well, the Irish Members were in a minority in that House; but it so happened that a vast majority of the Irish Members voted in favour of the grant of four-fifths; and he was quite sure it was by a slip that the Prime Minister made the statement, because if he wished the Committee not to attend to the practically unanimous voice of a section of the Members for the reason that they were in a minority, there was an argument involved which could be used in regard to a great deal of the Bill. He hoped the Committee would do a little violence to its former conviction and vote in favour of the four-fifths' advance. They ought to try to encourage the residential class of Irish tenants; and he was sure that nothing would be more popular than the acceptance of this Amendment.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, this was the clause to which the great majority of the Irish people looked for a solution of the Land Question of Ireland. It was of vital importance to the Irish tenants, and also to the landlords, that the question should be settled on a proper and wise basis. The best way to pacify the Irish people and to render England and Ireland really united was to confer perpetuity of tenure on the Irish tenants, giving them an interest in the peace and prosperity of the country. ["Divide!"] He was astonished that the Committee were not in a better humour, and he would remind them that they were a long way from the actual passing of Clause 19. He would suggest to the Committee that the best way to forward the interests of these people, which they all professed to have in view, was to listen to the opinions of Irish Members, on this clause especially. There were no Irish Representatives who would allow the measure to be proceeded with without making a protest against the purchases to take place under the clause. The best guarantee of a man's loyalty was to give him a stake in his country.

MR. LITTON said, he thought the Committee had discussed the main features of the clause sufficiently, and that it should be guided by the decision already arrived at.

MR. BRODRICK said, he was sure it was the feeling of the Committee that the discussion should not be further prolonged; but some facts had been mentioned which seemed to him to be of a very striking description, and he should like to know whether they were borne out by statistics. He had glanced over Messrs. Baldwin and Robertson's Report, and it certainly did not appear to him that the advances in connection with the Church Temporalities Fund were due to the difficulty that had been experienced in borrowing the remaining one-fourth. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would be able to give some satisfactory answer on this point.

MR. GLADSTONE: I was astonished when I heard the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan), because I had been reading the statement of Professor Baldwin and his coadjutor, Mr. Robertson. He said that the terms on which the advances had been made by the Church Temporalities Commissioners had been the main cause of the failure of those advances.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood him, and that nothing was further from his intention than to make such a statement as that. What he had said was that it was stated that in one district 11 out of 18 failures in the advances were due to the terms on which the remaining one-fourth had to be borrowed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I must say that I have been totally unable to collect any such statement from the Paper before me; but, of course, it is very difficult to refer to a document like this for such facts at a moment's notice. The manner in which the money has been borrowed is only occasionally referred to.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that as he had sat on the Committee in question he was able to say what really was the evidence given. The evidence was to this effect—that the tenants were so anxious to purchase that several of them who had very little means sold all they had—cows and everything—to make up the remainder of the purchase money; and the conclusion to be derived from that was not that the offer of three-fourths was not a sufficient inducement to those who ought to purchase, but that tenants who had not some backbone of their own should not be encouraged to purchase. Further than that, it was pointed out that one of the chief causes of the difficulties of these tenants was the large amount of legal costs which the tenants had to pay to the solicitors. ["Divide!"] He must request the Chairman to call to Order the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), who was interrupting him. The noble Lord, if he wished, could address the Committee when he had finished. It must be recollected that in this Bill the legal costs had been reduced to a minimum. The legal work was to be done for almost nothing; therefore, one of the greatest obstacles in the way of small tenants purchasing their holdings would be done away with.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must say that the discussion is getting very wide of the Amendment. The Question before the Committee has reference to residential holdings.

MR. GIVAN agreed with the Chairman that the discussion had got rather wide of the mark. He was convinced that the Government was making a gross mistake in not advancing something more, or making some concession to the Irish people in regard to this matter. What had shaken him in his belief more than anything else, however, had been the action of some hon. Members who voted with them in the last division. When he saw certain noble Lords and hon. Gentlemen coming through the door of the Lobby he could not help feeling Timeo Danāos. That, however, had not shaken his faith in this, that the only way to create a peasant proprietary in Ireland would be to advance them not three-fourths, but such sum as the Land Commission might declare to be necessary. Whilst he agreed that there had been certain valid objections to his own Amendment, he could not see that they applied to the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Galway (Major Nolan).

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 248: Majority 182.—(Div. List, No. 295.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment which stands on the Paper cannot be put, for the sale is made by the landlord to the tenant for a principal sum, and the landlord can only sell his own interest in the property and cannot sell the tenant's interest in the holding. Under these circumstances, the Amendment is inconsistent with the clause, and cannot be put.

MR. GREER moved an Amendment, in page 12, line 36, to leave out the word "one-half," in order to insert the word "three-fourths." The sub-section would then run thus—

"Where a sale of a holding is about to be made by a landlord to a tenant in consideration of the tenant paying a fine and engaging to pay to the landlord a fee-farm rent, the Land Commission may advance to the tenant for the purposes of such purchase, any sum not exceeding three-fourths of the fine payable to the landlord."

He hoped the Government would accept that Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 36, to leave out the word "one-half," in order to insert the word "three-fourths."—(Mr. Greer,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'one-half' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot agree to this Amendment. The point is whether we are justified in adopting any advances at all for such a purpose as this, when the fee-farm rent may form a very large proportion of the net product. These advances are most exceptional, and we only undertook them on consideration of the high policy of encouraging that which is to create a proprietary body. Although we have determined on proposing to make advances of this kind, I am sure the Committee would never agree to make the advance to them to the same extent as to those who can make a complete purchase. We have determined to make an advance of three-fourths for a complete purchase; but we cannot give so much to those who can only enter into a partnership transaction.

MR. O'DONNELL said, the great object was to have as much security as possible. Where an absolute proprietorship could not be obtained, the creation of a fee-farm ought to be very much encouraged by that House; but he could not but think they were rather committing a mistake in tying the hands of the Court beforehand. If the Court was to be a really responsible body, able to deal with the matter, it would be better to leave them to decide to what extent they would give a grant of public money. Judging from Mr. Baldwin's analysis of the cases in his Report, the most fertile cause of failure in the sales was due to the terms under which those sales had to be made. If the amount of assistance to be given to tenants who purchased fee-farms was to be too limited, those tenants would only be driven as other tenants had been driven to the village usurer—the "gombeen" man and the local solicitor—for advances to make up the amount. If it was a fair case for giving assistance, why not let the competent authorities on the spot decide to what extent the assistance should be given? If they thought only one-fourth should be advanced, let them advance only that sum. If they thought it should be one-half, let them give one-half. If they thought it should be three-fourths, why not allow them to recommend a grant of three-fourths? Holding this view, he was inclined to support the Amendment very strongly.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he thought there was an obvious flaw in the second part of the clause. He quite admitted the force of the Prime Minister's argument; but, as the clause now stood, there was very little security for the repayment of that portion of the amount which was advanced by the State. In order to make the clause symmetrical, the right hon. Gentleman had taken the same proportion as in transactions of an entirely different character. Where a tenant bought his holding, three-fourths of the money might be advanced by the State, and that proposal was intelligible enough; but the next was that in certain cases, where the tenant might be paying a fine and getting the farm at a perpetual fee-farm rent, the State should pay one-half the fine, the understanding being that the fee-farm rent should not exceed 75 per cent of the rent that a solvent tenant would pay. But the tenant might hold a very highly-rented farm, and the landlord might say—"If you like to buy you can; I will reduce it by 25 per cent." He (Lord George Hamilton) intended to propose an Amendment later on, which would provide that there should always be a considerable margin as security on which the State could advance a portion of the fine. If the Government would accept his Amendment, he thought they might also accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer), substituting three-fourths for one-half, because the security would be better.

MR. GLADSTONE: The transaction must be approved by the public authority, and that authority must in every case be responsible. I do not see that any cause has yet been shown why we should accept the Amendment. At all events, we could not agree to this form of it.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL pointed out that where the fee-farm rent represented 75 per cent of the value of the property, there only remained one quarter of which the State would advance a sum which would make seven-eighths of the whole forestalled and leave the tenant to pay only one-eighth.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought that in all these cases a very substantial option should be given to the Land Commissioners. It was only in very few and exceptional cases that the option would be reached.

Question put.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he had altered the wording of his Amendment, though not the substance, and its object was one that should receive support from both sides of the House. It was addressed to the clause as it now stood, and contemplated the case of a tenant holding at a fee-farm rent, and having made arrangements with his landlord by which he occupied his holding at a fixed unchangeable rent. In that state of things the landlord was reduced to the position of a mere rent-charger—that was to say, he could not increase the rent, but was simply in the position of an owner of a head rent, which he could not increase or change. The object of his Amendment, then, was, where the rent was so fixed and unchangeable, to enable the tenant to buy up his head rent at a fair price; and he put the value at the high price of £25 for each £1 rent; or — and this was the main object of the Amendment—where the tenant was not able to do this by buying up by a lump sum, to enable him to do it piecemeal. But, inasmuch as to do so piecemeal might be an inconvenience or an injustice to the landlord, if the sums paid were small, the clause would provide that where the landlord was not willing to accept this piecemeal payment, then the Land Commission might receive the money for the purpose of capitalizing a proportion of the rent until the rent was pro tanto extinguished, and the money paid over to the landlord by the Commission in reasonable amounts. The object, it would be seen, was to hold out an inducement to thrifty struggling tenants, and the best incentive to the exercise of care and energy, because if the Amendment were accepted, the tenant would be able to say at the beginning of the year—“If by extra exertion, extra efforts of frugality and self-denial, I am able to save £25, I shall reduce the rent by £1 a-year;” and once he felt this could be done he would begin to do it; and the Committee might rest assured that his efforts would never cease until he, by his payments, became discharged of the rent altogether. This offered a very proper inducement to the tenant to cultivate thrift and self-denial, while it would work no injury, certainly, and, he thought, no inconvenience even to the landlord. He read the Amendment in its slightly altered form. It would be obvious to the Government that it involved a slight loss of interest to the State; but that was so insignificant, and the object was so well-deserving of support, that he hoped the Amendment would be accepted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 37, after “landlord,” to insert—“Provided always, That where a tenant is holding at a fee farm rent he may buy up such rent at the rate of twenty-five pounds for each one pound of rent, or at as much less a rate as may be agreed upon between the landlord and tenant; and if the landlord be unwilling to accept such purchase money by instalments, the tenant may pay such instalments to the Land Commission, and the Land Commission shall receive the same and indemnify the tenant from a proportionate part of such rent, and when such payments shall amount to such a sum as the landlord may in the opinion of the Land Commission be reasonably called upon to accept, the Land Commission shall pay the same to the landlord, and thereupon the said fee farm rent shall pro tanto be extinguished.”—(Mr. Charles Russell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

Mr. GLADSTONE said, each of the Amendments might stand or fall quite apart from the other. In the first place, it was proposed that in the case of a fixed rent the tenant should have the absolute right to redeem that rent by buying out the landlord, certainly at a high rate, considering the average price at which land was sold in Ireland. Here the Committee was asked to adhere to a principle of considerable importance. It was a principle which was nowhere else inserted in the Bill, and he was not sure that it might not be made a precedent for other propositions which his hon. and learned Friend might not be responsible for. He (Mr. Gladstone) would like to consider the matter as a separate proposition, and he must frankly own that his present impression was not favourable to it. He doubted if it was desirable to introduce the principle of compulsory redemption, and it must be a strong reason to justify the Committee in adopting it. The second part of the Amendment was to the effect that where compulsory expropriation was effected the landlord should not be completely at the mercy of the tenant as to the mode of receiving instalments, and that was perfectly right as regarded the landlord; it would be hard upon him that he should be compelled to receive instalments; but then his hon. and learned Friend introduced a provision which it was to be feared would lead to the greatest complexity. It would require that the Land Commission should undertake the functions of a bank, and banking in the most minute detail, and that would be a great burden to impose upon a Commission not appointed for the purpose, and not acquainted with the management of a bank and the investment of small sums of cash. And the greatest objection was that there were all over the country institutions admirably suited for the purpose, the Post Office Savings Banks. The tenant whose savings were small had nothing to do but deposit them down to 1s. at a time in the Post Office Bank. There he would receive such interest as the State paid, and though that was little, it was as much as any such institution could pay, and when it reached a sum he could ask the landlord to take, he could take the money out of the bank. He was not quite certain, either, whether this was not a proposition that left it entirely with the Committee to authorize the Land Commission to become a bank, receive money, and pay interest. He had great doubt indeed whether it was within the Committee's power to adopt the clause. But, in any case, no purpose would be served even if after a great deal of labour and care a new branch of business was developed when there was no benefit to accrue, seeing that there was no place in Ireland that had not a Post Office Bank within a distance of five miles, or at most 10 miles in the most remote districts.

MR. ERRINGTON said, he regarded the Amendment as of much importance, and he was sorry to hear that the Prime Minister did not receive it favourably. A few nights before he proposed a similar Amendment to Clause 11, and he then understood the right hon. Gentleman to be in favour of the principle itself; but he (Mr. Errington) did not then wish to press the Amendment, because he understood that the power to carry it out was virtually contained in the Bill as it stood. He could only say that he had heard from many quarters in Ireland, and from persons of much experience on the subject, that there was hardly anything more important in regard to increasing the number of peasant proprietors than the opportunity afforded to tenants, at frequent periods, of placing their capital in the land in small sums. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk proposed the most important machinery for carrying this out. He did not understand that the proposition was that the Commission should undertake all the detailed work of the Post Office Bank; but it merely would empower the Commission, if necessary, to make use of the Post Office Bank as a means of receiving the money of the tenant, so that, by a process of fining down of the rent, the purchase of the holding by the tenant might be facilitated. He hoped the Prime Minister would carefully consider the principle involved, and he could assure him that persons who had the greatest interest and the desire to see tenants obtain a good, material, strong, and powerful interest in the land, saw that this was one of the most important means of carrying it out.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he was afraid his proposal had not received so much encouragement as would justify him in going to a division, and he was not insensible to some of the practical difficulties which the Prime Minister had pointed out. But he did think it was worthy of consideration. He begged to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

POORRELIEFANDAUDITOFACCOUNTS
(SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) moved that the Bill be read a second time, with the view of submitting it to a Select Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Advocate.)

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, that he had no wish to oppose the Motion; but he must express his opinion that it was not right that a Bill of this importance should be brought on for second reading at 1 o'clock in the morning. He knew that the Lord Advocate was not to blame for the Bill being brought on at that time; but, at the same time, it was not satisfactory to the people of Scotland that a Bill of this kind, affecting seriously the administration of the Poor Law in that country, should pass the second reading at an hour when discussion was impossible. It was right, however, to say to his right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, who had charge of the Bill, that there were provisions in it which would receive strong objections if not amended. There were several provisions which would give general satisfaction, especially those which applied to Scotland the provisions of the Act of 1879, with regard to lunatic paupers, who were entitled to hold property through their connection with Friendly Societies, and which, to a certain extent, did away with the right to cede to Parochial Boards, in virtue of proprietorship. But in order that the Bill should receive the general approval of the people of Scotland, it would be necessary still further to do away with that privilege; and, for his part, he did not see why Parochial Boards should not be on the same footing as Municipal Bodies and School Boards, and be composed of persons entirely elected by the ratepayers. As he had already said, he would not oppose the second reading; but he thought it right that that stage should not be passed without an intimation on the part of some Scotch Member that considerable changes would have to be made in it.

MR. HEALY said, he thought a Bill of this kind should not be read a second time without a word of discussion. He knew nothing about the measure; but in Ireland there were grievances as to poor relief and the way in which grants were made, and the only way of bringing them forward was on English and Scotch Bills.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, as his hon. Friend had been disregarded by the Treasury Bench, and treated with discourtesy which was not common in the House, he should move the adjournment of the debate.

[The Motion, not being seconded, could not be put.]

DR. CAMERON explained that it was only proposed to read the Bill a second time in order to refer it to a Select Committee, by which it could be gone into.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on July 12, Committee nominated as follows:—MR. ANDERSON, MR. ANDREW GRANT, MR. J. HAMILTON, MR. M'LAGAN, MR. HENDERSON, MR. BOLTON, MR. MATHESON, MR. MELDON, MR. HIBBERT, MR. ORR EWING, MR. COCHRANE-PATRICK, MR. DALRYMPLE, MR. JAMES CAMPBELL, Admiral Sir JOHN HAY, MR. LODGE, Colonel ALEXANDER, MR. HEALY, Lord ELCHO, and the LORD ADVOCATE:—Five to be the quorum.

And, on July 19, Sir EDWARD COLEBROOKE and MR. ARTHUR BALFOUR added.

House adjourned at One o'clock.

PRECOGNITIONS (SCOTLAND).

MOTION FOR RETURNS.

THE EARL OF MINTO, in moving for Returns upon this subject, apprehended that the Government would have no objection in granting what he desired; but the question in the latter part of the Motion involved a proposal entirely novel, and one to which there might be a little objection. He submitted, however, that it was only right and reasonable that when it was known that investigations into cases of death under suspicious or unknown circumstances were being made, the results should be communicated to the public. The way in which he proposed this should be effected was, that the procurator fiscal should communicate the information to the Clerk of the Commissioners of Supply, and the reason why he selected that official was that he was the clerk of the representative body of the proprietors, who were responsible for the expenses of the county. Therefore, he thought the Clerk of Supply was the proper officer to whom this information should be given. He hoped the Government would agree with his proposal. The noble Earl concluded by asking Her Majesty's Government whether they are disposed to give instructions that a Return of the number of cases of sudden death or of death under suspicious or unknown circumstances which have been the subject of precognition by procurators fiscal in each county in Scotland should be communicated monthly to the Clerk of Supply of each such county, with a statement of the result of the inquiry in each case, and specifying the cases in which the investigations were from the first connected with charges of murder, culpable homicide, &c. ?

Moved for,

1. Return from each county in Scotland of the number of cases of sudden death or of death under suspicious or unknown circumstances which have been the subject of precognition by procurators fiscal in each of the years 1879 and 1880; specifying the number of such cases as have been the subject of criminal trials: Such Returns not to include cases in which the investigations were from the first connected with charges of murder, culpable homicide, &c. :

2. Similar Return from each county in Scotland of the cases in which the investigations were from the first connected with charges of murder, culpable homicide, &c.—(The Earl of Minto.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE, in reply, had to say, on behalf of the Government, that there was no objection whatever to grant the Returns which had been moved for by the noble Earl. As to the Question with which the noble Earl had concluded, the Government would endeavour to give such instructions as would have the effect of attaining the object which the noble Earl had in view. The instructions at present to the procurators fiscal were that communications between parties in suspected cases should be regarded as strictly confidential, and also that the criminal investigation at the instance of the Crown should also, in a strict sense, be private and confidential, but in practice, when, in the course of inquiry, the procurator fiscal was asked by parties outside to give information, he then communicated with the Crown Agent, who consulted the Advocate Depute as to the advisability of his doing so. The Secretary of State for the Home Department would give such instructions as would meet the noble Earl's views.

THE EARL OF MINTO: May I ask to whom the information will be given ?

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE: The information will, of course, be in the hands of the fiscal, who will give it, if so advised by the Advocate Depute, to the party who asks for it.

Motion agreed to.

Returns ordered to be laid before the House.

The Earl of Minto

CLAIMS OF PEERAGE, &c.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, in rising to move—

“That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the law as to claims and assumptions of titles of peerage in the United Kingdom and in Scotland and Ireland respectively, and the means of proving and establishing the same; and as to the proceedings and claims to vote at elections of Representative Peers of Scotland and Ireland respectively; and as to the position and order of precedence of Scotch peerages upon the Roll called the Union Roll and in the Decree of Ranking of 1606; and whether it is desirable that the present state of law or practice as to any of the matters aforesaid should be amended: And also to inquire into the present procedure and practice of this House in its Committee of Privileges, and whether such procedure and practice can be amended so as to diminish the delay and expense incident to the determination of claims of peerage and claims to vote at elections of Representative Peers of Scotland and Ireland respectively,” said, the subject with which his Motion dealt was one in which their Lordships took a deep interest; but it did not call upon them to express any opinion whatever on the merits of the question, but only to pronounce that an inquiry was desirable in this matter. With regard to the first part of the Motion, he would point out that, under the present state of the law, the course adopted by a claimant to a title or Peerage was this—He presented a Petition to the Crown, that Petition was referred to their Lordships' House, the Lord Chancellor investigated the case, and, if he thought that everything was satisfactory, he reported to the House that the noble Lord had made out his title. If the Lord Chancellor was not satisfied, the case then went before the Committee of Privileges. In Ireland, for a considerable time, every Peer who wanted to prove his title was obliged to come before a Committee of Privileges, a very tedious and, in some cases, a very expensive process; but in 1857, by a Resolution of their Lordships' House, the course adopted with regard to Irish Peers' claims and votes was assimilated to that which took place in the case of English Peers. In Scotland, however, the Peer was not called upon to prove his title, as in the case of English and Irish Peers; and, as a consequence of this, it sometimes happened that persons presented themselves at the election of Scotch Representative Peers, and claimed to vote, whom, perhaps, very few people ever heard of before, and it was nobody's business in particular to object. Individual Peers might object, and generally did object; but the result only was that the elections were sometimes characterized by scenes that were not very dignified. He thought it might be desirable to inquire whether, in this respect, it might not be well to assimilate the usage with regard to Peers claiming to vote in the Scottish Peerage, and to put them on the same footing as persons claiming Irish and English Peerages. Well, then, the Committee which he asked their Lordships to grant was to inquire as to the position and order of precedence of Scotch Peerages upon the Roll called the Union Roll, and in the Decree of Ranking of 1606. Well, he saw the noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh) objected to that part of the inquiry, and had placed a Notice on the Paper that the words be left out; but he confessed that he did not see how they were to go into an inquiry of this nature, leaving out, at the same time, all reference to two very important documents which, after all, were the basis of the claim of precedence of the Scotch Peers. To the next part of his Motion, whether it was desirable that the present state of that law should be amended, he thought it was generally admitted that some inconvenience had arisen from the present state of the law of Scotland, and that these inconveniences had been very generally recognized. He thought that was apparent from the fact that at various times Committees had been appointed to investigate this subject, and their Lordships had at various times passed Resolutions with the view of altering or improving the state of things as regards the method of establishing Scotch Peerages. In 1832, in 1847, in 1869, and in 1874 Committees were appointed to inquire into the various branches of this whole question. The Committee of 1874, of which his noble Friend (the Earl of Rosebery) was Chairman, was rather wider in its scope than that which he asked to be appointed, because they went into the political question, which he hoped this Committee would not have anything to do with. They recommended that all Scotch Peers should be called up to their Lordships' House, and that the Roll should be as in Ireland—a Roll of individuals, and not Peerages. He did not think that any of the recommendations of that Committee had been acted upon except one, which was, that a Petition should be presented to the Crown, praying Her Majesty to create no more Irish Peers. He had pointed out some matters in which, more particularly as regarded the election of Scotch Peers, this Committee must inquire; but perhaps the last paragraph in the Motion was the most important. He believed there was no doubt that very great delays took place before their Lordships were able to give judgment; and he thought it would be well to consider whether some means might not be adopted by which these delays would be obviated. It was not always possible to obtain the services of noble and learned Lords for Committees of Privilege when they were very much engaged at the time. It was very difficult indeed, sometimes, to get lay Lords to sit in sufficient numbers to form a quorum. He was not surprised at this, because lay Lords had no voice in the decision of the tribunal. They had to listen to long, abstruse, and highly technical legal arguments, which they were often not capable of following; and, in fact, as far as the lawyers were concerned, it did appear to him that the whole thing, not to speak disrespectfully, was a solemn farce. He served once upon one of those Committees, and although he was not desirous of shirking any work that might be useful, still he could not see any advantage of sitting the whole day long, listening to speeches which it was utterly impossible, from the want of legal knowledge, to understand. He thought, therefore, it was very well worth considering whether some modification might not be made in the constitution of the tribunal, so as to insure some approach to expedition in its proceedings. Then the expense was very great; indeed, he was told that Lord Balcarres, in the process to establish his title, had to spend upwards of £20,000; and he understood in the case of the Duke of Montrose, who did not succeed in establishing his claim, the trial cost him much more. It would, he submitted, be very desirable to obviate the great delay and expense attending upon cases of this kind.

Moved, that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the present state of the law as to claims and assumptions of titles of peerage in the United Kingdom and in Scotland and Ireland respectively, and the means of proving and establishing the same; and as to the proceedings and claims to vote at elections of Representative Peers of Scotland and Ireland respectively; and as to the position and order of precedence of Scotch peerages upon the Roll called the Union Roll, and in the Decree of Ranking of 1606; and whether it is desirable that the present state of law or practice as to any of the matters aforesaid should be amended: And also to inquire into the present procedure and practice of this House in its Committee of Privileges; and whether such procedure and practice can be amended so as to diminish the delay and expense incident to the determination of claims of peerage and claims to vote at elections of Representative Peers of Scotland and Ireland respectively.—
(The Earl of Airlie.)

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH, in rising to move the omission of the words—

“And as to the position and order of precedence of Scotch Peerages upon the Roll called the Union Roll and in the Decree of Ranking of 1606,” said, that before moving his Amendment, he wished to say a few words on that part of the Motion which he did not oppose. He did not object to it, but he did not think that any case had been made out for going into the whole of the inquiry suggested by the noble Earl. At the same time, he would not urge the point upon the House, provided the higher legal authorities in the House were willing that such an inquiry as this should be undertaken. He thought the inquiry was not required, because the state of the law as to claim and assumption to title in the Peerage of Scotland was perfectly well known. The numerous Committees that had sat upon this question had thoroughly established to the satisfaction of everybody what the state of the law was. This question was, he believed, fully discussed before a Committee of the House so long ago as 1832; and the Committee issued a Report recommending, among other things, that the claimants to Scotch Peerages, and persons claiming to vote in Scotch Peerages, under which no vote had been recorded since 1801, should not be allowed to vote without first going before the Committee of Privileges. They also recommended that in all cases when claims were made for Peerages, on succession by collaterals, except brothers of the last noble, a certificate should be issued by the Lord Chancellor in the same way as for Irish Peerages. The first of those two recommendations was not acted upon till 1847, the other had not been acted upon at all. The Act of 1847 provided also that whenever any Peer or Peeress should have established his or her right to any Peerage, or the right to vote in respect of any Peerage, and the same should have voted at any election of Representative Peers, then the Lord Clerk Register, or Lords of Session, should not, during the life of such Peer or Peeress, allow any other person claiming to answer to such title to take part in any such election, nor should it be lawful for any such Lord Clerk Register, or Lords of Session, to allow the vote of any other such person unless directed by the House of Lords. That was a perfectly clear enactment, and if it had been acted on, he believed some of the painful scenes which had occurred at late elections of Representative Peers at Holyrood would not have occurred. At all events, they would not have occurred a second time; and now that this section had been brought under the notice of those who were in the habit of attending these elections, he should think there was very little danger of these scenes occurring again. The one false step which had been made in this matter was the rescinding, in 1862, of the Resolutions which obliged all claimants for Peerages, who claimed to succeed in any other way than in a direct line, to come before the Committee of Privileges. He thought the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch), who moved the rescinding of the Resolutions in 1862, had publicly expressed in this House his regret at having taken that step with regard to claims for the possession of Scotch Peerages. He was of opinion that if that Resolution were re-enacted, it would meet all the difficulties under which they now laboured. With regard to the last part of the Motion, he must say that a very good case could be made out for inquiry into the practice and the procedure of the Committee of Privileges. Their practice and procedure, it might safely be said, required amendment on several points. In addition to the delay caused, and the very unpleasant position which lay Peers were called upon to occupy, there was the enormous and overwhelming expense to the unfortunate claimant, and those who opposed the claims before the Committee. The Earl of Crawford had spent, it was said, £20,000 in pursuing his claim before the Committee. His noble Friend near him (the Earl of Mar and Kellie) told him he had spent a very large sum in prosecuting his claim. He himself had unfortunately very intimate knowledge of the amount which he, and his father before him, were obliged to spend in making good his claim to the Peerage which he now had the honour to enjoy. He thought, therefore, a very good case could be made out for inquiring into the practice of the Committee of Privileges. But when they were asked to inquire into the position and order of precedence of Scotch Peerages on the Roll called the Union Roll, and in the Decreet of Ranking of 1606, he must ask their Lordships to pause before they started on any such course. The Motion, as he understood it, was to inquire into the position and precedence of individual Peerages on the Roll; and he must say that he thought, whether that settlement was perfect in all respects or not, it would be exceedingly unwise to re-open the whole subject, after the settlement had existed for upwards of 250 years, on account of some minor imperfections which were alleged to exist in it. Perhaps their Lordships were not aware how that Decreet and Ranking took place. It took place in 1606, and the cause of its being ordered by King James was the constant quarrels and bickerings which took place among the Scotch Peers as to their precedence, when they were in the habit of going in state from the Palace of Holyrood up to the Scottish Parliament, and it was with the view of composing those differences that this Decreet was ordered. The Commissioners were instructed to summon the Peers before them, and place the Peerages in their proper order. He believed some went before them, and some did not; at any rate, the matter was gone into very hurriedly, and the result was that even greater dissatisfaction was caused than had existed before. According to the Union Roll, Peerages were not put in anything like complete consecutive order, according to the dates of their creation. The Decreet of Ranking never gave satisfaction; but, nevertheless, he thought that to upset a document which had been a settlement of the question for upwards of 250 years would lead to a great deal more trouble and annoyance, and perhaps a great deal more ill-feeling, after the new settlement had been arrived at, than if matters were left as they were. He could not conceive anything more unfortunate than re-opening such a question. He should pity the Committee that had to undertake it, because it would take a large number of years to get through it. There was, besides, machinery existing for putting right any defects on the Roll. If any Peers felt themselves aggrieved by the position they held on it, there was machinery by which such a man could protest and get himself placed above one who was wrongly put above him. He believed their Lordships had more than once asked the Court of Session, as in 1740, to provide a more perfect Roll than the Union Roll, and that the Lords of Session protested that the matter was too difficult for them to solve, and that they could not really undertake to do it and settle it satisfactorily. He would further like to ask of legal authorities whether it was competent to their Lordships to undertake such inquiry? He had always understood that questions of precedence, except so far as related to seats on the Benches of this House, were not within the cognizance of their Lordships. It might be said that, under the Motion, the Committee would not be instructed to inquire into and settle the precedence of individual Peerages, but only into the state of the law on the subject. If that was so, surely it was not an inquiry which it would be worth while going into; and he could not see how it could be dissociated from the much larger question to which he had referred. In conclusion, he should be guided by the amount of support he received in the discussion as to whether he should press to a division the Amendment which he had put on the Paper. The noble Lord then moved his Amendment.

Amendment moved,

To leave out ("and as to the position of order of precedence of Scotch Peerages upon the Roll called the Union Roll, and in the Decreet of Ranking of 1606.")—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, he would suggest that the time allowed between the issue of the Writ and the making of the Return in regard to the election of Representative Peers should be shortened from 52 days to 32, in consequence of the increased facilities of communication now existing.

LORD BLANTYRE said, after much dissatisfaction had been expressed lately at the manner in which the Union Roll had been dealt with at the elections at Holyrood—there had been a number of Protests at every election—it was all the more necessary that inquiry should be made into the matter, and there was no sort of reason why inquiry should be evaded.

EARL CAIRNS said, there were two subjects which must be of paramount interest in that House, and as to which every information desired ought to be put before it. The one was the claims to Peerages which would confer a seat in that House; the other was the claim to vote for Representative Peers who were to have seats in that House. The greater part of this Motion proposed an inquiry into the state of the law as to claims to Peerages, as to the manner in which they ought to be substantiated, and into the procedure which should be resorted to in case they became the subject of dispute. If Her Majesty's Government, in a matter of that kind, particularly where the Prerogative of the Crown was concerned, thought it right to accede to such an inquiry, he certainly should not be disposed to offer any opposition to it; but, on the contrary, thought that advantage might arise from the inquiry. With regard to an observation of his noble Friend behind him (Lord Balfour of Burleigh), as to the Committee of Privileges, he did not say that the procedure of that Committee might not be improved, and especially that part of it which required the presence of seven Peers; but any persons who fancied that the Committee of Privileges and the proceedings before it could be made an inexpensive matter would, he believed, find themselves disappointed. But there were matters connected with claims to the Peerage—the manner in which the country, and even the national archives, would have to be ransacked for ancient documents, the character of the evidence which had to be brought to bear upon those documents, the time over which search must extend, perhaps for years, the manner in which documents must be printed and submitted for most careful examination—all these were things which could not be determined without a very great amount of expense. He did not mean to say that the expenses were not greater than they ought to be; but these must necessarily be very expensive processes. So far, therefore, as the Motion proposed inquiry into the procedure of the Committee of Privileges, he did not object to it. It was a Motion which concerned not only Scotland, but England and Ireland also. It touched them all. But then, in the centre of his Motion, the noble Lord proposed certain special inquiries with reference to Scotland, and this seemed to him to be open to objections, and he thought their Lordships ought to be careful before they acceded to that part of the Motion. A claim to a Peerage, or a claim to vote for a Representative Peer, was one thing; a claim to simple precedence was a wholly different thing. It had nothing whatever to do with the question of right to a seat in this House, and precedence was a matter which, except so far as it had been taken out of the control of the Crown by Act of Parliament, was for the Crown. They knew that the great statute of precedence—51 Henry VIII.—stated on the face of it that the regulating and granting of precedence was for the Crown; and, therefore, it proceeded to declare that the establishing of precedence of Peers in Parliament was within the Prerogative of the Crown. No precedence beyond that remained for the Crown to regulate. Now, for what purpose were they to inquire into this subject? Was it to raise again the question of the Mar Peerage? He hoped not.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, it was not.

EARL CAIRNS said, he was glad it was not to raise that question. The Union Roll and the Decreet of Ranking might have their faults; but, if so, let individual cases stand upon their merits. Let them not have a Committee to inquire specifically as to the value of the two documents which were mentioned in that Motion, and which related to Scotland alone, and did not deal with the question of the Peerage generally, but only with precedence. If there arose a dispute as to which Peerage was the more ancient and had a right to sit above the others, that was a claim, not to a Peerage, but to precedence in that House. He did not believe that that question had arisen in the memory of any Member of that House, or for 100 years. He thought, therefore, that their Lordships would have done enough—if he might offer that advice—by intrusting to the Committee the very important investigation which the rest of the Motion would give to them. To go beyond that would, he believed, cause great embarrassment, delay, and trouble, without answering any good object.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I have to say for the Government that I am not prepared to offer any objections to the Motion of the noble Earl. There can be no doubt, I think, that it would be a good thing that inquiry into the succession to Peerages and claims to vote should take the same course, and be under the same law, in all parts of the United Kingdom. At present it is well regulated in England and in Ireland, and it may be a consequence of that regulation that nobody in England or Ireland thinks of making a claim to a Peerage before it has been investigated in this House, or perseveres in it when it has been disallowed after investigation in this House. No doubt there have been cases in which titles have been assumed which have not been substantiated; but those have been cases depending upon questions of fact, and as soon as decisions of this House have been obtained, such claims as are contrary to them have ceased to be made. But it must be known to all your Lordships that that which is the rule in England and in Ireland is not the rule in Scotland, and that from time to time various titles to Peerages have been assumed in Scotland by persons who have not taken the means which were open to them of submitting their claims to investigation in this House; and hitherto there have been no means provided by law, except under particular conditions, for causing those claims to be inquired into; and one consequence of that has been that some discussions, very inexpedient and undesirable, as to the grounds of particular decisions of your Lordships' Committee of Privileges, have been raised in the way of general debate in this House. To put the course of procedure, in all such cases, on a uniform and well-regulated footing, seems to me a desirable thing. With respect to the last part of the Motion, as to the procedure and practice of this House in its Committee of Privileges, while I entirely agree with what my noble and learned Friend has said, that in most cases, or at least in many, there must be much unavoidable expense, yet I think it is something like a scandal that from year to year, from Session to Session, nobody knowing how much time will be occupied in one Session, or how many protracted stages there may be, the same claims are allowed to drag on and continue very much at the convenience of those who are interested in conducting those cases out-of-doors. I cannot but think that, although it may be impossible strictly and literally to apply to those claims exactly the same rules which are applicable to ordinary cases of civil litigation, yet a very much greater approximation might be made—that is to say, claimants might be required within reasonable limits of time, and in something like a regular course, to bring in their evidence, and take the judgment of the Committee of Privileges upon its effect. You might not be able, in all cases, to prevent them from being renewed, but you could prevent claims from being protracted over a very great length of time. The question of precedence does not directly interest this House, except so far as it may affect either the weight or value of evidence in cases of Peerage claims, and the relative precedence in this House of any Representative Peers from Scotland, as between whom questions of precedence may arise. Precedence stood originally upon the Royal Prerogative; but, as the noble and learned Lord has said, so far as relates to England, the legislation of the Reign of Henry VIII. has put it upon the footing of law. As to the Scotch Representative Peers, they, by the Act of Union, take rank in this House as at the date of the Act of Union. Among themselves, they take rank when the dignities are of the same degree, according to the dates of their creation. If it so happened that an Earl of Rothes, for example, and some other noblemen now standing above the Earl of Rothes upon the Union Roll, were at the same time to be returned as Representative Peers, the question of precedence between them might arise. Now, the matter stands in this peculiar way. The Decree of Ranking of James I. is not an instrument by which the King, in the exercise of the Royal Prerogative, granted any precedence. It was the result of the Commission of Inquiry issued by authority of that King to look into the documents upon which the actual rights of priority or precedence would depend, and to report accordingly. The King established the result of these findings; but the Commission, at the same time, provided that if anyone should be aggrieved by the order of precedence so settled, he might appeal to the Court of Session, and that Court might pass a decree to rectify any mistake that might have been committed. Under that power the Court of Session, at the beginning of the Reign of Charles I., altered, in one instance (that of the Earl of Buchan), the precedence fixed by the Decree of Ranking; and an Act of Parliament was passed to confirm that change. One or two other cases were brought forward; but, so far as I have been able to trace the matter, they came to nothing, and the claims were dropped. So that, except in the case of the Earl of Buchan, no actual rectification has been made; and as to all other Peerages, the Union Roll simply represents the Decree of Ranking. It may be a matter of serious doubt whether the Court of Session would now consider that it has authority to entertain any such question of priority, seeing that the only original authority was derived from King James' Commission, and that, in the single case in which the order of precedence has been changed, it was thought necessary to have an Act of Parliament to confirm the decision in Lord Buchan's favour. It appears to me that, in that state of things, it might be desirable, not to inquire whether this Peer or that is in the proper place in the Union Roll or Decree of Ranking, an inquiry which I should deprecate quite as much as my noble Friend who moves the Amendment; but into the state of the law as to the means of correcting such errors (if any) as may exist in those instruments. As I understand the Motion, all that is intended is that the Committee should inquire, not into the position and order of precedence of the Scotch Peerage upon the Roll, but into the present state of the law with regard to several matters, of which this is one. I have explained the reasons which led me not to anticipate the objections which have been made on this point. My mind is perfectly open upon the subject, and I do not desire in the least to influence your Lordships if you think this part of the proposed inquiry unnecessary.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY said, he did not rise to take any part in the discussion; nor did he think that the matter was of great importance as to whether this Committee sat or not. The fact was, that all the information the Committee required was in the hands of the House. The main points that were raised with respect to the Scotch Peerage, which were sufficiently obvious, were already fully laid before the House in the Report of the evidence of the Committee of 1874; but if there was any anxiety on the part of their Lordships to sit on another Committee, he saw no reason to prevent their doing so. At the same time, he would point out that what was wanted was not a Committee or information. There were various important recommendations of the Committee now in evidence before their Lordships. They had been in the hands of their Lordships for some years, and there had been no tendency whatever to take any action upon them. The matter was one of so much delicacy and of dignity, as affecting a large section of the Peerage, that it could only be introduced upon the responsibility of Her Majesty's Government; and certainly, considering the present state of Public Business, it was not to be expected that the Government would be prepared to bring in such a measure this year. As regarded that very difficult point, which was not merely a question of precedence but a question of seemliness at the election of Scotch Peers, they had a suggestion that, instead of a Roll of Peerage to which there were likely to be a dozen claimants, and which had led to scenes almost giving one the idea of personal combat, these scenes might be avoided by making the Roll one of individual Peers and not of Peerages to which people could lay claim. The preparation of such a Roll would require a Committee of great lawyers, and a Committee that would sit with great labour and patience for, he should think, a considerable number of years, and when that was done they should have some hopes of getting the question put into a satisfactory state. He wished to point out that a mere collection of information was a very flabby and endless mode of dealing with this question. He did not know if noble Lords were anxious to sit upon another

The Lord Chancellor

Committee, but he was quite certain that it was not by Committees that this subject could be settled. This Committee would have to guard itself very strictly against the danger pointed out of descending into the usual controversies concerning the Mar Peerage.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) thought that it would be unwise to re-open this question, which had long been settled, for good or ill. An inquiry into a Peerage claim was very different from any other legal proceeding, in consequence of the number of years that the inquiry extended back. In the Annandale Peerage case, for instance, the Committee had to investigate a line of descent commencing in the 15th century. He had received a letter from a noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleugh) who had taken much interest in the matter, in which he stated it would be impossible for the Committee to go into the whole of the details of the subject unless they were prepared to sit for many months, or perhaps years, and that it would involve a large expenditure of money, public as well as private. He agreed with the remarks that had fallen from the noble Lord who had just sat down, and he hoped the House would agree to the Amendment of the noble Lord behind him.

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, the only object of the part of the Resolution objected to was to investigate and see whether this Decree of Ranking was a document of value, without the intention of going into any particular Peerage. He could not but hope their Lordships might think it best, therefore, to accept the Resolution proposed by his noble Friend opposite in its entirety, after hearing the remarks of the Lord Chancellor on the subject.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE said, that, in accordance with the feeling of the House, he was willing to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord (Lord Balfour of Burleigh).

On question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the motion, resolved in the negative; and motion, as amended, agreed to.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE WINDSOR REVIEW.

EARL GRANVILLE: Perhaps it would be convenient that I should state to the House the arrangements that have been made for the accommodation of Members of both Houses on the occasion of the Royal Review at Windsor to-morrow. Space for about 500 has been roped off in front of the Royal carriages and to the left of the saluting-point. The Ranger will do his best to provide accommodation for Members' carriages behind the Royal carriages.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: It may also be for the convenience of the House that I should state that arrangements have been made for special trains for the conveyance of Members of both Houses to Windsor to-morrow; but that no arrangements have been made for special trains for the return journey. [Laughter.] Perhaps I ought to modify that statement by saying that at present I have not received information that any arrangements for return special trains have been made.

ALSAGER CHAPEL (MARRIAGES) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to legalize certain Marriages celebrated in the Chapel at Alsager, in the parish of Barthomley—Was presented by The Lord Archbishop of York; read 1st. (No. 153.)

House adjourned at half past Six o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL COMMISSION.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he can state to the House whether the labours of the Transvaal Commission are drawing to a close; and, if no information has been received upon the point, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made of the Royal Commissioners as to the progress they are making, and the probable termination of their inquiry?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, a telegram has been received from Sir Hercules Robinson, from which it appears that if good progress continues to be made, the Commissioners hope to complete the principle portions of their work in about three weeks from the present time.

SOUTH AFRICA — ZULULAND — ALLEGED REMOVAL OF THE REMAINS OF THE LATE KING, PANDA.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the alleged digging up and removal of Panda's remains in Zululand have made their Report; and, if so, will he lay it upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Commissioners were not appointed; but the Secretary of State for War desired Sir George Colley to report upon this matter, and a despatch was received from him, from which it appeared that no trustworthy information could be procured. A telegram has been sent to Sir Evelyn Wood asking whether any further steps were taken by Sir George Colley. There will be no objection to produce the Papers when they are complete.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT, 1880—THE STANDARD OF EXEMPTION—BYE-LAWS FOR SCHOOL ATTENDANCE.

MR. SUMMERS asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether one of the results of the passing of "The Elementary Education Act, 1880," has been that some School Boards and School Attendance Committees have lowered the standard of education fixed by their bye-laws for the total or partial exemption of children from the obligation to attend school; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the extent to which the Act has operated in this direction?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the Elementary Education Act of 1880 required that on or before the 1st of January of the present year every district in England and Wales should pass bye-laws regulating school attendance. The result has been that about 1,200 sets of bye-laws, embracing a population of 6,500,000, have been passed. In settling bye-laws for a Union, composed of a number of parishes, we have endeavoured as far as possible to secure uniform standards for partial and total exemption for the whole Union. To effect this we have, in some instances, had to lower, and in others to raise, the standards in certain parishes. The general effect, however, has been to raise the standards, and in thousands of parishes to supply standards where none were previously in force. In the factory towns and districts the half-time standard has, in some instances, been reduced. This is owing to the fact that before the passing of the Act of last year it was contended that no standard was requisite in the case of factory children. These and all other children are now required to pass a standard before going to work, so that, although the nominal standard has in a few instances been lowered, the effect of the Act has been to raise the standard and increase the efficiency of educational work throughout the country. I have already laid on the Table a Return showing the standards in force in every parish and borough in England and Wales, and this, I hope, will meet the requirements of the hon. Member.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES)—THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WINDSOR.

THE O'DONOGHUE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it be true that the request of Sir Frederick Roberts and Sir James Hill to attend on the staff, on the occasion of the Volunteer Review at Windsor, previous to returning to India, has been refused; and, if so, on what grounds?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, before I answer this Question, I think I ought to gather whether it is the wish of the House to make the selection of officers for the Staff at Reviews the subject of Parliamentary criticism. I cannot find that in either House of Parliament such interference with the discretion of the military authorities has ever taken place, and I must appeal to the House to support me if I decline to answer a Question.

Sir Henry Holland

tion which would form a precedent for inquiries, in my opinion, quite beyond the province of Parliament.

THE O'DONOGHUE gave Notice that, in consequence of the answer of the right hon. Gentleman, he would renew the Question on going into Committee of Supply.

MR. SCHREIBER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will apply to His Royal Highness the Ranger of Windsor Park to admit Members of both Houses of Parliament wishing to attend the Volunteer Review on Saturday to the reserved spaces in Windsor Park on either hand of the position to be occupied by Her Majesty, and so grant them the same privileges as have already been conceded to others of Her Majesty's subjects? The hon. Member said he heard yesterday, for the first time, that Windsor Park was under the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and that, consequently, no Member of the Government had communicated with the Ranger on the subject of his (Mr. Schreiber's) Questions relating to the Volunteer Review. Therefore, the animated conversation in the House yesterday would be the first intimation received by the Ranger of the wishes of the House, with which he felt sure His Royal Highness would be anxious to comply. He hoped now to hear from the Prime Minister that they would be able to-morrow, as Members of the Legislature, whether enclosed between hurdles or not, to testify their admiration of the fine spirit which would bring 50,000 men to Windsor.

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has asked me to state what has been done in this matter. After the conversation in the House last night, I saw Mr. Gore, one of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and we telegraphed to the Ranger of Windsor Park our opinion that, under the circumstances, provision should be made for reserving places at the Review for Members of the Houses of Parliament. Space for 500 is roped off, accordingly, in front of the Royal carriages and to the left of the saluting point, and 300 tickets will be sent to Mr. Speaker for Members of this House by 5 o'clock this afternoon. As to Members' carriages, the Ranger will make the best arrangements he can behind the Royal carriages.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND—THE NEW COMMERCIAL TREATY—NEGOTIATIONS.

MR. BIRLEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the magnitude and variety of the interests involved in the negotiations with France for a renewed and modified Commercial Treaty, he will take measures to afford the utmost publicity to the inquiry now being conducted by the Foreign Office.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I hope the hon. Member will be content with my giving him a general answer, for a general answer is the only answer that can be given. A more particular and pointed Question is going to be put to me next week by the noble Viscount the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon). Before that Question is put, we shall observe the state of things before the Commission, and perhaps I shall be able to say something more. All I can say at present is that the hon. Member himself cannot be more desirous than we are to have the support and advantage of public opinion, and of information from every source. Consequently, to the utmost extent of our liberty we shall desire to associate Parliament and public opinion with us in all the steps we may have to take.

TELEGRAPH ACTS, 1863 AND 1868 — TELEGRAPH WIRES OVER PUBLIC THOROUGHFARES.

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the responsibility of local authorities for the safety of the public as regards casualties from the fracture of the wires stretched over the public thoroughfares, Whether he will be so good as to state under what Act of Parliament this responsibility is thrown upon the local authorities, and what power the local authorities have to control the General Post Office or other authorities in fixing the wires; and, whether he is prepared to recommend a departmental inquiry, with a view to the avoidance of the serious risk now incurred to all persons using the thoroughfares under those wires?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that as this was a legal Question he would answer it. By the Act of 1863, Sections 9, 10, and 12, Telegraph Companies were restrained from placing posts and wires along thoroughfares without the consent of the body having control of such thoroughfares. By the Act of 1868 the Act of 1863 was made to apply to the Postmaster General. Therefore, that Act only restrained Telegraph Companies and the Postmaster General; but, in relation to other public bodies and to private individuals placing posts and wires along the public thoroughfares, the responsibility of seeing that they were properly placed so as not to cause danger to the public rested with the body having control of the streets and highways. In the opinion of the Government, nothing had arisen to render necessary a Departmental Inquiry with a view to avoid the risk to persons using the thoroughfares under the telegraph wires. If any wire were erected to which the local authorities took exception on the score of danger to the public, they could restrain the Postmaster General in the matter.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—
CLAUSE 34—THE COMMISSION.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which he had given him private Notice. As it was probable that Clause 34 of the Land Bill would be reached on Monday, Will the right hon. Gentleman direct that the names of the persons who are to compose the Land Commission shall be placed on the Notice Paper this evening, both on account of the very great importance of the question, and the great convenience which will result if the names are submitted to the Committee without delay?

MR. GLADSTONE: I can promise two things, Sir. In the first place, we will not propose Clause 34 till we are ready to put in the names; and, in the second place, we will not propose Clause 34 without giving Notice of the names we intend to ask the House to put in. I think, however, the most convenient course would be to postpone Clause 34. We have proceeded on the principle we adopted at the time of the passing of the Irish Church Act, on a principle approved by the House then, and a reasonable principle too—namely, that it would be well to determine all the important and material duties of the Commission before we proceeded to name them. In point of fact, it is obvious, when we come to consider it, that the selection of the Commissioners implies the acceptance of responsible offices by Gentlemen to whom any offer or proposal could be made, and that they would naturally desire for to know what are the duties to be placed on them before they make up their minds on the matter. It so happens that in this particular instance we have two or three questions that must necessarily stand over, as matters now stand, until we have got through the clauses of the Bill. Whatever may be proposed with respect to labourers, and as to what has been proposed, at least with respect to arrears and other things, these are matters which the Committee have not had an opportunity of determining; and, therefore, probably the best way will be to postpone the matter.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the right hon. Gentleman also intended to postpone the clause relating to the salaries and powers of the Commissioners?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he thought not. In accordance with the promise he made some time since, he would place an Amendment on the Paper, or describe generally various changes and, he hoped, improvements which they intended to make with regard to the arrangements relating to the Commission. He thought those might be very well considered before naming the Commission.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 135.]
(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [TWENTY-THIRD NIGHT.]

[Progress 7th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART V.

ACQUISITION OF LAND BY TENANTS, RECLAMATION OF LAND, AND EMIGRATION.

Acquisition of Land by Tenants.

Clause 19 (Advances to tenants by Commission for purchase of holdings).

The Attorney General

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Amendment made in page 13, lines 4 and 5, by striking out the words "a solvent tenant would pay," and inserting "would be a fair rent."

MR. LITTON moved as an Amendment, in page 13, the omission of the word "may" in line 13, in order to insert the word "shall." That, he said, was a very short Amendment, but it was one of some importance. The provision of the clause was to indemnify the tenant who purchased from the Land Commission against circumstances adverse to the title of the landlord. He thought the Committee would agree with him that it should be the duty, and not the option, of the Commission to indemnify the purchasing tenant under those circumstances.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 13, to leave out "may," and insert "shall."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope my hon. and learned Friend will be content with the word "may." It is a very strong provision, indeed, in favour of the tenant, to authorize the Commission to take upon themselves the risk of doubts and ambiguities appertaining to the title. I am not aware that any such enactment has ever before been authorized as that of allowing any body of persons to take upon the State in the way now proposed the discharge of doubts or ambiguities in future contingencies. I think it necessary that we should preserve the ultimate discretion of the Court.

MR. HEALY thought the sub-section would only give the tenant a right of action against the Commission in case he was subsequently evicted, and he would ask the Government to give the Land Commission the same power that was possessed by the Landed Estates Court. He would ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether this interpretation was not correct?

MR. LITTON said, he was not so unreasonable as to ask that the Land Commission should make such an inquiry into the title of the landlord as would be sufficient to secure a statutory title. But it seemed to him that where the onus and duty was cast upon the Commission of selling to the tenant and taking his money for the purchase, they should be bound to give a covenant against encumbrances. If it were left optional with the Commissioners, it would be competent for them to say, "We will give no indemnity," and the purchaser might be exposed to eviction. He was surprised that the Prime Minister did not see his way to accept this Amendment. He did not like, however, to press it against the right hon. Gentleman's opinion, because he deferred to the right hon. Gentleman's opinion very much. Probably the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland could give some explanation as to why the Amendment should not be regarded as a reasonable one. If the purchaser was to be made safe, it could only be done except through the intervention of the Commission, and he ought to get an indemnity from the Commission against any claim that might afterwards be made. It would be very unreasonable for the purchaser to have to defend a law suit with heavy costs by reason of some oversight on the part of the Commission, or of their refusal to give the indemnity which they ought to give. He was very unwilling to set his opinion against that of the Prime Minister, but he entertained a strong opinion upon the subject.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW) did not see how the Commissioners were to investigate the title of the vendor unless they had the means of investigation. The Commissioners were merely to act as intermediaries in this matter between the original owner and the purchasing tenant. They should not be bound in every case to make good the title. They would, no doubt, do it in all reasonable cases, and that was really the meaning of the word "may;" but the word "shall" gave no alternative such as ought to be retained. The Court might be trusted to do what was right, and they would give the indemnity where it was reasonable to do it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA thought the case might be met according to the view suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), by inserting the words "shall, unless released from that obligation by the grantee." That would provide that the Court should indemnify the purchaser of the fee-farm interest, unless the purchaser should release them from that obligation. That would work very well, because in cases where there was a general consensus—where the title was known to be good and sufficient—there would be no costs incurred; but it would be very fair that the Court should put the tenant on his guard in certain cases—the strong inducement for doing which they would have from the fact that they would be liable unless they got an indemnity from him.

MR. GLADSTONE: The Landed Estates Court are armed with the necessary machinery for strictly investigating title; but we could not provide that machinery in the case of the Land Court, and therefore we cannot place upon them the function of the Landed Estates Court to give a Parliamentary title. We have already gone a long way from what was proposed, and we cannot go further. By assenting to a number of these provisions, we have already somewhat strained our original purpose.

MR. GORST said, he entirely agreed with the Prime Minister and the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland as to their intention; but he confessed he had some little doubt as to whether the words at present in the clause would quite carry out that intention. He was not sure whether, as the words now stood, the Court would be able to refuse to give an indemnity, because, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman was aware, the word "may" in Acts of Parliament was generally construed "shall." He thought that words should be inserted such as "may in their discretion," or "if they think fit;" or, otherwise, the "may" might be held equivalent to "shall" when the Bill came to be put into operation.

MR. LEAMY thought that even if the word "shall" were substituted for "may," it might not have an obligatory effect, unless the Commission had some means of satisfying themselves as to the title; for it might be held that an indemnity was not due to the tenant, and that unfortunate tenant might have to pay a very large sum. If the Court was to transact the business at all, they ought to be able to investigate title; and it would certainly be much cheaper for them to investigate than for anybody else to do so.

MR. DAWSON said, the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had suggested that the words should be "may, if they think fit." But what the words of the clause meant as they stood at present was—"if satisfied with the indemnity given by the landlord." In many cases the Court would make inquiry into title, and they would not put the provision in force unless the necessary conditions were complied with.

MR. LITTON said, that, after the discussion that had taken place, he would not trouble the Committee to divide upon the Amendment.

MR. WARTON wished to suggest to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland, before the Amendment was withdrawn, that there was great force in what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he had not uttered a single word before during the discussions upon the Bill, and he should not have ventured to intrude upon the attention of the Committee now unless he thought he had good reason, for he knew he might be supposed by hon. Members sitting on both sides of the House to be rushing in where angels and Irish landlords feared to tread. He intended, however, to move the rejection of this clause, as he thoroughly disapproved of it. The grounds upon which the clause was founded seemed to him to be utterly barren, and to have been completely undermined by the experience of the last 10 years, as was shown by the Report of the Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners which he held in his hand. He had listened to the discussion with the greatest possible interest, and had heard the most convincing arguments used against the clause. On the question as to whether four-fifths or only three-fourths of the advances should be provided by the State, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) had said that there was one mode of purchasing unanimity all round—by sacrificing the public interest; but the only difference between the right hon. Gentleman, who stood out for three-fourths, and those who supported the proposal of four-fifths, was the small difference of £5 in each £100 — the amount of the advance proposed to be made by the nation being in the one case £80, while in the other it was £75. He (Sir Herbert Maxwell) could not, for his life, see why, if an £80 advance was profligate, a £75 advance should be advisable. And, though that was not the question now before the Committee, he thought the arguments which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) urged against a four-fifths' advance told strongly against the whole clause, because it seemed to him that the clause sacrificed the public interest of the taxpayer upon inadequate security. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) had taunted the landlords with having been ignorant in the past, and suggested that probably they might be so in the future. It would be, perhaps, unbecoming in him (Sir Herbert Maxwell) to retort that, in some respects, the right hon. Gentleman himself was possibly not so well-informed as he might be; but he would, at all events, ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he had seen the Report of Messrs. Baldwin and Robertson, dated the 1st of January, 1880, and only circulated three or four days ago? He did not think that many hon. Members had yet seen that Report, and he did not know why its publication had been delayed so long. They were asked, in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, to pass the clause because of the success of the establishment of peasant proprietors during the last 10 years. The right hon. Gentleman told the Irish Members last night to comfort themselves with the knowledge derived from the experience of the past—that in no case had an advance of three-fourths failed. But what was found in the 4th page of the Report of the Assistant Commissioners? Why, that in 18 holdings in the county of Armagh—that county being regarded as one of the most promising grounds on which to establish peasant proprietors—the Commissioners gave evidence of having visited every one, and undertook to state the naked facts about them, and, with the exception of one single holding—No. 13 in the Report—the description of each holding was given in the most gloomy colouring. In no instance could they report improved cultivation, even though the tenants could have no fear hanging over the investment of capital in the soil, and would not be deterred from making improvements by the anticipation that the rent would be increased as soon as the improvements began to tell. The first holding reached was No. 1, five acres, rent £6. The tenant had had to exhaust his live stock to pay the instalments, and not a beast of any kind was to be found on the land except two pigs. Before the purchase the tenant had had four cows, and had built a good house; the windows and general appearance of the house now told their own tale of pecuniary embarrassment and distress. In case No. 3, the soil was kept in the most beggarly condition, and the tenant gave as a reason for the purchase that he was afraid the land would be bought up by a bad landlord. But that was no argument in favour of this clause, since they were told that after the passing of this Bill there were to be no bad landlords. There was not the least sign of improved cultivation. The tenant in case No. 18 owned three acres, value £3. He used to pay £2 5s., and the purchase money was £47, the whole of which was left at 10 per cent. The owner now paid the rates—he paid none before—and he said that none of the purchase money had been repaid. He had a cow, which the poor man described as “a sort of a cow,” but it was a very bad sort. The cow had a calf, but there was no grass or meadow of any kind; there were no roots for winter keep. There was no evidence whatever of any attempt to improve the cultivation of the land or the general management of the holding; and these observations applied to all the holdings described except No. 13, which was bought up by an affluent shopkeeper in Newry. This was not a very encouraging picture of the result of the action of the Irish Church Commissioners in establishing peasant proprietors. He knew there was an idea cherished by some people that there could be no more attractive or desirable state of things than the division of the land among small proprietors. It was a charming idea that every man should rest under his own vine and fig tree; but it should be remembered that they were now dealing with a land where the fig tree did not grow, and that people with families could not live upon farms or holdings of five or ten acres. He did not wish to detain the Committee any more; but he could not reconcile it with his conscience to allow the clause to be added to the Bill without saying one or two words.

Amendment proposed, "To leave out Clause 19."—(Sir Herbert Maxwell.)

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) is mistaken in the reference he has made to my few observations of last night. I did not say that in no single case had there been failure, or that in no single case had the tenant fallen into unfortunate circumstances, so that he could not get more than three-fourths of the sum advanced under the Land Act or by the Church Commission. What I said was, that neither under the Land Commission nor the Church Commission had it been found that the sum advanced had been insufficient to allow and to encourage a fair acceptance of purchase on the part of a tenant anxious to become proprietor. If the hon. Baronet bases his reference to what I said upon having himself heard me speak, he will recollect that that was the argument which I used. If, however, he refers to the reports which have appeared in the newspapers, I would only say that they are not very accurate, and are not to be trusted. In regard to particular cases, this much may be said, that some seasons have been so disastrous that not only small holders, but large ones as well, in many cases, have been brought down. The hon. Baronet quoted one case where the holding consisted of three acres. But nobody supposes that, in a bad season, a man can comfortably maintain his family upon three acres; and, even in a good, he would probably be able to live only on the lowest kind of food—on which, to a large extent, the people of Ireland have been accustomed to live. Even in England we know of many large farmers who were men of capital four or five years ago, and who held large farms, but who have now been pulled down by disaster. It is quite outside the case to argue of the future solely in reference to what has happened to very small holders during the last two or three years. The general result, at any rate, is satisfactory, because we have been told that the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell) was not correct in the statement he made the other day; and it is stated that while the whole sum payable annually to the Church Commission is £119,000, the deficiency is only about £4,000. And of that £4,000, a large proportion of it—I rather think more than half—is owing to one individual having made large purchases from the Commission. If that be so during these bad years, surely the whole case of the Government is supported, and we cannot argue this experience against the proposition of the Bill. When we know, as we do now know, that there is, even under these circumstances, great anxiety to pay, we may be quite sure that the proposition made in this Bill, and which seems to be advanced under this clause, will be such as will enable the tenants to gratify the most laudable ambition of becoming proprietors of their own farms, freeholders in their own country; and, though what the hon. Baronet has said of the vine and the fig tree may be too true in Ireland, I am sure he might have continued the quotation, and said of such peasant proprietors that in the future "no man can make them afraid."

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, that, as the hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had mentioned Armagh, the Committee would, perhaps, allow him to say a few words with regard to that county. He (Mr. J. N. Richardson) had not seen, as yet, the Papers to which allusion had been made, but he hoped to read them shortly; but, if he did not mistake, the hon. Baronet was to have credit for having selected just the 18 cases in all Ireland that would best support the view he wished to put before the Committee. No doubt, it must be admitted that many of these 18 cases were in the condition stated in the Paper; but there was no difficulty in accounting for that, because the district was an extremely poor, rocky, and miserable one. The tenants on that land purchased at a very high price in 1874 and 1875—which were very good years—and a great many of them borrowed at a very high rate of interest. He was acquainted with one case of a widow, he believed residing in a place called Ballytemple. The holding was purchased for £96, and the whole of that money might have been borrowed from the Commissioners; but she only borrowed from them £56, and the other

Sir Herbert Maxwell

£40 she procured from a local attorney, who was good enough to charge her 20 per cent interest, and to make her out a title for £10. Now, would anyone expect that a woman like that, cultivating a farm in a rocky, barren district, would succeed; and yet that individual, simply through her thrift, was succeeding, and was one of the exceptions in the townland with which she was connected. Another thing he might mention was—he was not sure whether it was in that district or not—that when the Church Commissioners sold a certain estate to tenants living on the lower land, which was more cultivated, the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) introduced a Bill in 1878, or 1879, to enable them to get perpetuity of leases—to those who did not feel desirous of purchasing their own holdings. If he recollected rightly, that Bill was thrown out. [An hon. Member here made a communication to Mr. RICHARDSON.] He must retract entirely what he had said with regard to the right hon. Gentleman's Bill. He was quite wrong, because he was informed those farms were purchased in 1875; but the argument he should adduce from the Report the hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had laid before the Committee was this—not that these 18 cases proved, by any means, that peasant proprietorship would be a failure in Ireland; but that, on the contrary, it was the exceptional circumstances under which the tenants had bought—the high price which they had to give at that time, and the high rate of interest which they had to pay—which had put them in that position. He would argue from that that which was rather inconsistent with the votes he had given last night; but he need not give any explanation on that head, because he had his private and public reasons for not doing so. The argument he would adduce would be this—if the Government had given five-sixths, instead of the amount they did, they would very materially have altered the aspect of affairs.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: If, instead of receiving five-sixths, they had seven or eight-sixths, there would still be great difficulty in the way of these small holdings, because they would require money, not only to purchase, but to stock their farms. The real difficulty in which the small holders appear to be placed is this. They are carrying on their business with such indifferent means of their own that they are obliged to borrow at very high rates of interest from the local usurer. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. John Bright) said just now that no man could make them afraid. I am afraid that is rather too sanguine an expectation in cases such as these, where money has had to be borrowed from the local usurer at 10 per cent. I expect the local usurer will be the person who can make them afraid. They will not be made afraid by the landlord, but by the creditor. The matter seems to me always to resolve itself into this—that these small ownerships will answer very well if they are in the hands of persons who know what they are about, and are able to conduct their business properly. You would have a good security for that in cases where the small proprietors have been able either to accumulate money of their own by their own industry or where they are able to obtain credit from, perhaps, members of their own family or from the landlord, or, in a reasonable degree, from a public fund such as that it is proposed they shall borrow from. But if you want to nurse or coddle them too much by artificial advances, and tempt people to believe that if they can only get possession of the land they are going to put themselves into a position of comfort and security, you will be tempting them very often to their own destruction. If they get three or four acres, which, as the right hon. Gentleman very truly said, are not sufficient to maintain a family in bad years, the consequence of what you are doing, no doubt with excellent motives, will frequently be to the disadvantage of these persons. The lesson we ought to learn from the facts is this—not to apply too great a stimulus to these proceedings. I think that we give reasonable facilities, nay, that we give liberal facilities, in the advances we offer; but I do not think we should go beyond what is proposed. I should be sorry to see this clause thrown out. The experiment has answered very well in some cases, and I have no doubt it will answer in others under fair conditions. As to the object of the clause, I approve of it; but it should be taken up with caution. I would say, do not stimulate this matter of the purchase of small holdings artificially or excessively.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was very much indebted to the hon. Baronet (Sir Herbert Maxwell) who had brought this Report prominently before the attention of the House. It might be quite true that there were circumstances which rendered the tenants of these 18 holdings exceptions to the general rule; but, at the same time, giving the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright) full credit for benevolent intentions in promoting this scheme, he (Mr. Newdegate) must call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the fact that there were circumstances connected with the future of such tenures that could not be overlooked. There were circumstances that should impress themselves very forcibly upon the attention of every landowner—which individuals were now upon their trial, and in which category he (Mr. Newdegate) himself was to be included. There was before the House the Report of Messrs. Clare Read and Pell concerning their journey to America, and that Report showed that Ireland would have to look forward to competing in agriculture with the United States. The Report said that the virgin soil of the United States would remain unexhausted for the next 25 years, and that the produce of that virgin soil would be able to compete with the agricultural productions of Ireland. They had to remember that the agriculture of Ireland had receded very largely during the last 30 years, in consequence of the competition from America, and they had complete evidence of the fact that that competition was likely to come with increased severity during the next 25 years. As a matter of business, he thought it a very doubtful speculation upon which Parliament was entering when it engaged to provide funds to start these small farmers in Ireland. He wished to state that he did not intend to press the Amendment to a division; but he thought there were circumstances in addition to those which had been adduced by the hon. Baronet below him (Sir Herbert Maxwell) which the House was bound to take into account, as a House of Business, in making these advances. He was disinclined to do anything or to say anything which would have in the smallest degree the effect of preventing the extension of the agriculture of Ireland. He considered the extension of Irish agriculture a great national object, and, therefore, so far from participating in the intention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster—although he was, no doubt, aiming at remedying a great national evil—he could not overlook the adverse circumstances to which the experiment was exposed. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman opposite would excuse his having uttered these few words of caution in connection with the undertaking on which they were engaged.

MR. ECROYD hoped the Committee would allow him its indulgence for a few minutes, as he had not hitherto spoken upon this great question. He was one of those who could not with a good conscience vote against the clause which they were discussing and were probably about to pass; but, at the same time, he should feel that he had not discharged his duty if he did not record his great anxiety as to the actual results which might follow from this legislation. His own observation had taught him that the success of peasant proprietors was very much in proportion to their enjoyment of a southern climate, which produced those agricultural commodities which required a large amount of hand labour, and the production of which was aided by the genial force of a southern sun. Where a northern climate prevailed, peasant proprietors were by no means so successful. Those who had travelled through the Rhine country and parts of Bavaria must be familiar with the fact that the condition of the peasant proprietor there was one of great misery, and that he usually came under the power of the usurers and money-lenders. He had to borrow money at a very high rate at the outset of his career, and so came under a burden which few indeed ever succeeded in escaping from; indeed, from which it was almost impossible to escape. Now, in this measure the Government had been proceeding upon principles which were, to some extent, opposed to the ordinary rules of political economy; and he felt that the success of the clause they were about to pass would depend upon the adoption of some strict regulation which should prevent the usurer doing 10 times more damage than the very worst landlords were to be prevented doing by this Bill.

He thought the small purchasers would generally find themselves not in possession of the capital required to work their holdings. They would generally borrow money from local money-lenders at a high rate; and he confessed he had great fear that that proceeding would baffle the exceedingly benevolent intentions of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. He could not take his seat without bearing his testimony to the great value of the right hon. Gentleman's efforts in that direction during past years; and he most cordially hoped that the effect of this clause might be to produce better results than those which he (Mr. Ecroyd) and those who differed from the right hon. Gentleman dared to anticipate.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he felt it only right to those he represented in Parliament to offer his protest against the principle involved in this clause, and, as that was the first time that he had addressed the Committee upon the great subject that was now before it, perhaps it would allow him its indulgence for a few minutes while he stated the grounds of his objection. He could not disguise from himself that at the bottom of this proposal there lay the fixed idea of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that there should be a general system of peasant proprietors established throughout the Kingdom at the cost of the State. He would not detain the Committee by discussing the arguments which had been advanced by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, because they had already been answered a great deal more effectually than he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) could answer them. After the great mistakes they had seen the right hon. Gentleman commit in this matter, they might dismiss his arguments without any further observation; but, with regard to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, he was good enough to say last night that as the landlords of Ireland had been ignorant in the past, so they would be ignorant in the future. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) was not one of those who would care to poach on the choice vocabulary in the use of which the right hon. Gentleman was so proficient; but he would venture to say that his repose in what they might call the "Lethe Wharf" had made him rather forgetful of his own antecedents in this matter, and of all those principles of Free Trade which were involved in this proposal. It seemed to him (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) that the great Free Trade Party had abandoned the principles which they had so long held; and he was told the other day by one of the surviving veterans of the Cobden grand army that the Cobden Club were not going to have their annual dinner this year, but that the shutters were to be put up.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he is going beyond the clause in his observations.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he was ready to bow to the Chairman's decision; but he was pointing out in illustration of his argument that the Cobden Club, which represented Free Trade principles, was not going to hold its annual dinner this year. The Chairman would agree with him that Free Trade principles were involved in this question, and that it was evident that, as far as Irish Land Law was concerned, those principles were not to apply to it, and hence it was not surprising that the shutters of the Free Trade Club were to be put up by the right hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter), and the hon. Member for Rochdale (Mr. T. B. Potter), who were the chief priests of that exploded superstition. What was the principle upon which the Government had gone? They had never heard a word about it yet. He had heard the right hon. Gentleman opposite say that the principle upon which advances of public money could be granted depended on this—that when they came and asked for money for the relief of a particular class they were bound to show that the advance was for the general public benefit, such as a larger production of food, or for some other very necessary purpose. He was not in the House when his hon. Friend (Sir Herbert Maxwell) read passages from Professor Baldwin's Report; but it seemed to him to be thoroughly established in that Report that the classes who were referred to, and who were intended to be benefited by this clause, would not, in point of fact, realize the benefits it was now proposed to confer upon them. If they considered that question from a serious point of view, let them take instances for the guidance of the Committee from the county with which he happened to be particularly connected—namely, the county of Cumberland. He supposed in that county there had been more peasant proprietors than in any other part of the Kingdom; but latterly they had completely vanished. ["Oh, oh!"] Well, if they had not completely vanished, the greater part of them had vanished, and that was entirely owing to the action of the very Free Trade principles of which he had been speaking. Why were they not entitled to ask for the peasant proprietors of Cumberland that they should have a similar benefit extended to them to that proposed to be conferred upon the Irish tenant proprietors? Why were those advantages to be only for Irishmen? Then, again, in addition to the Report of Professor Baldwin, he had had the advantage, a few days ago, of reading a letter written by the junior Member for Newcastle (Mr. Ashton Dilke) in The Weekly Dispatch, descriptive of a tour he had made in the county of Cork. Well, he would ask hon. Gentlemen to rise from the perusal of that letter and say, having seen the condition in which those tenants were, whether they would ever be able to find, out of their own resources, the balance which this clause rendered it imperative on them to contribute; or whether, in the future, they would be able to pay the necessary instalments? All these matters, seriously considered, gave him great reason to doubt whether there would be any success in the present policy of the Government. What hope was there for hereafter? The State was put in possession of the land. Would the State ever be able to enforce payment by these tenants? Would they not have in the future, as they had had in times past, measures of relief brought forward by the Government—measures relieving the tenants from payment of their liabilities in the same manner, and on the same principle, as last year they had a Bill brought forward and made a Cabinet measure to give compensation for disturbance? There was no guarantee that the money would be applied for the public good, and that the State would not be, in the future, obliged to stop the enforcement of the payments. It seemed to him that, at the bottom of this, there was no principle whatever which could be intelligible either to Members of the Committee or to the country. He was afraid it was a case, not of principle, but of popularity, and popularity the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) always had at the bottom of his policy. When they had taken off what he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) might, perhaps, without offence, term the "Brummagem lacquer" on this proposal, they would find under it the true metal, which meant more than helping a few insolvent tenants in Ireland. This was a measure and a proposal that was intended hereafter to attack landed proprietors on this side the Channel, and it was for that reason that he put forward these few words. There were some hon. Members from Ireland, whose cry was—"We want neither rents nor landlords." [Hear! Hear! Rule cheers.] Those cheers only justified him in saying what he had said; and it was for that reason and on those principles that he should give the strongest opposition of which he was capable to the proposal of the Government, which, he considered, should be contested from every point of view.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that if he had misquoted the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the morning papers were responsible; but, at the same time, the report in the papers had agreed with his apprehension of what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman last night. As to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. J. N. Richardson), the hon. Member seemed to suppose that he (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had selected these 18 cases; but that was not the fact. They were the only cases in the Report of the Assistant Commissioners, and they were the only cases to which hon. Members had access. In all these cases, except one, which was the case of a wealthy shopkeeper, there was nothing but failure to report. What he had now stated he should have been sorry not to have said, liberair animen meam; and if it was the intention of the Committee to add this clause to the Bill, then it should be done with as little delay as possible. But he had very little doubt that, before many years had passed, a Bill would have to be introduced to create a Deus ex machina, to release the new peasant proprietors from their insupportable burthen of debt. He would withdraw his Amendment. ["No!"]

Amendment negatived.

MR. BIGGAR said, the right hon. Member (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had said that some of the Irish Members would like to get rid of Irish rents and Irish landlords altogether. So they would; but they would like to see the Irish tenants buying up the holdings from the landlords; and they thought that one of the faults of this clause was that it did not go far enough, and that it did not make it compulsory on the landlord to sell when the tenant was prepared to buy at a fair and reasonable price. That was what they considered one of the weaknesses of this particular clause; for they believed that the Government were too stingy in their proposals as to the amount of money they would lend. As had already been pointed out, the tenant would have the money which the landlord would give as compensation for disturbance, and that, in the majority of cases, would allow quite sufficient margin of security for the money which he would borrow. He must say that the practical result of the narrowness of the Government proposal must, in the nature of things, be to deprive this clause of its value if the tenants were bound to borrow the £5 which the Government would not advance. The tenants would begin farming with less stock and less capital than they should have, and the result would be very injurious to them. Tenants would be less likely to purchase holdings, or they would receive less benefit from the purchase than it was intended they should by the framers of the clause. He would again appeal to the Prime Minister to re-consider the matter before the Report, and to come to a different conclusion with regard to the amount of money which should be lent on the security of the holding. As to another part of the clause—namely, that which dealt with the fining down of rents, he did not think there was so strong a case as to ask the Government to re-consider the matter; but, where the tenant seemed entitled to purchase entirely the landlord's interest in the holding, he did think the Government would be justified in authorizing the Court, if it thought fit, to lend a larger portion of the purchase money. In dealing with this subject, it was a very common practice to talk of "peasant proprietors;" but that was an expression that was very seldom used in Ireland, and they much preferred the expression "cultivating" or "occupying proprietors." The people who would buy, in the majority of cases, would not be peasants at all, but considerable farmers. In the great majority of cases they would be men who had property of their own, and who were in a position to pay back the money advanced. He certainly thought, where the holding was of a good description, and the price paid was held to be moderate, the Court was justified in lending the full amount.

MR. STORER said, this most extraordinary clause was based entirely on a delusion, which was this—that the moment these persons were converted from tenants into peasant proprietors, they would exchange the state of misery and poverty in which they lived to one of prosperity. It was well known throughout a great part of England that the small proprietor could have no worse landlord than himself, because, although he might for a short time flourish, particularly when times and seasons were good—which, unfortunately, they were not at present, and were not likely to be in the future—ultimately, when times grew worse, and when, perhaps, he was old and his family had left him, he would become a prey to the mortgagee and the usurer. That would be the case in the present instance; and it was ridiculous to suppose that the Utopian idea of right hon. Gentlemen opposite—that of universal prosperity—would be realized. Even should it be realized, the English taxpayer would ask why, at a time when he was overburdened with every kind of difficulty, should he be called upon to pay the money to carry out the benevolent intentions of the Government in Ireland? The English taxpayer could hardly be aware of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman to advance, he (Mr. Storer) knew not how many millions—for no specific sum had been mentioned—for this object. When the English taxpayer became fully acquainted with the proposal, there could be no doubt but that he would object in the strongest degree to the whole scheme; but there was another matter to be considered. If this Utopian idea were to succeed, what claim had the Irish tenant more than the English tenant to be assisted in this way? It was an assumption and a delusion throughout the measure that the Irish tenant was in a worse position than the English tenant. From his knowledge of the facts, he could state, without fear of contradiction, that exactly the converse was the case. The English tenants, in a great part of the country, were in a far worse position than the Irish tenants. Last year they had a season infinitely worse than that which was experienced in Ireland; and, if the bankers could be consulted, it would be found that the Irish had a great deal more money saved than the English tenant. But he did not find the Government coming forward with any proposal to assist the English tenants in any way. Why was there no proposal of this kind? Was it because the English tenants were law-abiding, and did not rise in rebellion, and did not conspire against the law of their country, as the Irish people had done? Were they, if they wished for an amelioration of their condition, to follow the example set them in Ireland? It was a strange thing to say that because they were so quiet and so tame, and because they did not rebel and listen to agitators, that their condition was not to be taken into consideration at all. On these grounds he objected to the measure; and he thought that when it became well known to the taxpayers of the country what was demanded of them, the measure would not be half so popular as Her Majesty's Government seemed to think.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 20 (Purchase of estates by Commission, and resale in parcels to tenants).

MR. ERRINGTON said, the first Amendment stood in his name, and raised a very important question with regard to purchases. It consisted of two portions, the first of which he was now moving. He did not agree with what had fallen from the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition (Sir Stafford Northcote) as to the danger of stimulating the growth of peasant proprietorship in Ireland; on the contrary, he thought that to a peasant proprietorship they had to look for relief from the distress from which that unhappy country was suffering. No doubt, that peasant proprietorship should be carefully guarded; but there was no chance of having it at all, unless a certain stimulus was given. He agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) last night, when he had warned the Committee that they must not suppose that after passing this Bill the Irish tenants would be very keen about making repayments. Well, the clause laid down provisions under which the sum advanced by Parliament was to be spent by the Commissioners in purchasing estates for re-sale to the tenants; and, in the first place, he found there was no limitation in the price which the Commissioners might give for these estates. In the second place, there was a very striking, strong, and clear restriction imposed on them, that they should not purchase any estate, unless they were satisfied that a competent number of tenants were willing to combine to purchase their holdings from the Land Commission. What was the effect of that? What class of estates would be dealt with in that way? It was obvious that none would be dealt with except those that were considered to be very well circumstanced; no other estate would fulfil those requirements, and when he said "well-circumstanced" he did not mean well-circumstanced in order to create peasant proprietors, but in a general sense. In this matter, he spoke with a knowledge of particular estates, and there were many of those which could never fulfil these conditions, although they would be eminently suited for the establishment of a peasant proprietary. Landlords would offer their estates, being able to fulfil the conditions, but not being very anxious to sell, and would ask for a high price from the Commission. The Commissioners would be anxious to carry out the objects for which they were appointed, and might, if they could, be prepared to give 20 times the fair rent of the estate. He therefore proposed, in page 13, line 18, after the word "Commission," to insert "for any sum not exceeding twenty times the fair rent of such estate." What would be the advantage derivable from the State purchasing at that sum? If the Commission were able, as he believed they would be, to purchase well-circumstanced estates at the fair rent of 20 years' purchase, the position they would be placed in would be this—the State would borrow money at 3 per cent, would invest it at 5 per cent, and would have a margin of 2 per cent left. He would take  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent of that to form a sinking fund for 37 years, and  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent to cover risks and management. They would be able to make any terms—the most liberal terms—without danger to the State, and to stimulate thereby the purchase by the tenants of their holdings. He hoped the matter would be favourably considered by the Government. He was not sure how far they would be willing to accept both these Amendments, because he saw there might probably be an objection to excluding from the present any estate that might not be saleable for 20 years' purchase; but, on examination, it would be found that the objection had not very much force. He believed there were many estates that would be purchased at 20 years, and he did not see why the Commissioners should give more when they could get estates at 20 years' purchase. However, he should not be inclined to press that part of the Amendment, although he was prepared to insist on the latter part—namely, in line 21, to leave out from the word "and" to the word "Commission," in line 23, both inclusive, in order to insert—

"In the case of estates so purchased, the Commissioners shall determine accordingly as it may appear just and expedient in each case, and from time to time the amount of the annual instalment of the purchase money of each farm to be repaid by the tenant in the form of rent, and the number of years over which such repayments are to be extended."

He would point out that they had left very large powers and very great discretion to the Commission; the clause, as it now stood, declared the Commission must be satisfied with the expediency of the purchase, and these words he thought should be left in. They were sufficient in themselves to guard the tenant and the undertaking generally; and he hoped the Committee, if they could not agree to the first portion of his proposal, would, at any rate, agree to the second.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 18, after "Commission," insert "for any sum not exceeding twenty times the fair rent of such estate." — (Mr. Errington.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

VOL. COLXIII. [THIRD SERIES.]

MR. GLADSTONE: I think I cannot too soon nor too clearly express the view Her Majesty's Government take of the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Errington). Its effect would be entirely to break up the scheme of the Government. From point to point, every imaginable plan that comes across the mind of a Member of Parliament is submitted to the Government and has to be considered. It will be impossible for us to go into all of them, to say nothing of accepting them. We are doing, on the whole, perhaps a dangerous act. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, I am aware of the force of the expression I am using; we are doing that which imposes a great responsibility upon Parliament, and a yet greater responsibility upon the Government. Nothing but the gravest motives could have led us up to this point. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), last night, said he had to strain his financial conscience in order to support a clause, and in that sentiment I entirely confess my sympathy. It is the strength of the necessity, social and political, that brings us to make this proposal; our scheme is a scheme for free sale with a view to re-sale. In order to re-sell, which is of itself a critical operation, and which we are going to perform in a manner most convenient and economical, we are compelled, according to our own proposal, to run the risk of placing the State in the most disadvantageous position which can be conceived—that is to say, of becoming the proprietor of land in Ireland. It is impossible to conceive a position less desirable. ["Hear, hear!"] The noble Lord cheers; but he knows that what I mean is a position less desirable for the State—I do not mean that the position is undesirable with reference to the security of landed property in Ireland, for the same thing might be said far more forcibly as to the proprietorship of land in England. It is a most undesirable and critical position; but we have fenced it, to a considerable degree, by reducing the proportions of the proposed transactions. But the plan of my hon. Friend (Mr. Errington) entirely breaks up that scheme, and leaves it to the discretion of an administrative Commission, that, after all, will only be indirectly responsible, to determine in its own view the general expediency—how much shall be re-sold, and how insigniscent a portion shall be given to the tenants, and to what extent the State shall assume that function of proprietors. That is a function which the Commission ought not to assume, not merely for the reason that it is critical and dangerous to the State, but for the reason that the State is utterly incapable of discharging the duties of a landlord. The proposal of my hon. Friend, when I look at it carefully, bristles with objections at every point. These purchases, for instance, are to be confined to cases where the sum does not exceed 20 times the fair rent of the estate. Well, the meaning of that is this—no estate can be purchased by the Commissioners until it has been driven through the Court, and until every holding on the estate has been valued by the Court. Why are we to compel these estates to go into the Courts for the purpose of becoming qualified? They may go, and qualify themselves, and then, after all, the Commission may say, "We do not wish to buy." I have heard the argument used many times in these discussions, that after this Bill passes there will be no purchasers of land in Ireland but the State. I do not believe that at all; but this I must say, that this proposition that the State is to buy nothing, except within a limit of 20 years' purchase, is, in my opinion, most unjust. The Government thought of introducing a limit of value; but I am bound to say that, adverting to the average sales that have taken place, we placed that limit at seven years higher than my hon. Friend proposes; but, finally, we came to the conclusion that it was not desirable to have any limit at all, thinking it wiser neither to stimulate prices nor to artificially reduce them. The first part of the Amendment would not be consistent with equity and justice towards the landlords in Ireland; and as to the second part, I do not know whether, if the first portion is not accepted, my hon. Friend will press it. I do not wish to enter into detail upon it now; but I must frankly state that I consider it would entirely break up the plan the Government propose, and it would not be reasonable.

LOD BURGHEY said, that it seemed to him the State would have to purchase the property twice over, because, in the first place, when it bought an estate, the money left its hands, and then, subsequently, it had to advance money to other people to buy the property over again, so that the transaction must be a losing one.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he could not imagine how such a proposition could be made by any member of the late Land Commission, and he was glad the Government were not disposed to accept it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. J. CORBET said, it was remarkable that throughout the discussions of the question of land in Ireland no reference whatever had been made to what he must call the standing grievance of the country—absenteeism. Hon. Members might not be aware of the extent to which absenteeism prevailed in Ireland; but, from the latest Return upon the subject, it appeared that no less than 5,713,496 acres of land, valued at £2,765,500, were held in Ireland by absentee landlords. The result of this lamentable system was, he regretted to say, absentee commerce and absentee trade. He begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 23, after sub-section 1, insert the following sub-section:—"Any estate held by a company, or by any absentee landlord, shall, within two years after the passing of this Act, or on the application of a competent number of the tenants, be purchasable by the Land Commission, at a price to be fixed upon, being not more than twenty-five or less than twenty years' purchase of the net rental of such estate, for the purpose of being resold to the occupiers. For the purposes of this section, an absentee landlord means a landlord who does not reside commonly in Ireland, that is to say whose principal place of abode is not in that country."
—(Mr. W. J. Corbet.)

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. Corbet) is irregular, and cannot be put. In the first place, it declares that the Commission shall purchase the property of Companies and absentee landlords. This is inconsistent with the discretionary powers given to the Commission in the two previous lines. In the second place, it is inconsistent with the ruling given by the Speaker, when the hon. Member for Londonderry moved an Instruction that the Committee might provide for the compulsory purchase of estates from public Companies. It was then pointed out that compulsory purchase was under certain Standing Rules of this House, and could not be enacted by a provision in the clause of a Bill.

Mr. Gladstone

MR. PARNELL asked whether it was the ruling of the Chairman that no Amendment could be moved to this Bill, giving compulsory powers to the Commission under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act or otherwise, to purchase land in Ireland?

THE CHAIRMAN declined to give any general ruling on the subject. His ruling was that the present Amendment was not regular.

MR. PARNELL asked whether the Amendment would not be in Order if the words "under the Land Clauses Consolidation Act" were added after the word "Commission?"

THE CHAIRMAN said, if the hon. Member for Wicklow County (Mr. W. J. Corbet) would bring the Amendment to the Table it should be considered.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had intended to move an Amendment to the preceding clause, which he found could be conveniently moved on the present clause. The Prime Minister had stated that morning that they were about to embark in the somewhat hazardous experiment of advancing public money for the purpose of enabling tenants to purchase their holdings, and that the transaction would assume a two-fold form. With regard to the latter form of the transaction, he believed that the second part of the sub-section relating to the payment of a fine, and a fee-farm rent, for the purpose of enabling a tenant to purchase his holding, would have considerable effect in the North of Ireland. The Committee had given certain powers to the Land Commissioners, allowing them, as regarded the purchase of a holding for a principal sum, to use their discretion in the matter of security; but as regarded the second part of the transaction there was the following qualification:—

"Provided that no advance shall be made by the Land Commission under this section on a holding subject to a fee farm rent, where the amount of such fee farm rent exceeds seventy-five per cent of the rent, which in the opinion of the Land Commission a solvent tenant would pay for the holding."

It would be seen that no notice was here taken of the amount of the fine; and, consequently, if it were an Instruction to the Commissioners that they were to take cognizance of one of the liabilities of the tenant, while no mention was made of the other, the inference would be they were to take cognizance of one liability only. But it was clear that if the fine was merely laid down to free the tenant from future increase of rent, it should be added to the fee-farm rent in the shape of annuity. The Committee having given the Commissioners power to enter into transactions of this class, they should, in his opinion, adopt the precaution of adding to the sub-section the words of the Amendment which he now begged to move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 29, after "rent," insert "together with the fine converted into the form of an annuity."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE: The argument of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) is that in dividing the total value of the landlord's interest between the fee-farm rent and the fine laid down, we take cognizance of only one of those elements. If I understand him, he means that we leave it open to the landlord to exact a fine that may be extravagant. But surely the objection of the noble Lord will not apply. We have provided the general obligation that the Commissioners should be satisfied with the expediency of the purchase, as well as conform to the particular limitations; but we did not impose on them any absolute limit as to the price which might be paid. Why, then, should we impose on them any absolute limit as to the amount of fine, where the holding is being purchased partly by the payment of a fine and partly by the payment of a fee-farm rent? I doubt whether the Amendment of the noble Lord will agree with the sub-section of the clause, because the fee-farm rent, together with the amount of fine, gives the whole value of the property which the landlord has to sell, while the sub-section speaks of a particular percentage of value which is not to be exceeded.

MR. W. H. SMITH thought the question was deserving of consideration. The fee-farm rent being fined down to at least 75 per cent of the ordinary rent, the margin of 25 per cent was not a large one; and if the State advanced one-half of what might be an exorbitant fine, the bargain might not only be injurious to the tenant, but to the State. He trusted the Prime Minister would consider the point between that time and Report.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, it appeared to him the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex simply wished to guard against collusion between the landlord and tenant; but that was an event which, looking at all the circumstances, was not likely often to occur.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON believed it was the intention of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to alter the latter part of the clause, in which case the objection of the Prime Minister would be valid to his proposed Amendment, so he would withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Amendment made in page 13, line 31, by leaving out "a solvent tenant would pay" and insert "would be a fair rent."

MR. LITTON said, he wished to suggest that it was unnecessary to confine the action of the Commission by the words of sub-section 3, which required the concurrence of three-fourths in number of the tenants before a purchase could be made. He would rather that the Commission should be guided by what the Prime Minister had called the general rules of prudence, because if they were so guided they would be the best judges of the matter. The same view was also taken by several hon. Members who had Amendments on the Paper for the omission of the sub-section. It must be manifest to the Committee that as the sub-section stood, one tenant short of the number of tenants named would be enough to defeat the powers which it was intended to give to the Commissioners; and as it was desirable that those powers should not be defeated by an accident of that kind he begged to move the omission of the sub-section.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, line 32, leave out sub-section 3. — (Mr. Litton.)

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA suggested that two-thirds of the whole number of tenants would be preferable to the proportion of three-fourths named in the sub-section.

COLONEL COLTHURST appealed to the Prime Minister to adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton) in preference to the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Sir Joseph M'Kenna). He did not think the proposal to relax the conditions on which the Commission might purchase were at all open to the same objections as were applied to the proposal to allow them to advance four-fifths instead of three-fourths of the purchase money of a holding to a tenant. There appeared to him to be no danger in leaving it to the discretion of the Court to settle the proportion of tenants able and willing to purchase.

MR. GLADSTONE said, a slight change might be made by the substitution of two-thirds value for the three-fourths named in the sub-section, to meet the case where, perhaps, two large tenants were unwilling to purchase, while many small tenants were willing to do so. The Committee would recollect that they were imposing on the State, not only the remote risk of difficulty in lending money on land, but the certain and serious disadvantage of becoming itself a landlord. The State would become the landlord, not only of fractions of the property purchased, but would become the landlord of the worst fractions of the property, which tenants would not be willing to buy. Moreover, these worst fractions might be scattered all over Ireland. There was an immense disadvantage in the State having to take up as landlord the residue of the property. Under the circumstances, he hoped it would not be thought unreasonable on his part not to accede to any farther change than the substitution of two-thirds value for the proportion of three-fourths named in the sub-section.

MR. DALY said, the Prime Minister evidently thought that a great deal of danger would result to the State from its being in possession of the residue of the properties purchased; but it must be well known that outside the tenants on the estate there would always be a large number of persons ready to take up the remaining portions of the land. For his own part, he thought the State ran no risk whatever with respect to the residue of land.

Mr. W. H. Smith

DR. LYONS regretted that the Prime Minister did not see his way to omit the sub-section. When attempts were made to combine a number of tenants for the purpose of purchasing in the Estates Court, it was found that, although at first the requisite number was forthcoming, as things went on there was a tendency on the part of the tenants to fall away and the proposal fell to the ground. As he thought it most desirable that this clause should work extensively in Ireland, he wished to see the greatest possible facilities afforded for the purchase of holdings, and therefore trusted the right hon. Gentleman would re-consider the question. Under the 1st sub-section of the clause, he did not see that the Court was necessarily bound to consider that the whole estate was involved; and he believed it was possible for them to consider any portion of the estate as the estate for the time being for sale.

MR. PARNELL said, from an expression dropped by the Prime Minister, it would seem as if he contemplated that the Commission should have the power to buy up the interests of middlemen when they held property under a fee-farm rent, in order to allow the sub-tenants to become owners. But what would become of the head rent? Would it not be possible to introduce words to enable the Commissioners to purchase it? Otherwise the Commissioners might be deterred from purchasing the interest of the middleman altogether, and the sub-tenants would thereby be deprived of the benefit of the Act and would not be able to become owners.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it would be difficult for Parliament to undertake to specify the mode in which the Commission should deal with the relations between intermediate holders and the head occupiers of estates. He did not see his way to insert any provision for dealing with that subject.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. GLADSTONE, Amendment made, in page 13, line 35, by leaving out "three-fourths," in order to insert "two-thirds."

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 35, to leave out the word "rent," in order to insert "rental" instead thereof.—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'rent' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, the word "rent" was deliberately introduced, and used in the proper sense. He believed, on examination, the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) would see that this was the case, and, therefore, trusted the Amendment would not be pressed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MAJOR NOLAN said, that as the clause stood, a certain proportion of tenants on the estate must agree to purchase. He thought it would be an improvement to make the qualification one of value instead of number, and, therefore, proposed to substitute for the wording of this part of the sub-section the words "tenants paying not less than one-half of the whole rent of the estate."

MR. GLADSTONE said, the Government considered that the tenants who were partly able to purchase should only form a certain proportion of the number willing to purchase. It was necessary, in their opinion, to introduce the limit, that one-half should be ready to enter into a contract with a view to complete purchase.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL ventured to submit that it was inexpedient to limit so strictly the number of tenants who might purchase under the fine and fee-farm system. That was a system under which the tenant might be able to obtain fixity of rent. There might be an estate in regard to which the landlord and tenants in a body agreed to the purchase of the tenures in the shape of a fee-farm rent, and it would be undesirable to shut out the estate under those circumstances. He did not think the State would suffer, if the landlord and tenant agreed together that the estate should be purchased in this form, by assisting in carrying out the arrangement. It would put an end to future litigation in the way of appeals to the Court to fix a fair rent.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 36, leave out from "estate," to the end of the sub-section.—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE: It would be no matter of dissatisfaction to us to see the clause work extensively; but I must point out that this is a very exceptional measure, authorizing large public advances to be made with reference to one specific object—namely, the creation of occupying ownerships. The purchase by fine and fee-farm rent may be a good process in itself; yet, certainly, it is quite distinct from the method of creating proprietorship to which I have referred. It, therefore, has not a claim upon us to undertake difficulties and risks on behalf of the State to anything like the extent to which the other has. Our view is that where the Commissioners are dealing with the question of making these advances, the major part of the transactions shall be with the view of creating pure and proper proprietorships.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought the Committee would pardon him for having spoken with some partiality for the system of purchase by fine and fee-farm rent. The favourite form of peasant proprietorship in Scotland was that of feu, of which there were many instances in the burgh which he represented. He was willing to withdraw his Amendment in the hope that the Government would re-consider the matter before the Report.

On the Motion of Mr. WARTON, Amendment made, in page 13, line 37, after "are," by inserting "able and."

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, there were in almost every agricultural parish in England labouring men who had saved up enough money to buy small plots of land, and these were invariably the most industrious and best conducted of their class. He was anxious that opportunities should be given for establishing a similar class in Ireland. He was anxious that some provision should be made in the Bill which would have the effect of promoting in the whole body of agricultural labourers a sense of independence and self-respect—something that would raise them in the social scale and lead to a general improvement of their condition. A deputation had that morning waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which laid before the right hon. Gentleman some most instructive facts. One case was quoted of a man earning only 4s. a-week, who, besides supporting a large family, paid £2 for the rent of half an acre of land during 20 years. In another case, £2 a-year rent was paid for only a quarter of an acre, and the tenant himself had built a house upon the land. The amount in the latter case represented a rent of £8 an acre. Now, if the Amendment he was about to move were agreed to, these men would have the opportunity of purchasing their holdings from the landlords by an annual payment of 12s. 6d. per annum in the case of the half acre, and by an annual payment of 6s. 6d. in the case of the quarter of an acre, instead of the exorbitant rent which they were then paying, and which would actually buy up the fee simple of the land in six years. The average price of land in Ireland was about £25 per acre; and, therefore, at 5 per cent per annum, the sum required to buy up the principal and interest would be 25s. per acre, or 12s. 6d. per half acre. The transaction would be perfectly safe for the State to enter into, for this reason. The State could borrow money at 3½ per cent, while the charge for the advance would be 3½ per cent, and out of the difference of ½ per cent a guarantee fund could be created. Besides that, there would be the security of the holding itself, in case the tenant failed to pay up the instalments. He thought some concession was due to the labourers of the kind he had indicated. As the Bill stood, the labourers would be in a worse position after it became law than they were in at present. Hitherto it had been possible for a labourer who had put by a little money to take a small farm without payment of a fine; but by the 1st section of the Bill, which dealt with free sale, a monopoly was created in favour of existing tenants against all other classes in Ireland, and the labourers would henceforth have no chance of rising to the rank of tenant farmers without payment of a fine. Therefore, he said, it was worth consideration by the Government whether some concession should not be made in this Bill to the labourer, and the question should not be left to stand over to a future time. He was satisfied, moreover, that unless some concession were made, a very serious and troublesome agitation would arise; indeed, there were symptoms of it already at that moment. For these reasons he hoped the Government would not hastily reject his Amendment; but if they were indisposed to accept it at once, he trusted, at all events, they would take the matter into their consideration, and try to introduce into the clauses which they had promised to bring up on behalf of the labourers some provision in the desired direction.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, line 3, after "tenant," to insert "or in the case of a tenant whose holding does not exceed one half of an acre, and who is a labourer, the whole of the said price or fine as the case may be."—(Mr. Villiers Stuart.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE: I need not say that very great credit is due to my hon. Friend (Mr. Villiers Stuart) for the active zeal he has shown in endeavouring to secure the introduction into this Bill of some beneficial provision on behalf of the Irish labourer. I can assure him that in the course of a few days he will have evidence of the reality of our sympathy with him in his proposal in the clause which my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. W. E. Forster) is preparing for the purpose of dealing with this subject. We feel that we can do some good by providing means and opportunities which will be very beneficial to the labourer as securing him accommodation. But accommodation is one thing—accommodation, first of all, in the use of dwellings, and, secondly, in suitable allotments; and the proposal of my hon. Friend is another. I do not complain myself of his having marked out the particular area of land named in his Amendment; but I say my hon. Friend's Motion is not to provide the labourer with the practical use and benefit of dwellings and of suitable allotments; it is to create labourer proprietorships. Now, with regard to that, I must say that I am very doubtful indeed whether it is absolutely a desirable thing for the labourer that he should invest his small savings in land. It is open to this doubt particularly. What is, above all things, desirable for the labourer is that he should not be tied down to some plot of ground which he may hold, and which positively fastens him to one spot. If you effect this you greatly deteriorate the value of the main commodity which he has to sell—namely, his labour, by increasing the distance he has to travel in order to sell it. Therefore, I do not think that special facilities ought to be given by the State for the purpose of enabling him to become proprietor.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he was disposed to agree with much that had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister with respect to that particular Amendment; but he thought the Committee ought not to put out of consideration what might and probably would be the condition of the agricultural labourer in Ireland, on those holdings which ceased to be tenancies, and became estates belonging to a new class of proprietors. It seemed to him that unless something was done to give facilities for the erection of labourers' cottages, and perhaps the creation of allotments on the estates, which, by the operation of this clause, they were going to turn into small proprietorships, they would deteriorate the actual position of a good many of the respectable labourers in Ireland. He thought that consideration should be impressed on the minds of the Government at a time when they were preparing, as he understood they were, a clause or clauses in behalf of the Irish labourer.

MAJOR NOLAN thought the Prime Minister might possibly be right in the view which he had taken of the effect of the Irish labourer being tied to one spot. But that, he believed, was not the intention of the hon. Member (Mr. Villiers Stuart) in moving his Amendment. From his (Major Nolan's) own knowledge, there were in some cases on the farms in Ireland small plots of ground in the occupation of labourers; and he presumed the hon. Member meant that when those small plots were being sold the tenants should be assisted to purchase them. He thought the labourers ought to be dealt with even more liberally than the large farmers in the way of assisting them to purchase their holdings. The cost of this to the Exchequer would be very small indeed; and he thought the Government would do well to stretch a point in their favour, finding the whole of the purchase money, instead of advancing only a certain portion of it. Nothing would tend to popularize the measure more than a provision of that kind, which would be regarded as a great boon to the labourer.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped that the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart) would not press his Amendment. There were a great many things to be considered before the plan of making labourer proprietorships could be carried into law. He thought the Committee ought to be satisfied with the statement of the Prime Minister, that the subject should have the attention of the Government before the Bill left the House of Commons. In legislation of this kind it was very necessary to guard against one thing—namely, that the labourer, having got possession of, say, an acre of land, should feel that he had no longer occasion to remain a labourer for the man who had provided a house for him. He had had considerable experience in providing residences for labourers, and he knew that it was necessary to guard this point very strictly.

MR. O'SULLIVAN hoped the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart) would not press his Amendment to a division, but wait to see what proposal the Government had to make. If that was not satisfactory the hon. Member could bring up the matter again on Report.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, after the kind and sympathetic tone in which the Prime Minister had referred to the proposal before the Committee, he was willing, with the permission of the Committee, to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: With regard to the next Amendment on the Paper, which is in the name of the hon. Member for Carrickfergus (Mr. Greer), I have to say that that Amendment makes it compulsory on the Commissioners to purchase any estate offered by an owner at 25 years' purchase, if three-fourths of the tenants on that estate are willing to purchase their holdings. This compulsion on the Commission is inconsistent with the part of the clause already agreed to, in which it is provided that the Land Commission shall not purchase any estate unless they are satisfied with the expediency of the purchase. The Amendment cannot therefore be put. Then, with regard to the next Amendment—namely, that in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), that Amendment cannot be put, as the Money Resolution of the House would not authorize the Committee to frame provisions attendant with charges on the Public Funds for drainage or agricultural improvements.

MR. A. MOORE said, the provision contained in the 5th sub-section, which said that the costs should be included in the purchase money, was a great boon to the tenants. He wished to know whether the Government would hold out any hope that there should be a regular system of fees in all cases of procedure in the Court? The Committee must remember that that was an attorney's Bill, inasmuch as it would bring every landlord and tenant in Ireland to the office of his attorney. He assured hon. Members that persons who had very great experience in these matters feared that the measure would result in a good deal of law, and there was not the slightest doubt that the tenants had been most shockingly imposed upon in recent proceedings under the Act of 1870. He had himself been present when an attorney's bill of £400 was claimed for in connection with the sale of only 56 acres of land, the attorney afterwards consenting to accept £300.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, that the matter referred to by the hon. Member would be considered with the view of supplying what was required.

Clause 21 (Sale to public of parcels not purchased by tenants).

THE CHAIRMAN: With reference to the Amendments next on the Paper, in the names of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), and the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan), I have to point out that they appear to me to overrule the clause which has just been passed. Their object would be to give to every tenant who did not desire to buy a grant in perpetuity upon a fixed rent. But the last clause only authorized the purchase of estates for the purpose of re-selling them to tenants, and the fact of there being a residue not taken by the tenants does not exonerate the Commission from limiting themselves to the purposes for which they are authorized to buy estates. As these Amendments are inconsistent with Clause 20, and would, to a great extent, overrule that clause, they cannot be put.

MR. LALOR said, there was no doubt that if the Commission had power to sell any quantity of land to one person a large number of so-called land-jobbers would make their appearance in Ireland. These persons would, perhaps, purchase land in large quantities and become landlords, thereby diverting the land from the object intended by Government—namely, the real benefit of the community. The men in possession of the land, in his opinion, ought to be the bond fide tenant farmers who would work it themselves; and as it was his desire to promote that condition of things in Ireland, he proposed to limit the quantity of land sold to one person to 50 acres.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, line 22, after "other," insert "provided the quantity of land that may be sold to any one purchaser shall not exceed fifty statute acres."—(Mr. Lalor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Lalor) would not press his Amendment. The powers of sale of the Commission ought not to be restricted, because they were for the purpose of enabling them to recoup the money advanced to purchase the estate, and by their exercise the interest of the tenants could not possibly be damaged.

MR. BIGGAR said, the hon. Member who had just spoken had very properly put the case of land in the occupation of small tenants; but a case might arise in which the present tenant occupied a very large quantity of land, and in which it was desirable that powers should be given for more or less subdividing the holding. The case of his hon. Friend the Member for Queen's County (Mr. Lalor) was that the buyer from the Commissioners would probably be a land-jobber, who would charge an exorbitant rent for the property through a middleman. That had been the case with land bought from the Church Commissioners, when the occupiers were not themselves the buyers of the holding.

MAJOR NOLAN hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. The question of these residues was the great difficulty that the Commission on which he sat had to deal with, and they would constitute the practical difficulty in this case. He could not see that it would be of any benefit to the tenants to have landlords limited in their estates to 50 acres.

MR. W. E. FORSTER pointed out that the enormous difference in the value of land was another objection to the Amendment. The value of 50 acres of land, for instance, in the mountainous parts of Ireland would be very small as compared with the value of 50 acres in other parts of the country.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to move the omission of the middle paragraph of the clause, which provided that the Land Commission might advance to any purchaser of a parcel under this section, on the security of such parcel, one-half of the principal sum paid as the whole price or of the fine. He did not see upon what basis this portion of the clause rested. It was easy to understand the advance of the money to a tenant, and the object of that was perfectly plain to the Committee; but here was a purchaser who might be anybody but a tenant. He would not be one of the tenants on the estate, because, if he were, he would get an advance of three-fourths instead of one-half of the purchase money. The individual would be one of the public, probably a land-jobber; at any rate, he would be a person who would have no title to claim an advance of money from the State for the purpose of making a purchase. Further, he would point out to the Government that if this purchase was bond fide, the purchaser would have no difficulty in raising one-half of the money in mortgage. He could not conceive any reason why the Government should advance any portion of the purchase money to persons who had no claim for such assistance. It might be urged that this was to be done in order to facilitate the disposal of land by the Commission; still he was not quite clear that this was a sufficient justification for the money of the State being advanced to such individuals as would, in all probability, apply for it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, to leave out all the words from "The," in line 23, to "fine," in line 25, both inclusive.—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

[Twenty-third Night.]

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) hoped the noble Lord would not press his Amendment. The object of the clause was, of course, to replace the money spent by the Commissioners. The case referred to by the noble Lord did not constitute any real advance; it was simply the taking of a mortgage on the land.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment—namely, that standing in the name of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) is open to the same remark as I have applied to the Amendments of the hon. and learned Member for Tyrone (Mr. Litton), and the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan)—namely, that it is not within the Money Resolution of the House, and therefore cannot be put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that as the Amendment he had given Notice of could not be put, he wished to speak on the clause itself. If the clause were put into operation in the West of Ireland, the Commissioners would find themselves in possession of portions of estates absolutely worthless for sale, and not fit to be inhabited by human beings. What he wanted was to give the Commissioners power to deal rationally with such property for the purpose of improving it. The Bill would be of no use whatever in the West of Ireland. The 25th clause enabled the Board of Works to do something for reclamation, but did not enable the Commission to do anything with the portions of estates which would remain on their hands unsold. [Cries of "Agreed."] He saw that the Government and the Committee were so impatient to finish the Bill that it would be useless for him to proceed with his observations; but he protested that the Bill would not settle the Irish Question, if the tenants of the West of Ireland were left in their present condition, which had been described during the last two or three years as shocking to the ideas of all Englishmen, and as a disgrace in the eyes of Europe. Unless something were done in the direction he had indicated the Land Question would, in a very short time, again present itself.

LORD ELOHO said, they had just heard from the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) that the Bill would be of no benefit whatever to the West of Ireland; but he (Lord Eloho) was under the impression that it was especially for the West of Ireland that the Bill had been introduced. Would the hon. Member for Galway kindly inform the Committee to what part of the population of Ireland it would be a benefit?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was impossible to allow a general discussion upon the state of the West of Ireland to take place upon the Question that the Clause stand part of the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause 22 (Terms of repayment of advances made by Commission).

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL, who rose to propose the Amendment of which he had given Notice, said, that it was undoubtedly true that there was no law by which they could interfere with the disposition of property once the owner was owner in fee simple. Under Clause 21 of the Bill, which he merely referred to by way of illustration, the Land Commission, as long as any portion of the advances made to tenants was not repaid, would have it in their power to prevent anything like sub-letting or the sub-division of the holding. Personally, he was anxious to establish a state of things which should lead to permanent safety and security, and it was on that ground that he recommended the Amendment to the consideration of the Committee. By its adoption security against sub-division and sub-letting would, in many cases, be secured for a period of 52 years.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, line 36, to leave out the words "for thirty-five years of five pounds," in order to insert the words "which shall redeem both principal and interest within any period not exceeding fifty-two years at the discretion of the Land Commission, such annuity to be calculated at a rate which shall secure to the Land Commission interest at the rate of three pounds ten shillings per annum,"—(Mr. Charles Russell.)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'for thirty-five years' stand part of the Clause."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought that the argument with which his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. C. Russell) had supported the Amendment ought to be conclusive with the Committee. There was no doubt whatever that the moment nine-tenths of the owners found themselves in a condition to sub-let, they would sub-let, and would sub-divide the holding among their families, and with sub-letting and subdivision would occur all the evils Parliament were now desirous of curing. They had given to the Commission the power to prevent sub-letting; but the Committee ought to bear in mind that both Professor Baldwin and Mr. Robertson were strongly of opinion that an extension of time was necessary for the repayment of the advances. The resources of the tenant and the lessening of the burden of repayment would tend to prevent the old evils from recurring. He therefore thought, on the grounds of the argument of his hon. and learned Friend, and on the ground of making the terms easier to the tenant, the Committee would do well to accept the Amendment.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that the term of 35 years for repayment was that adopted under the Act of 1870. He believed that under the Irish Church Act the period was 32 years, and a considerable number of the tenants were anxious to repay long within that limit. It was considered very undesirable to extend the period of years, and he could not, therefore, support the Amendment, which proposed to prolong it from 35 to 52 years, or to carry it over nearly three generations, whereas 35 years only meant two generations. Surely, two generations formed quite as long a period as the repayment ought to be spread over. On the other hand, it must be borne in mind that the instalments, together with interest, were only to be repaid at 5 per cent; and, therefore, it was wise to retain the period of 35 years. If they could secure the holding against sub-division for 35 years, it was all they were called upon to do.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped that the Government would not hesitate to make to the tenants the small concession that was asked from them. It would make things easier to the tenant occupiers than they were under the clause as it stood. Five per cent upon the purchase money would be a very heavy drag upon them, and it appeared to him that it would be a great thing to set them going hopefully for the first six or seven years. If the instalments were made easier they would be more regularly paid, and the Irish purchasers would be able to keep the estate in a better condition than if they were to place a heavy burden upon them, which at first might be a strain upon them they would be unable to get over. He invited the attention of the Government to this point. The main thing that was important to the State was that the money should be repaid, and that the people should feel a moral obligation upon them to pay it. Some additional burden, spread over a longer term, would be thrown upon the tenants by the adoption of the Amendment; but one effect of it would be to increase the value of the security for repayment, because the payment would be rendered easier, and more certain. If there were an extension of time from 35 to 52 years, not only would the security remain as good as at the commencement, but it would improve from day to day. It never could be worse, and the Committee had already taken care that only three-fourths of the requisite purchase money would be advanced by the State. He hoped the Chief Secretary for Ireland would impress upon his Colleagues the desirability of consenting to the Amendment. He ventured to say that there had not been a single point brought under discussion from the time the Bill was introduced until the present moment that was of more practical importance than that now raised by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell). He said that with a very lengthened experience of Ireland. He thought nothing would give more general satisfaction, or go further towards proving the sincerity and the desire of Parliament and the Government to ameliorate the condition of the Irish people generally, than for the Committee to agree to that proposition. In many cases it would make the difference between absolute struggling for the next seven years, and the rendering of things comparatively easy, and it would be giving to the poor tenants a gleam of blue sky, which had hitherto not been held out to them. He felt satisfied that his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), if he were to enter the House, and find that this Amendment had been accepted, would retract every word he had said about the operation of the Bill in the West of Ireland. The proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk was the only one thing needful in order to destroy the predictions of the hon. Member for Galway as to the effect which would be produced by the passing of the Bill in the West of Ireland. And he would say, further, that nothing could go forth from the House that would more effectively show the desire of Parliament to improve the condition of Ireland. Under these circumstances, he implored the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government to give the Amendment the most favourable consideration. He was satisfied that there had not been a single Amendment proposed to the Committee which was anything like as important as this.

MR. GIVAN joined with his hon. Friend the Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) in impressing upon the Government the desirability of acceding to the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell). It did not ask for any further sum of money, but merely for an extension of time. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) said the time was longer than that fixed by the Irish Church Commission; but the right hon. Gentleman omitted to add that the position of the estates belonging to the Irish Church and of the tenants who were affected by the Bill was very different. He had attended a great number of meetings of the tenants with respect to various matters dealt with by the Bill, and he had been constantly requested by the tenants in the most earnest manner to endeavour to obtain an extension of time for the repayment of the instalments of the advances proposed to be made to them. A tenant farmer might have a couple of sons and four or five daughters; he might invest in a farm for the benefit of his sons; but he might not deem it desirable to expend the whole of the money in his possession during the first 30 years in accumulating land for his sons. He would, therefore, be desirous of reducing his liabilities to a minimum. It would be very hard to ask a man within his own life to expose himself for 35 years to heavy difficulties in repaying the whole of the purchase money, and it was not a question of loss to the State. If the State was likely to lose anything he would not press the matter as he felt bound to do now.

MR. H. H. FOWLER thought, if his memory served him aright, that when the school boards were first established in this country, and certainly for a considerable number of years after 1870, the Public Works Loan Commissioners lent money to the school boards of England for the erection of school-houses, in regard to which the repayment of the principal was spread over 50 years, the annual payment which covered both principal and interest being only at the rate of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. Therefore, as an English Liberal Member, he appealed to Her Majesty's Government to treat the Irish tenants, under the circumstances of the case, in such a manner as to give them real, actual, and substantial relief, and to place them in as good terms as the school boards obtained when they borrowed money from the State for the erection of their schools. He thought his hon. and learned Friend below him (Mr. C. Russell) would feel inclined to accept a term of 50 years at 4 per cent for the repayment of principal and interest. Having regard to the present state of the money market, and the present state of credit,  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was really a sufficient rate of interest to charge when the security was ample.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am far from disputing the title of my hon. Friend (Mr. H. H. Fowler) to speak with authority on this subject; but from our point of view he cannot speak, and from our point of view I am bound to say that we cannot consent, on any consideration, to accept the Amendment. My hon. Friend put the case of the school boards. We were then imposing, for the first time, a heavy tax upon the localities of the country, and we strained to the uttermost the action of the Government in order to lessen the burden the present generation would bear. There has hardly been a case—I know of no instance—in which by legislation so considerable a burden was imposed upon the localities as that which was imposed by the Education Act; but we must remember what it was for. In the present case, a great favour and a boon are being offered to the tenants. I do not depreciate the value of the security which we should have upon these holdings; but who can compare that security with the security of the permanent rateable property of the country, which property is permanent, absolute, and unquestionable at all times and under all circumstances? From the arguments which have been employed one would really think that the loans to be granted are to be made repayable within four or five years. The proposal contained in the Amendment involves a serious straining of the financial conscience of the Government. But there are points beyond which it cannot be strained, and I feel that I should not be keeping my implied obligations to the Members of this House, representing English and Scotch constituencies, who have consented to accompany the Government in the great length we have asked them to go towards meeting this real necessity if we were not to adhere in its main outline to the Bill we have proposed, and of this main outline this is, undoubtedly, an important feature.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL was extremely sorry that Her Majesty's Government had put down their foot upon this proposal. Last night he had supported the Government upon a different question, and he thought they might have dealt more leniently with the Amendment now submitted to them. They were, he thought, with great respect, making a mistake in the matter, the nature of which had been pointed out to them by Professor Baldwin. It appeared from the Report of the Comptroller General that the arrears of interest in connection with the advance out of the Church Fund on the half-yearly instalments upon the mortgaged landed property were, in 1878, £3,197, in 1879 £7,472, and in 1880 £11,817. He thought those facts proved positively that the conditions upon which they made these advances were too hard. What they ought to try to do was to make the conditions so favourable that the tenants would be able to repay the money borrowed without a heavy strain upon them. Professor Baldwin and Mr. Robertson both proved that, by extending the repayment over a longer time, they would secure the advances being repaid to the State without risk. What did it matter to the State whether it was paid back within 50 or within 35 years? Surely it was better to impose the longer term rather than run the risk in the course of a few years of creating a general outcry in Ireland for repudiation. The figures given by the Church Temporalities Commission afforded a lesson which ought not to be passed over lightly, and it certainly appeared to him that Her Majesty's Government were about to commit a grave mistake.

MR. GLADSTONE: I ought to notice another point, which seems to have been raised in the nature of argument and protest. We were told, and told with perfect truth, that in the case of the Irish Tithes Commission we had extended the arrangement to about 50 or 52 years. That was so; but it was a case very nearly analogous to that of the school board rates, for this reason. The Irishlanded proprietary, being generally Protestant, had had up to that time their religion—if I may so speak—provided for them at the expense of the State, by what was termed a National Institution. Undoubtedly, the effect of that Act was, at a moment's notice, to throw on that class of persons a burden which it was quite proper they should bear, and which it was not proposed to enable them to obtain by a gift of money from the State. But having a burden thrown upon them which they and their ancestors had been free from, it appeared to Parliament that it was a very good policy—and, indeed, it was a good policy—to ease them by throwing the burden over a greater number of years than otherwise would have been done. The noble Lord has made a reference to the Report of Professor Baldwin and Mr. Robertson; but I think he has made a mis-statement as to the effect of that Report. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I read it very carefully.] The general effect of that Report is to show that, in the minds of Professor Baldwin and Mr. Robertson, there is very great doubt about the propriety of the whole transaction. As far as their arguments go, the effect of the Report is to throw great doubt upon the whole scheme; and as to the rapid growth of arrears, the noble Lord must remember the bad seasons through which Ireland has just passed.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY thought that the scheme of the Government might be imperilled if they insisted upon retaining 35 years as the term of repayment. He believed there were very few Irish Members who would be found unwilling to pledge the security of the country on an Income Tax to be raised in Ireland for repaying the annual advances under the Bill. They would be quite willing, if they could get the advances now from the House on fairer terms, that they should stand pledged to the taxpayers of England and Scotland, not only on the credit of each individual farm and holding, but on that of the entire community of Ireland, in order to meet the annual repayments. That was an offer which he saw was not objected to by hon. Members sitting around him, and it was a test of the bona fides with which they were entering into the matter. Undesirable as it was that the repayment should be concluded within one generation, there were other matters that were worthy of consideration. It was not unworthy of consideration by the Prime Minister that, by giving some additional time, he would undoubtedly increase the security of the State for the repayment, because he would make the payments smaller during each year; and, consequently, the payment that might have to be met after a year of distress would be more easy to bear. Last night the Committee refused to the people of Ireland to change the total advance made by the State from three-fourths to four-fifths. He would not go back upon that question now; but having refused that proposal, it was not unfair that they should be asked now to consider whether the tenants might not be relieved in another way by an additional extension of time for repayment. He thought it would be far more advantageous to the Irish tenants to obtain some slight extension of time rather than an extension of the advances. He was not one of those who were desirous of making a peasant proprietary by placing a man in the position of mortgaging his property without any equity of redemption. He thought that would be a most unfortunate state of things; but if, without danger to the State, if without any of the evils which, no doubt, they ought to fear in transactions of this kind, they could give further facilities to the tenants of Ireland, they would do of all things that which was most necessary to make the Act a marked success. What they ought to do was this. If the Bill was to produce social content in Ireland, if it was to make the people believe, what he trusted they would be brought to believe, that they had friends in that House, and that the House was inclined to do them justice and to make some reparation for the past, let them feel that they had some benefit coming to them from the operations of that Bill. He would take the case of a man who paid £500 for his tenancy. If they got him to pay that sum in 35 years at 5 per cent, the annual payment would be £25; whereas, if they reduced the amount of each repayment, as proposed by the Amendment, that sum of £25 would be diminished to something like £18 or £19; but a difference of £6 or £7 in an annual payment of £25 would be an enormous boon to the tenant, and would certainly increase rather than decrease the security of the State. It might be that the extreme suggestion contained in the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend of 52 years was too long a period over which to extend the repayment, and it might be the opinion of the Prime Minister that a less period ought to be taken than 52 years without going down so low as 35 years. [Cries of "No, no!" from the Home Rulers.] He would remind his hon. Friends who called out "No!" that "half a loaf was better than no bread;" and if they could not get 52 years, let them endeavour to press the Committee to fix some intermediate period which would give some relief to the purchaser and might be conceded by the Government. The proposal in the clause was that a man should pay 5 per cent for the next 35 years in discharge of the purchase money. Of course, that would discharge the principal as well as the interest; but, nevertheless, while the man was paying it off it would very seriously affect him to have to pay so high a sum as 5 per cent, a rate of interest they never would advise anybody to borrow money at for the purpose of purchasing land. He trusted, under these circumstances, that either now or some time before the conclusion of the Committee on the Bill, some extension of time would be given for the repayment of the purchase money, because he seriously believed that upon such an extension of time would depend the development of the principle of the creation of a peasant proprietary in Ireland.

MR. SHAW regretted very much that the Prime Minister seemed to have decided against the Amendment. He (Mr. Shaw) had as strong an opinion as the right hon. Gentleman could possibly have in favour of concluding such a transaction between a private individual and the State in as short a time as possible. But it did not follow that the adoption of the Amendment would have the effect, to a very large extent, of prolonging the time of repayment. It would only be in exceptional cases that the extension of time would be taken advantage of. The Irish tenantry would be anxious to wind up the transaction as quickly as possible, so that they might be in a position to deal with the property. His own opinion was strong that the average time of repayment would not be anything like 35 years. He thought there was a want of elasticity in the Government proposal. It would afford very great relief to a large class of the tenantry; but his own opinion was that the Commissioners should have the power even of taking a reduced payment for the first five or 10 years of the time. He knew a case where a man with a farm of 50 acres would, the moment the Bill passed, become the purchaser of his holding; and he did not see why the Commissioners should not have the option of taking 4 per cent at the beginning of the period and 6 per cent during the latter part of it. He thought that, upon the whole, there should be more elasticity in the clause, and more power given to the Commissioners to deal with the different cases on their individual merits. He was satisfied that such elasticity would give far greater success to the scheme; the State could not possibly lose a single shilling, because all that was asked for was a mere extension of time for repayment, full interest being given. He sincerely hoped that either in this way or in some other way tenants below a certain value would be treated more liberally. He did not think that the large tenants would be very anxious to obtain better terms; but he was sure that there was a class of tenants upon the smaller holdings to whom the State might fairly give an extension with very great advantage to all parties concerned.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he was not sure that there was very much utility in continuing the discussion. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) said the Prime Minister had put his foot down upon this proposition. It might be said that he had ground it under his heel, and not merely set down his foot upon it. The right hon. Gentleman refused the proposal with great energy, and he (Mr. Macfarlane) regretted extremely that the Prime Minister should have taken that course. Although he could say nothing upon the subject which had not already been said, yet it sometimes happened that the same thing said by a great number of persons in the end produced its effect. The Prime Minister referred to the case of the school boards, in which he had given 50 years for the repayment of the sum advanced, his object being to make it easy for the existing generation. That was precisely what they wanted to do in the case of the Irish tenants. They did not want to make it difficult, if not impossible, for the Irish tenants to repay the advances. He agreed with the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), when his hon. Friend said, with his usual judgment, that the success of the Bill would be materially interfered with if that rigid line was maintained by the Government. He would, therefore, appeal once more to the Government, and ask whether, if they would not allow 52 years, at any rate to grant 45 years, and if they would not grant 45 years, let them lower the rate of interest to 3 per cent, which was about the value of the public securities throughout the Kingdom, and there would be no loss to the Crown upon the transaction. Three and a-half per cent was too high a rate to charge, with 1½ per cent for a sinking fund. If the Prime Minister insisted in securing the repayment of the money in 35 years, he would appeal to him to make the terms more easy.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not think it fair towards Her Majesty's Government that they should alone have to conduct this debate in defence of the Consolidated Fund. I feel sure that the silence which has been observed by English and Scotch Members on this occasion is not because they disagree with Her Majesty's Government, but because they do not wish to prolong the discussion. For my own part, I wish to take my full share in any unpopularity that may be incurred in the resistance of this Motion for the further extension of time upon the Consolidated Fund. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill) said it could not possibly matter to the State whether the money was repaid in 30 or in 50 years. Is the credit of the State such that that doctrine can be applied to every possible advance? Are we to adopt the principle that it is immaterial whether loans are made, either to public bodies or to individuals, at one scale of payments or another? I entirely agree with what has been said by the Prime Minister, that the financial conscience of the Government has been strained to the utmost in making the proposals they have made, and I trust that the financial conscience of the House and the financial conscience of the Committee will not be more elastic than that of the Prime Minister. The Government will find plenty of support when they, acting upon their judgment, yield to some of the demands which are made upon them; but I think Her Majesty's Government ought to be equally supported when they are defending the Consolidated Fund, however unanimous may be the opinion which seems to be brought to bear from one quarter of the House against it. On this point, also, let me ask whether the effect of raising the scale from 30 to 50 years might not be to increase the price which the tenants would have to pay? I think that the tenant who can borrow at 50 years is more likely to be called upon to pay a higher price to his landlord than one who could pay in 30 years. [Cries of "No, no!"] I think it cannot be seriously contested that the easier the terms upon which you can borrow the higher the price you will have to pay. I have been unwilling at any previous stage, owing to the fact that I was not present at these debates, to interfere with the discussion of the Bill; but I have felt it my duty on this occasion to assure Her Majesty's Government, as I am sure I can, that there are a number of Members on both sides of the House who are grateful to them for the energy they have shown in resisting this proposal, and I hope they will persevere in that course.

SIR GABRIEL GOLDNEY merely rose for the purpose of endorsing everything the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) had said. He felt quite satisfied that no Government could agree to the proposal to extend the time of payment.

MR. DALY said, he had not intended to take part in the debate; but he would strongly recommend that, if the object of the Government was to allow the poorer classes of the tenants to purchase their holdings, the burden should be made as light as possible, and the repayments spread over a lengthened period. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) that it would be much better for the tenants to have a small annual payment now, even if they had a larger payment of 8 or 9 per cent to make during the last 15 or 16 years. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), who had just sat down, had made a somewhat curious observation. The right hon. Gentleman said that if the term for the repayment of the loan was extended, the price paid by the tenant would be greater. That would probably be true if the transaction were between the actual borrower and the actual lender; but he could not see how the price would be affected by giving a power to the tenant to purchase and to repay the purchase money within a long period, when the purchase money itself was to be advanced by the State. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had referred to money advances by the Public Works Loan Commissioners for a period of 52 years for the erection of school board houses, and the right hon. Gentleman said that Parliament had fixed the term of 52 years because it was about to impose a very heavy tax and a very serious burden upon the people. He (Mr. Daly) humbly submitted that the same consideration ought to apply here. It was obvious that if it applied to a wealthy and prosperous people like that of England, it ought much more to apply when they were about to impose a burden upon a poor and impoverished people already suffering from other burdens which had been entailed upon them. He was one of those who had all along welcomed the introduction of this Bill. He was one of those who looked to it as likely to affect very greatly the future of his country; and he was satisfied that if the scheme of the Government were carried out fairly and generously, it would tend very much to insure the prosperity not only of the occupiers of agricultural holdings, but of all classes of society in Ireland generally. He would appeal to the financial conscience of the Prime Minister, and would ask the right hon.

Mr. Goschen

Gentleman if the Bill were made a real source of prosperity to the agricultural population of Ireland, what would inevitably follow? There would inevitably follow an increase in the deposits in the Post Office Savings Banks; and, as a natural consequence, it would inevitably follow that the money would be lent to the Government at £2 10s. per cent, so that it was impossible in the long run, if the scheme was to work well, that the Government would lose anything by extending the repayments over a period of 52 years. There was another matter which was also of great importance. The primary thing the Government had to consider was how they could best in Ireland help the lame dog over the stile; and just as the poor tenant was able to realize a substantial advantage from the Government proposals, so would he become more thrifty and industrious, not only for his own interests, but as an example to his sons and daughters and the rest of his family. When, after 25 or 28 years of thrift and economy, such a man would only be too ready to say—"I am getting stronger and inheriting more money every day, and therefore I will free the land from the restrictions which now prevent me from sub-dividing and sub-letting." That was only human nature; and there was no question whatever about the security. Indeed, the Prime Minister himself admitted that the security was quite as good for 52 years as for 35 years. Nor was it a question of principle, because the principle had been conceded to the wealthier population of England; and the poorer class of Ireland had a perfect right to ask for the same concession. Indeed, it would be an unreasonable rebuke on the part of Her Majesty's Government if they declined to make the same concession to the demands of the Irish Members. The claim was one which was based upon justice, and it involved no financial loss to the Imperial Exchequer; and although it was sought to spread the repayment over a period of 52 years, he believed himself that, except in a very few instances, it would not mean more than 30 years.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish to point out that the good effect of the proposals made by Her Majesty's Government must depend not merely upon the liberality of the State and of the House and of the taxpayers generally, but in the efforts which are made by the recipients themselves. I understand the proposal now made to be this—that, instead of any efforts being made by the tenants themselves, they should go on paying just about the same sum they are paying now in rent, and that, in the end, they should obtain possession of the freehold. Now, this means no effort at all. We appeal to them to make some slight sacrifice themselves, in order to obtain the benefits of this Bill; and I very much think that if we put it as a claim on their part to become prospective landlords, we shall produce a great effect in the social character of the Irish people. It is not as though we were about to deal with a people who are inaccessible to the advantages of thrift. That is a popular delusion. They are not inaccessible to thrift. It has been prophesied that the scheme will fall through on account of the short time we have fixed for the repayment of these advances—namely, 35 years. I am perfectly certain that we run no danger of this kind. We have been told that we must nurse the people into the new arrangement; but that is not the way we should treat them. We should give them an opportunity at once of doing something for themselves, and of developing a little energy and resolution. One or two hon. Members have said that there is no elasticity in the Bill. On the contrary, I believe that there is great elasticity in it. There is elasticity up to 35 years, and surely that is elasticity enough. What other cases are there in which a borrower is not required to complete a bargain in 35 years? Some reference has been made to the generations over which the repayment is likely to extend. Now, I really think that if you were to fix the period at 52 years there is hardly a man who would incur the responsibility, expecting to clear off the advances within the term of his own life. I will only mention one other fact. Allusion has been made to the advances that were made for the purposes of education. I quite agree with what has been said by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, that we were throwing an entirely new burden upon the rate-payers, and that it was our duty to make it as easy as possible. I may add that I was somewhat interested myself in getting that bargain effected, and I thought that I made a very good bargain for the ratepayers. I am sure of this—that if the matter had been thoroughly discussed at the time, I should not have made the bargain I did, but that it would have been found inconvenient, and would have been regarded as setting a bad precedent. In all probability the bargain would have been re-cast; and I may add that the loans now made to school boards are on very different terms.

MR. MELDON said, that he rose to continue the discussion, although he was very anxious that the Bill should make as rapid progress as possible. But, in so doing, he wished to express his opinion that the most important Amendment which had come under the consideration of the Committee was under consideration at the present moment. The real question raised by the Amendment was, whether or not the Government scheme should, to a certain extent, fail or not? He had spoken to many of the farmers upon the subject—he had advocated its principles, and he had carefully studied the whole question over and over again; but he had always been of opinion, and he had invariably pointed it out to the poor farmers, that the scheme for establishing a peasant proprietary could not be of any good to the present generation. It was all very well to tell the farmers that they were laying aside a store for their children, and their children's children; but what they said was—"What will we, who are now in the occupation of the land, gain by becoming owners of the fee simple instead of paying rent?" The farmers in Ireland were a very clever and business-like set of men; and when they made their calculations, they ascertained that not only would they derive no benefit from the scheme at all, but that they would actually be called upon to pay—in the shape of the instalments necessary to repay the advances—a larger sum than they paid at present by way of rent. He had himself pointed out to the farmers the importance of having a freehold for their children, which at the end of 30 or 35 years should be free; but their reply almost invariably was—"Let us take care of ourselves, and let our children do the same. Why should we impose burdens upon ourselves for posterity?" Precedent, over and over again, had been set for fixing a lengthened period for the repayment of instalments of borrowed money where the security was good. They had the precedent of the school boards, and the same precedent had been established, over and over again, in connection with other public bodies of the country. Many of them had been in the habit of borrowing money repayable in as long a period as 60 years, and the only question considered was whether the security was good. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland asked why the tenant farmers should not be called upon to do something for themselves. He wished to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that before any of these advances could be obtained at all the tenant farmer was himself bound to provide one-fourth of the purchase money, and that was doing a great deal for himself. Perhaps the Prime Minister would allow him to point out that the security the Government would have for the repayment of the instalments would be increasing year by year; every farthing paid by way of instalments made the security of the Government better. He did not think that the Irish people had been fairly treated in the way in which the proposal had been received by the Committee. There seemed to be a howl against the Irish Members, as if they wanted a grant from the Consolidated Fund. They wanted nothing of the kind. The security was admitted to be perfect. As he had pointed out, it would be year by year increasing in value. He had also pointed out that over and over again there had been precedents for granting loans extending over a much longer period for purposes by no means as desirable as in the present case. It must also be borne in mind that this was a scheme which Parliament itself was fostering. Parliament desired the creation of a peasant proprietary, and had no doubt of its usefulness. He possessed personally very considerable knowledge of the subject, and he was prepared distinctly to tell the Government that they were taking upon themselves a very great responsibility if they refused the Amendment now before the Committee. No one had given more consideration to the question, and talked the matter more constantly over with the farmers, than himself; and he was in a position to declare that they were thoroughly alive to the fact that, under this scheme, they would be called upon to provide not only a great portion of the purchase money, but a larger sum in the shape of annual instalments than they were now paying by way of rent. Unless the Bill was amended in the way the Irish Members desired, it would be found that scarcely three tenants would avail themselves of it; whereas, if a slight extension of the time for repayment was given, five would take advantage of it. He did not agree with what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) said about the amount of the purchase money being increased. That would not be so, but the number of cases in which the purchase would be made would be enormously increased. If it was necessary, it would be easy to give the Commissioners some discretion as to the amount of money they would advance. They would not allow the landlord to sell at an exorbitant price, because that would be a fraud; therefore, it was idle to suggest any difficulty of that kind would arise if they extended the period within which the instalments were to be paid. Hitherto he had not taken up the time of the Committee during the progress of the Bill, but, on the present occasion, he felt that he could not remain silent; and he wished to warn the Government in the most solemn way that the rejection of this Amendment would put in great peril the success of this most important part of the Bill. He certainly hoped that the Prime Minister would seriously consider the question before he rejected what was really the most important Amendment which had yet been moved.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he could not, as everyone knew, share the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in regard to the future effects of this part of the Bill. On the contrary, for his own part, he should be agreeably surprised if the clauses which related to the acquisition of land did not turn out in the long run to be clauses to pauperize Ireland. He quite recognized the force of the observations which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen); but if they were to embark in this scheme, they ought, at all events, to do all they could to give it a fair trial.

Judging from all he had heard, if they did not extend the time over which the repayments were to be made, he thought they would be throwing away the money they proposed to advance altogether. There was much valuable advice contained in the Report of the Sub-Commissioners, which had only just been laid on the Table of the House of Commons. In passing, he would express his astonishment at the absence of that Report for so long a time. He observed yesterday that something passed upon the subject, and the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland said that some inquiries ought to have been made of the Richmond Commission, in order to account for the absence of the Report. Now, the fact was that the Report was sent in by the Richmond Commission in the month of January last, and its receipt was acknowledged by the Secretary of State for the Home Department; but from that time to this, for some reason or other, whether it was neglect or inadvertence he did not know, it had been withheld by the Government until quite a recent period. He certainly thought it was desirable that the Committee should have some explanation upon the point from the Government. And now what were the recommendations contained in that Report? Most of it was unfavourable to these purchase clauses altogether; but the Commissioners pressed upon Parliament that if the scheme was to be successful at all, the instalments ought to be extended over a longer period than 35 years. The Commission referred to the case of a man with a holding of 14 acres. They described the condition of that holding, and said that the state of affairs was not very favourable. The Report then went on to say that if the tenant, in addition to his rent, had to meet the instalments for the repayment of borrowed money, he would be very hardly pressed; and if the Government desired to give the system of creating a peasant proprietary a fair trial, the repayments of the instalments must be extended over a larger number of years, so that the actual payment each year would not be much more than the present rent. Personally, he saw the evils of the old system, and he should not have ventured to propose such a scheme as that at all. But what he was afraid of was that if the period for the repayment of the instalments was not extended, they would run the risk of throwing away the money altogether. The Commissioners pointed out that, whatever might be the condition of tenants elsewhere, the indiscriminate sale of holdings on such terms and conditions as those offered by the Commissioners of the Irish Church Temporalities had not done much towards creating a satisfactory class of peasant proprietors. The terms offered by the Church Commissioners differed in no material respect from the terms offered in the present Bill. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Except in regard to interest.] The Sub-Commissioners were, therefore, of opinion that if the present scheme was worth anything at all—and they were not inclined, from what they knew and had seen, to believe that it was—the period for the repayment of the advances must be considerably extended. Under these circumstances, he should feel inclined to support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), if the hon. and learned Member went to a division, and principally for this reason—that he (Mr. Chaplin) was afraid that if some extension of time were not given they would run great risks of the money advanced being thrown away altogether.

MR. DAWSON begged altogether, on the part of the Irish people, in whose interests the measure was being proposed, to repudiate the idea, often put forward, that this proposed advance was an act of liberality, and a gift on the part of the British people to the Irish nation. It was nothing of the kind. In whatever way the money might be employed by the Irish people, the interest of the Imperial Exchequer was amply secured, and the whole of the advance would be repaid. He, therefore, entirely repudiated the idea that the English taxpayers were to put their hands into their pockets for the purpose of granting a charitable dole to the people of Ireland. The proposal of the Government was that the tenants should repay the advances at 5 per cent, under conditions that would be most expensive to them, nor would they receive an advance of the entire sum necessary for the purchase, but only three-fourths. The tenant would be left to his ingenuity to raise the rest, and the amount of the tax imposed upon him by way of repayment would be most severe. The right hon. Gentleman asked the Committee to look at other cases. They had been supplied to him ad nauseam in the course of the debate; but he would quote another. Some time ago he had asked the Prime Minister to issue a small Commission, in order to enlighten the people of this country and hon. Members of that House as to the method in which similar questions were dealt with by other Governments. In Germany, if a tenant wished to become an owner, he could borrow the purchase money and repay it with interest. He asked the attention of the Committee to the figures, because they were more eloquent than any speech. The facts which he was referring to were published in a work upon Land Tenure by the Cobden Club. When a tenant in Germany desired to purchase in this manner, the repayment was spread over 45-12ths, or 56-12ths, according to the period at which he elected to free the holding from encumbrance. The tenant was offered 56-12ths at 5 per cent, and yet, in this case, the Government were only proposing to give a good tenant 35 years. The case he referred to in Germany was a parallel case; but a larger extension of time was granted to the tenant in that country, although the credit and the financial position of Germany was not at this moment one-half so great as that of Great Britain. He thought that afforded a complete answer to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman that he could not, with safety to his financial conscience, extend the period proposed by the clause. Personally, he (Mr. Dawson) did not think that the financial conscience of the right hon. Gentleman, or his financial capacity—which could not be over-estimated—had anything to do with the question. But, on the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman displayed too great a willingness to give in to the idea that the English taxpayer was always to be the benevolent benefactor of the Irish nation.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, the Irish tenants had quite enough to do to pay their present rent, and he was sure they would not see the justice of paying a large sum in addition, in order that they might purchase their holdings for the benefit of their sons and their grandsons. If a man had to repay the purchase money in the course of 35 years, he would have to pay the whole of it himself; whereas, if it was extended over 52 years, his sons and his grandsons would have to contribute. He thought the Amendment was a reasonable one, and he would support it by his vote.

MR. BIGGAR (who rose amid cries of "Divide!") said, the subject was too important a one to be decided in an off-hand manner; and he therefore wished to reply to some of the arguments which had been adduced, and to point out one or two considerations in the case which had not yet been placed before the Committee. It was alleged that the persons who bought up their holdings ought to make some effort on their own behalf; but the Government ought to know that the 25 per cent of the purchase money which the tenant had to pay before he could obtain an advance was a very heavy item for the tenant to raise, either from his own resources or by means of borrowed money. It was very desirable that the terms on which the Government lent the money should not be too onerous. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) strongly deprecated lending the money by the State for a very long term. In this case the length of time would depend very much on the circumstances of the case. If the State lent money on landed security, and only lent 75 per cent of the entire value of the holding, and charged 5 per cent for interest, he thought they ought to be prepared to extend the period of repayment over a considerable number of years. It certainly appeared to him that the terms on which the Government lent money to school boards and other public bodies, and on the security of buildings in towns, were much more liberal than those upon which they proposed to make those advances to the tenant farmers of Ireland. He believed that money lent on the security of land possessed a security immeasurably higher than money lent on buildings of such a fanciful nature as the present school board houses. Therefore, he thought that the proposition of the Government was altogether untenable. The object of the Government appeared to be to pass a Bill through Parliament which would look exceedingly well upon paper; but if it was to be passed in its present shape, he was satisfied it would be found thoroughly unpractical when they came to bring it into working order. He trusted that they would withdraw their present proposition, and frame a clause that would not only be workable, but offer a fair inducement to the Irish people to avail themselves of it. If the Government placed the terms of the advances too high, they might depend upon it that the Irish farmers would not take advantage of the provisions of the Bill. Upon all these reasons, he appealed to the Government to reconsider the question, and see whether or not they could not adopt some reasonable and bond fide Amendment.

MR. BYRNE (who rose amid loud cries of "Divide!") said, he regarded the question as one of very great importance, and as likely to unsettle all the good that might otherwise be done by the Bill. It was believed when the Government introduced the Bill that their intention of allowing the tenant farmers to become peasant proprietors was a bond fide intention, and that they would offer the tenants substantial advantages for the purpose of enabling them to purchase their holdings; but, having drawn the line at an advance of three-fourths of the purchase money, it was unfair not only to restrict the amount of the advance, but also to limit the period for the repayment to 35 years. The principle of buying property in that way was not a new one; but it had been solved in England by the working men themselves, who had established societies for the purpose of purchasing freehold property, and had successfully carried out their operations in Rochdale, Birmingham, Bradford, Liverpool, and all over England; but hitherto these freeholds had been purchased for a political purpose, in order to confer the right of citizenship and the possession of votes upon the purchaser.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Progress resumed.

Clause 22 (Terms of repayment of advances made by Commission).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 14, line 36, to leave out the words "for thirty-five years of five pounds," in order to insert the words "which shall redeem both principal and interest within any period not exceeding fifty-two years at the discretion of the Land Commission, such annuity to be calculated at a rate which shall secure to the Land Commission interest at the rate of three pounds ten shillings per annum,—(Mr. Charles Russell,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'for thirty-five years' stand part of the Clause."

MR. BYRNE said, that in asking the Committee to approve of and adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Charles Russell), he desired to point out that it was of vast importance to the tenants of Ireland, and not only to them, but to the people of England and to Her Majesty's Government in preserving law and order, and in establishing a proper Government in Ireland. He would venture to say that if the clause was amended by the extension of time suggested, it would be a stronger weapon in the hands of the Chief Secretary than all the police and all the soldiers and bayonets in that unfortunate country. They had heard from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House that in discussing this Bill they ought not to be too critical as to the number of years given for payment, as by so doing they would be looking a gift horse in the mouth. This Bill, as it stood, however, was not a gift horse. It was a white elephant, and he was not disposed to be very thankful for it. A horse he could manage, but an elephant he was not so sure of being able to take in hand. If this clause was to be operative, if it was to be used and not to be a dead letter like other clauses in previous Acts of Parliament, the Committee should see that it was possible to work it as it was, or as it was to be amended. It would not be sufficient for the tenants to get the advances if they did not, in the first place, get the land at a fair price. They must extend the time for repayment over such a period that it would be possible for the farmer to pay the periodical instalments to the Company or Association, or whoever had advanced the remaining 25 per cent to him. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had looked upon this question more as a Money Vote, and as a matter affecting the National Exchequer, than as a question of Liberal policy or of statesmanship. In this matter, however, there was nothing specially for the opinion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, or, indeed, for the opinion of any official. They were discussing the question of a broad and proper policy for the Government of this or any other country to act on. It was admitted by the Prime Minister that the question of security did not arise, or that it was ample. And then it had been said that the matter should be looked at from a commercial point of view. He, however, was of opinion that it should not be looked at from a commercial point of view. The state of things in Ireland at the present time was such that most Governments would regret, if they were not actually ashamed of it. Ireland being a part of what was called the United Kingdom, it was entitled, if not to liberality, at all events to justice and fair play. It was admitted by right hon. Gentlemen now on the Government Benches that in the past Ireland had not had justice. The condition of things which had prevailed in that country was the cause of the Committee being now engaged on this Bill. It was the cause of the Bill being now before the House, because, without some such measure of justice being meted out to Ireland, it was very doubtful what the results would be. They had also the authority of the Prime Minister for saying that if the Bill did not pass this year, the next time it was introduced it would be a stronger measure, more in favour of the tenants and less in favour of the landlords. This was not a question between the English and Irish people, but it was a question on which the English Government had arrived at that stage when they found it necessary to say—"We must, in justice to the people of Ireland, give them some instalment of that which has so long been their due." They had arrived at that part of the Bill in which they had to say by what means that instalment of justice should be given. Well, the Government in the clause that had been passed offered a certain advance to assist the tenants to buy their freehold, and the Committee had now come to the clause which specified the terms on which that assistance should be given. The Government proposed that the repayment of capital and interest should cover 35 years, and the Amendment was to the effect that that time should be extended to 52 years; and it was stated that it would be uncommercial and unbusiness-like to look for a period beyond that. He was very happy to hear from a previous speaker that this was a time when finance was easy and when funds could be easily raised at 3 per cent; and he, therefore, could not see why the extension asked for could not be granted. It had been said that other countries had advanced money for longer periods and, in some cases, at lower rates of interest. There was one country which had not been mentioned—namely, Belgium. He would remind the Committee of this—that in the case of house property in the city of Brussels, the Government had advanced money for the purpose of acquiring house property for as long a period as 66 years. If that had been done merely for the purpose of assisting the citizens of Brussels to ornament the city, and make it something like the handsome city of Paris, surely Her Majesty's Government would be justified in extending the period of the advances to the Irish tenants from 31 to 52 years. In doing that they would not be going beyond precedent; and, over and above the red-tape view of the matter taken by Finance Ministers, there was the question of settling the disturbed state of Ireland, and assisting the Irish people at no cost whatever to England. They were not giving this money away. They were only lending on what was called good, ample, and sufficient security; and that being so—as the money was absolutely certain to be repaid—there was sufficient reason why they should extend the time for repayment. They ought, also, to keep this in view—that every year's and half-year's instalment would make the security better, and that there was scarcely any possibility of having to face, under any circumstances, a bad debt. He might refer to several instances in this country where the line was not drawn at lending three-fourths of the purchase money. In all the great towns of England, if an artizan wanted to buy his house, he could always get the necessary sum advanced—especially in Manchester, where there were some very sharp people living, and where seven-eighths could be obtained. In this way a man could easily acquire a stake in the country. Nothing made a man a greater admirer of law and order than to hold property, and to have a stake in the country; and, in order that these happy results might be brought about in Ireland, he asked the Prime Minister and the Government to accept the Amendment and increase the period over which these repayments could be made. If they did, he hoped the Prime Minister would live for many years to see the good results of his handiwork.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE said, the people of the West of Ireland suffered a great deal more from bad harvests than did the people in other parts of the country, and they would be much less able to pay in 35 years than any of their more favoured countrymen. Seeing that the people of Ireland had set their hearts so much on having peasant proprietors, the Government should not neglect their wishes.

MR. MACLIVER said, the hon. Member for Wexford County (Mr. Byrne) deprecated this question being treated as a commercial one. It was, however, entirely a commercial question. It was a question of money. It had been suggested that the Government might issue paper, and need not advance money; but that was a complete fallacy, because, if paper were to be issued, it must surely be represented by something behind it. And then, again, the Government could not be expected to advance money for an indefinite period. The system of the Government advancing money at all in this way was something totally unusual in their experience in this country. What would be thought of an English trader if he went to the Government and said he could not take certain premises unless the Government advanced him 75 per cent? It would be delusive, if not ruinous, to do such a thing; and he was surprised that any Irish Members who had any commercial experience, or knew anything at all about monetary affairs, could come to that House and claim as they did, not merely this 75 per cent, but a great deal more—an extension of time for repayment which would be altogether out of place in any private business.

[Twenty-third Night.]

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD doubted if hon. Members opposite had seen the full bearing of the proposal they were advocating. It would certainly be to the interest of the landlords if the period for repayment of these loans were prolonged to 50 years. There could not be a shadow of a doubt that if the Amendment proposed by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) were adopted by the Committee, every tenant in Ireland who set out to purchase his estate would have to give more for it than he would under other circumstances, because it would be represented that payment would be spread over 50 years instead of 35, and, therefore, that he could afford to give more for the property. He (Mr. Arnold) supported the clause, and thought that if the Committee had a close and economic regard, not only for the interests of the State, but for the interests of the tenants, they would accept the proposal of the Government. When the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Byrne) had spoken of what the towns had done in this matter, and when he mentioned the great district from which he (Mr. Arnold) came, he could not but remember that at the time when Lancashire was so sorely and deeply distressed, an Act was passed allowing loans to be granted, in which it was stipulated that these advances were to be repaid within 30 years. He should support the proposal of the Government.

MR. LEAMY said, it had been stated that this was purely a commercial question. He could not help thinking it was a question of the pacification of Ireland. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members said "No!" but those Liberals who had told them that they had been doing their best for Ireland for many years past ought to know that the great cause of the present discontent in Ireland was the land system. Why did they press the Amendment on Her Majesty's Government? It was because they believed that the solution of the Land Question would be found in the substitution of occupying ownership for the present system, and that, by passing the Amendment, they would facilitate the creation of that system of occupying ownership. The Government had spent a great deal of time and trouble over this Bill; and he was willing to admit, from a legal point of view, that its provisions effected a great revolution in the law of real property in Ireland. But could it be denied that before they had proceeded to effect this revolution by their Bill a social revolution had already been effected in Ireland—that the land system had been broken down by the people. The Government were now merely attempting to patch it up by a change which, if made 10 years ago, would probably have settled the Land Question. It had been said that they must consider the question of the British taxpayer. He wondered whether they considered the interests of the British taxpayer when they plunged into and spent millions upon foreign wars? Were they consulting the interests of the British taxpayer when they kept 40,000 armed men in Ireland to keep down a defenceless and disarmed people? ["Question!"] This was the Question. They knew that if they did not settle the Land Question effectually, they never could withdraw their troops from Ireland. If they had to keep 40,000 armed men in Ireland for years, then the British taxpayer would suffer immensely. The only way for them to settle this matter was by extending the provisions of this part of the Bill; and before 12 months had passed he feared the Government would be of the same opinion. The best way to convince men that you were right was to let them see that they were wrong; therefore, he was content to see the Bill pass in its present form. When they saw litigation taking place in Ireland of a character never known before, when they saw that every man whose rent was raised was dissatisfied, and every man whose rent was lowered was dissatisfied, and when they saw, also, that all the landlords were dissatisfied, they would see the mistake they were now committing. There was one part of this Bill which had met with a good reception from all classes of Land Reformers—namely, the part before the Committee, taken in connection with the Amendment proposed. When the Government saw that all Irish Members of different politics were in favour of the Amendment, why did they not support it? It was the fashion to say—"Oh, you Irish Members are not united; if you were united, and came with a fair and reasonable proposition, it would be accepted." Well, they came now with a fair and reasonable proposition. Reference had been made to the Report of the Assistant Commissioners, and it had been pointed out that the sales which had been held under the Irish Church Act had not, in all cases, been to the benefit of the tenants. Let them take two cases, and hon. Gentlemen would see why these purchases had not been to the benefit of the tenants. In one case a woman had saved £20 before the purchase. She was the tenant of six acres, on which she resided, and she used to hire four other acres. When she obtained these 10 acres of land from the Commissioners, she had to get indentures of conveyance, and she had to pay her £20 to a local attorney for costs. She was compelled to borrow £36, and on that she had to pay 25 per cent, and she had to raise £14 on a loan at a high rate of interest. She regretted very much that she ever purchased; and hon. Members would not wonder at it. The charge upon this woman, for interest and capital, had been more than double the old rent, and, in addition to that, she had had to pay all the rates. The Irish Members asked the Government to extend the period of payment, to lower the rate of interest, and to allow these poor people, if possible, to become purchasers of their holdings at no greater annual cost than the rent which they had been paying. If these people had been maintaining themselves on their holdings at a certain annual rent for the last 30 years, they had every reason to believe that they would be able to maintain themselves for 50 years at the same rent. Every day they were feeling more and more convinced that the time was coming when they would be owners of the land, and they would, therefore, have the stimulus to work which came from ownership of the soil. They were told that the prosperity of the State was increasing; but the Irish tenant had not improved his position—and why? It was because of the fear he had always had of being turned out of his holding. He would ask the Prime Minister whether he thought the system of occupying-ownership was good for Ireland? If he did, it was fair to ask him why he did not increase the facilities for bringing it about? The right hon. Gentleman mistook the character of the Irish people, if he believed that when one-third could, on easy terms, become the owners of their property, the other two-thirds would remain satisfied and contented. The Government had now a splendid opportunity for putting an end to this agrarian agitation—an agitation which had come up from time to time for centuries, sometimes under a social and sometimes under a political phase. The right hon. Gentleman had his chance now. He had the whole of the great Liberal Party at his back; the landlords and tenants in Ireland agreed in the provisions of the Bill. Would the right hon. Gentleman accept the Amendment, which would, by lessening the amount the tenants would have yearly to pay, considerably lighten their burdens, and enable them to look forward to becoming the owners of their own farms?

MR. BARRY said, the Amendment was the most important which had been submitted to the Committee, and he was sure that if it were adopted it would greatly enhance the value of the Bill in the eyes of the Irish people. This was the one part of the Bill which had raised something like hope and confidence in the Irish people; but he was greatly afraid that that hope and confidence would be seriously diminished if the Amendment were not accepted. In the face of the almost unanimous opinion of the Irish Members—in the face of the strong expressions of opinion they had heard in favour of the Amendment from both sides of the Committee—it was a great mistake for Her Majesty's Government to offer such a stubborn resistance to the proposal. The Prime Minister should remember some of the circumstances of the passing of the Bill of 1870. The Government of that day might have heard some very strong expressions of opinion from the Irish Members, but they turned a deaf ear to them—they successfully resisted the appeal made to them—and what was the result? Why, it was this—that the Bill which had been looked forward to for so many years was nothing but a fiasco and a failure. The only argument offered from the Treasury Bench against this Amendment was that its adoption would be an outrage upon the commercial conscience; but that seemed to him an insufficient reason to advance. If it were an outrage on the financial conscience, from whence did the pressure come? The risk was not increased, the security to the State would not be in any way diminished. They were not asking for a grant from the Consolidated Fund, but only that the time of payment should be extended from 35 to 52 years. This would be a great boon to the Irish people, and no less to the Government; and, looking at the great uncertainty which attended the agricultural future, not knowing what would be the effect in the next few years of foreign competition, in the interest of the public it should be the policy of the Government to render the burden on the shoulders of the Irish tenantry as light as possible. He sincerely hoped Her Majesty's Government would reconsider this matter. He had been in correspondence with many individuals of that class of farmers who were likely to become purchasers under the Bill, and it was their unanimous opinion that if the time of payment could be slightly extended the advantage to their position would be very great—very much wider and more general. There was another important reason to be advanced in support of the Amendment—namely, that it would go a long way towards meeting English opinion on the matter of sub-division. By its adoption sub-division would be prevented for a much longer period than would otherwise be the case. He did not himself think there was much fear that in many cases the full 52 years would be taken advantage of. His opinion was that the time of repayment would be considerably shortened by the adoption of the Amendment. The effort that would be made by the Irish tenantry to secure a quarter of the purchase money would be such a severe strain on their resources that they would be left extremely bare, and with little or no capital to commence those improvements which were necessary and which they would be anxious to make after purchasing their holdings. If the term were extended it would enable them to accumulate capital, and they would be able in a few years, by the profits on their investments, to increase their instalments and to pay off the debt in a shorter period. He knew how intense was the feeling in Ireland on this subject; and he earnestly hoped the Government would reconsider their decision, and that the right hon. Gentleman would not so stubbornly refuse to concede what was demanded.

Mr. Barry

MR. GREGORY said, it must be a matter of mortification to Her Majesty's Government to see the spirit in which this proposal had been, he could not say received, but met by some hon. Members; and he could not help thinking that the Government, in this matter, had gone a long way towards the pacification of Ireland. It appeared to him that they had gone to the very utmost limit to which they were justified in going, or to which they could expect to carry the Committee. They were doing that which no public Company and no individual in the country would do—namely, proposing to advance, at a very low rate of interest, three-fourths of the value of any holding that a tenant might choose to purchase. He considered that the State in that respect was in the position of a trustee for the taxpayers, and that they were bound to observe those rules which a prudent trustee would observe in a transaction of this kind; and he ventured to say that no trustee would be justified, even on the very best security, in carrying advances further than the Government now proposed to do. The Government had not only to consider this, but they had to consider what their position would be in making these advances. It was necessary, and they were perfectly justified in requiring, that the party to whom they made this advance should afford some security for the propriety of that advance by a contribution on his part of a certain amount. Unless they had that guarantee they might be wasting public money by making advances to those who were totally unfit to receive them. As he had said, the Government were engaged at this moment in operations that no private individual in the country would undertake, and they must consider not only that, but what their position would be in the future when they had to require the repayment of these advances. They would be in the position of mortgagees of property, and not only mortgagees in an ordinary sense, but mortgagees of tenantry who were impoverished, and who would have large claims upon their consideration when the instalments were in arrear through agricultural depression and other causes. They might find great difficulty in enforcing payment, and might be met by continual claims on their compassion outside the precincts of the House as well as within. All these things should be present before the Government. Her Majesty's Ministers had before them the Report of Messrs Baldwin and Robertson with regard to the advances made by the Church Temporalities Commissioners. The Government must have had those advances in view when they contemplated the operations of this Bill. It was, therefore, not only that they were going to the fullest extent that they could go; but they had before them circumstances that must throw grave doubts upon the success of the operation, even to the extent they now proposed to go. For his own part, he did not think the Government should carry the matter one step farther than they now proposed to do. They had given the tenant every opportunity of purchasing his holding which a Government ought to afford, and beyond that they would not be justified in going.

MR. LAING said, he concurred in the view that had been expressed that it was the duty of the Committee to join the Government in resisting assaults upon the Exchequer, in order to assist agricultural operations in Ireland. He hoped the Government would resist every advance beyond the limit of 75 per cent; and he could not disguise from himself that even going to that length they had made a great stretch of their financial conscience. It was idle to deny that they were advancing further than any private individual would go at this moment in regard to landed property, and it was to be justified not on considerations of financial policy, but on general considerations. But, having taken that step, he did not think the question of whether the sinking fund would best extinguish the debt in 35 or 52 years was an important one, or one involving any financial difficulty. There must be a risk in any case, and he did not think it would be increased by adopting the longer in place of the shorter period. The risk would occur in the first few years. The first three or four years would be the critical period. The danger he feared with regard to these advances was that supposing a general repayment was fixed according to the scale on which rent was paid in Ireland, and if, soon after that was done, they had a repetition of the extremely bad seasons they had lately experienced, or an increase in American competition, the Irish tenants would fall into the same plight that, he believed, the majority of English tenants had fallen into. Under the quick sinking fund, no doubt, as much would be paid up in four years as would be paid up in five years under the slow sinking fund; but, on the other hand, he thought the slow sinking fund would be more likely to enable them successfully to get over the critical period than the other. If he were, as a private individual, making the advance, he was by no means sure that he should not prefer the longer sinking fund to the shorter. With regard to the advances made to private Companies or to Corporations in England and Scotland, he did not think the case was analogous to that under discussion. The advances were made on local considerations, and not on considerations of public policy. As a matter of public policy, these advances were rather discouraged than otherwise; but, in the case of the tenants of Ireland, it was right to assume that for purposes of public policy it would be wise to encourage individuals to avail themselves of these advances. The question was one of general policy; and, from that point of view, he did not think there was much to choose between the two proposals. If the Government could see their way to meeting the wishes of the Irish Representatives, he, for one, should be very glad of it; but, on the other hand, he must say that if, after due consideration, they thought it necessary to stand on the clause, and take it to a division, he should certainly vote for them, for the reason that, like the country generally, he owed a deep debt of gratitude to the Government for having brought in the Bill, and for the manner in which they had conducted it. He could not help feeling, as a practical man, that the best way to pass the Bill was to give up their own crotchets and particular views, and to give the Government, on these contested questions, as large a majority as possible, in order that difficulties might be avoided in "another place." He would advise hon. Members opposite not to press this Amendment to a division, because they must know that they could not carry it, and that great difficulties would be placed in the way of its re-consideration by the Government. No doubt, if between this and the Report the Government re-considered the matter and found they could meet the wishes of the Irish Members, they would do so.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, that, as he was responsible for the Amendment, he would say a word as to the suggestion of the hon. Member who had just sat down (Mr. Laing). He (Mr. C. Russell) very much regretted that a division had not been taken on the Amendment before this. The division should have taken place at the Morning Sitting; but he was not responsible for what had occurred. He would say at once, in answer to the hon. Member (Mr. Laing), that if the Prime Minister were to hold out any reasonable expectation that the not pressing of the proposal might meet with a favourable result—he did not ask for a definite pledge with regard to its acceptance—as far as it rested with himself he should not press the Amendment to a division. But if the Prime Minister had—to use an expression more than once adopted during these discussions—put his foot down, then he failed entirely to see what he had to gain by not pressing the Amendment. Before he sat down he must say that he utterly and entirely repudiated the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen), and the suggestion which had come from the other side, that this was an attempt on the part of the Irish Members to make an attack upon the Consolidated Fund. Hon. Members who said that entirely misunderstood the position of this question. The question of the amount of advance which was to be made by the Land Commission out of the Consolidated Fund was already settled, was a thing past and gone, and he did not hesitate to say yesterday—at the risk of some misconstruction on the part of some hon. Members in the House, and on the part of many more people out of it—that he did not and could not support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan), who desired to give discretion to the Land Commission to advance the whole, and moved to render it compulsory upon the Land Commission to advance four-fifths. He did not wish to see the growth of a peasant proprietary artificially forced on those who were not willing to make efforts to secure ownership. But what he (Mr. C. Russell) had advocated was that the Land Commission should have the power of lending up to four-fifths and no more. His Amendment had been spoken of as one which would render it compulsory on the Land Commission to allow 52 years for repayment; but that was an entire mistake. All that was desired was, in the appropriate language of the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw), that there should be, in this respect, a reasonable elasticity in the Bill. In the measure, 35 years was laid down, and all that they proposed was that there should be a proper elasticity between 35 and 52 years. He could not understand why the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister should have such an intensity of feeling as he had several times manifested on this question, when the sum and substance of the whole matter was simply to give the Land Commissioners the power, if they chose in a proper case to exercise it, to extend the period for repayment. He (Mr. C. Russell) was extremely pained to hear the Prime Minister, during the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite, applaud the suggestion that he was extremely mortified at the course taken on this Amendment. He (Mr. C. Russell) should be extremely sorry to be a party in that House to giving mortification to the right hon. Gentleman, unless compelled by a sense of duty to do so; but the right hon. Gentleman would forgive him for saying there was not the slightest cause for pain or mortification. No one had said more emphatically than he (Mr. C. Russell) had himself, over and over again, that this was a Bill of a great statesman. He had said it out of the House, and he had said it in the House, and he should never cease to think so. But surely the Prime Minister was too magnanimous to be mortified at their strenuous efforts to make this Bill, upon which his (the Prime Minister's) fame would so materially rest in the future, effective for the objects for which he sought to pass it. He might be wrong in the Amendment, and he should be sorry pertinaciously to set up his judgment against the right hon. Gentleman's; but each man must act to the best of his belief. The opinion he (Mr. C. Russell) had formed, from communications made to him from many and different quarters, was, as had been already observed, that the really trying time of the operation of this Bill would be the earlier years; and, therefore, it was desirable that the tenants should not be denuded of every penny they had in the world in the first two or three years after the purchase, they should be left some small capital to work upon. The tenantry, when they acquired possession of the land, should be in a position to develop their holdings with advantage to themselves and to the State. He begged again to repeat that this was not a question of putting their hands any deeper into the pockets of the Consolidated Fund.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) has expressed the pain he felt at having to differ so widely from my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government upon this matter. I may say that I feel the same pain that I have to differ on the subject of this Amendment with the hon. and learned Gentleman, who knows a great deal about Ireland, and has not only written very ably about it, but has in this House rendered much assistance in carrying through many portions of this Bill. Therefore, he will understand that I do not rise immediately after him for the purpose of quarrelling with what he has said, or the temper he has shown in the observations he has made. And when I say temper, I mean the moderate and proper temper he has shown. It seems to me that the discussion of the question before us is very much like that which we had yesterday. The Government proposed £75, and Members from Ireland were, I think, unanimous in wishing that the advance should be £80 in the £100. Some who were in favour of the whole £100 being advanced by the Government moved an Amendment for the larger sum. The question, as it presents itself to my mind, and as I think it would if I were not an occupant of this Bench, is this—looking at it as a whole, 75 per cent and 35 years for repayment appears to be a broad, generous, and reasonable offer. It cannot be an unreasonable proposition. I think it might be accepted almost as unanimously by the Irish Members as it has been by some, and by Members who are not from Ireland. I hold it, therefore, to be a reasonable and great proposal, and one which I think, were I an Irish Member or an English Member sitting upon any other Bench, and looking to the measure as a whole, I should be willing to support the Government in endeavouring to carry through Committee. As I said yesterday, I have as strong a feeling in favour of this portion of the Bill as any Member of this House can possibly have, and I object to the Amendment as a friend of the policy of creating proprietary occupiers in Ireland. I object to it simply on that ground. If I did not care so much about it, if it were not a matter of interest to me, I should feel less on this question than I do at this moment. One thing is certain. If you adopt 52 years, you postpone for every man who becomes a buyer the time when he becomes entirely the owner of his property, and I think in that way you diminish in some degree the interest that he feels in his holding, and I am afraid you will thus diminish—and that was the argument used by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland—the stimulus you wish to give the cultivator—and which is nowhere more required than in Ireland—to do his very utmost to redeem himself and the land from the burden which for so many years must rest upon him. I think one of the great misfortunes of Ireland, partly owing to the system of land tenure, and partly to long habit, is that there is great slovenliness in cultivation. I say nothing as to the desire of the Irish people to save money, because I believe they carry their thrift absolutely to penuriousness, and make more sacrifices to save than probably any other class of persons in the Three Kingdoms. But, owing to the state of things in the country, there is great slovenliness of cultivation, and, therefore, the stimulus ought to be the greater. Another thing presents itself to my mind. If you were to agree to advance the whole of the amount, and then fix a long period for repayment, you would have every tenant in Ireland immediately anxious to become the purchaser of his farm. Hon. Gentlemen would say it would be a very good thing if all the tenants were in possession of their farms. I do not deny that at all in bulk; but I say there are a great number of tenants to whom, at present, I think it would be no great blessing to be in the position of owners. I have no wish to drive out landed proprietors from Ireland. I should like to see estates in Ireland from £10 up to £10,000, so long as land is free, and not held by the force of law. Then let great, and middle size, and small estates exist, as they naturally would exist, throughout the country. Any proposal for driving out proprietors from Ireland is one which I should say was not warranted by a sense of justice, or a real knowledge of what is best for a population. Suppose you gave a larger advance, or a longer period for repayment, you would, in my opinion, urge beyond what is reasonable and useful, the tenants of Ireland to buy their farms on any terms, and I believe the result would be that there would be, as there always is—I am not blaming the Irish tenants for it, for probably all men would do the same—there would be a rash rushing forward to obtain possession of farms at almost any price, and I believe that would tend very much to increase unduly the price of land in Ireland. Perhaps you might give the proprietors whom you get rid of—and that might be a consolation to Gentlemen opposite—a larger price than they would otherwise get; but I believe the ultimate result would be that the tenantry would lose as much on the one side as they would gain on the other. The hon. and learned Member for Dundalk, following the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw), spoke of elasticity in regard to this matter. Why should not the Commission have power to do as they liked for the 52 years? Elasticity must act within 52 years, and by the present Bill within 35 years. But if you put 52 years in the Bill, the very same thing would happen as with 35 years. The 52 years would become the rule in the one case, and the 35 years would become the rule under this Bill. We know there are persons—I hope there are many such persons—who would not require 35 years; who would be anxious to pay off their liability much within that time; and, in so far as the action of the Commission went, I believe that if the Amendment were carried it would be laying down a rule from which the Commission could not in any considerable degree, if at all, swerve, and the 52 years would be a common line with regard to this question. That, I think, answers the argument upon which the hon. and learned Gentleman laid some stress. The fact is, there never was a Commission or a Court established, I believe, by any sane assembly that had more power given to it, and in which there was more elasticity, than there will be in regard to this Court. When you come to a question of money, and it has to be advanced or repaid, it appears to be absolutely necessary and wise to fix the point beyond which the Commission shall not go. If you do not fix upon such a point, we know not where they will go; but if you fix the point at 52 years, I have not the smallest doubt that that period will become the rule throughout the whole of the transactions under this Bill. I said I was as much interested as any living man in the success of this measure; but my opinion is that the success of the measure will be more consulted by adopting the line of 35 years than the line of 52. I do not wish to see a great rush of the tenantry of Ireland to get all their farms under this Bill. I would rather see it work steadily, beginning with a moderate number of applications on two or three considerable estates in the first few years, and increasing as experience followed with the growth of the whole scheme; but I believe it is possible you might invite or induce so many tenants to buy that in case there should be any considerable fall in the value of land, and in rents a corresponding fall, and a fall in the price of products in the next few years, you might have hundreds, and possibly thousands, of tenants who, having become possessed of their farms under this Bill, found themselves in great difficulty, and would then turn upon Parliament and the Government and say we had invited them and urged them to a course which had produced great embarrassment, and possibly ruin, to many of them. That is one very strong reason we have for adhering to the 35 years' rule. I am sure that in great transactions like these it is far better to proceed steadily, and within lines which you feel you understand, than to go beyond them and run the risks we think we might if we were to invite tenants, with little consideration and much recklessness, to endeavour to become the owners of their farms. These are the reasons which make me believe—and not because the 35 years' limit is in the Bill, for I held this opinion before the Bill was framed, and which I should hold now if I sat on any other Bench—these are the reasons why I am satisfied, profoundly anxious as I am that this Bill, and this particular part of it, should become a great success in future years, we shall do wiser by taking the Bill as it stands than by taking the Amendment offered by my hon. and learned Friend.

MR. M'COAN said, he would confess that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Bright) staggered his intention to address the Committee; but there were one or two considerations which he thought would justify him in intruding on the Committee for a few minutes. He felt that the Premier in making the offer of a three-fourth's advance for 35 years had, from his point of view, done a very generous thing for the Irish people, and made a concession for which the Irish Members would be grateful. When, however, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) intervened in the debate, his respect for that right hon. Member's financial conscience was not equally strong. The difference between the consciences of the two right hon. Gentlemen was as wide as the poles asunder. He felt a little "riled"—if the Committee would forgive a homely expression—at the unfriendly spirit in which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Goschen) had spoken of Irish interests. It ill-became the right hon. Gentleman to manifest such a spirit, and his financial conscience should not be so tender. His financial antecedents might have made him less liberal on questions of this kind; but when he assumed a tone of authority, and pronounced strongly against the Irish people, he (Mr. M'Coan) felt it his duty to express his opinion of the right hon. Gentleman's action. Both the Irish people and the Government appeared to be in accord in the feeling that the real solution of the Irish agrarian difficulty was the establishment of a peasant proprietary. The Irish people and the Irish Members had looked forward to this part of the Bill as the one grand cure for the evils of the present land system in Ireland; and they had hoped, when the limit of 35 years was fixed, that that term would be extended, or, failing that, that a lower rate of interest than  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent would be charged, if the whole of the purchase money were not granted. But when the Government put their foot down and adhered to 35 years, they were not carrying the concessions in this Bill very much beyond the Bill of 1870, which was practically a non-success. The main inducement to the Irish tenants to avail themselves of these purchase provisions would be the hope of purchasing at a cheaper rate than their present rents. The existing generation of Irish tenants would not be greatly tempted to go and buy their land at the cost of an increase; but they would be tempted by an extension of the term for repayment, or a reduction in the rate of interest. Unless the tenant was shown that by purchasing his farm he would obtain a practical reduction of his present rate, he would not buy, but would leave his sons or grandsons to do so, and be content to avail himself of the "three F's" clauses. Seeing that the Government would incur no danger, he thought it was not asking an undue concession from the Government to ask the Prime Minister before Report to reconsider the determination to which he had hastily come to-day. If the Premier would make some concession, however small, it would be gratefully regarded by the Irish Members; and in the future stages of the Bill the Prime Minister might, he believed, rely upon their support.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I must say that I think that this discussion is an illustration of the inconvenience which arises from boldly throwing aside all the rules of political economy, and telling us that there are higher motives which ought to guide us in our dealings; but really I do think that the proposal which is now made is one which the House would be very unwise to assent to. We have before us a most liberal proposition on the part of Her Majesty's Government, and I own I think, if it sins at all, it sins on the side of being too liberal. The immediate effect of a proposal of that sort is to suggest demands for something further; and if I rightly understand the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. M'Coan) his contention is that the tenant should pay something less than his present rent, and finally become the owner in fee simple of the land he occupies. These suggestions remind me of the passage in Horace—

"Dum septem donat sestertia, mutua septem Promittit; persuadet uti mercetur agellum."

We are to give certain advantages to the tenant with one hand, and promise him loans with the other, persuading him by all means to be so good as to buy his holding. We are told that his position as a tenant under the Bill will be so excellent that he will need a great deal of persuasion to buy, and we must offer something still sweeter than we have offered him before. If we go on in this way, heaping temptation on temptation to induce the tenant to take our terms, the conclusion one must come to is that we are on a wrong path. For myself, I confess that I do not like the proposals which have been made by the Government. I have endeavoured, as far as I can, to accommodate myself to them; but I am certainly not disposed to go beyond them.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he wished to join in the appeal to Government to re-consider the position they had taken in regard to this Amendment. The Irish Members had been met with a plea that this touched very nearly the financial conscience of the Prime Minister; but that financial conscience of the Prime Minister was not so tender when he was heaping additional financial burdens upon Ireland some years ago. They had found out, from time to time, all through the history of their country, that the consciences of English Ministers, and of the English Government, had stood very much in the way of justice to Ireland. At one time a religious conscience was in the ascendant, and Ireland suffered centuries of persecution. England's political conscience had imposed subjugation on Ireland, and the destruction of Irish liberties.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is going much beyond the Question.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he was using these illustrations to show that the idea of a financial conscience ought not to be allowed to stand in the way of any concession of ordinary justice to Ireland. The commercial conscience of England had resulted in the ruin of the trade of Ireland. What should be the first dictate of the financial conscience? To pay what you owe; but had England paid to Ireland what she owed her? No; neither from the financial point of view, nor, indeed, any other, had she discharged her debt to Ireland, and the Prime Minister had admitted the fact. England owed Ireland hundreds of millions of money; England had pauperized Ireland, and still owed her a very large debt of reparation. England had robbed Ireland by over taxation.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not confining himself to the Question before the Committee, which is whether 35 years shall remain in the clause?

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN, continuing, said, they were told that the Prime Minister had put his foot down; but a well-known American writer had said that no man could go through the world with his foot down. The Prime Minister had put his foot down before now, and had also had to take it up again. There was quite as much honour sometimes in taking a foot up as there was in putting it down; and he thought the present was an occasion when the Prime Minister might very properly, if he had put his foot down, take it up again. It was all very well to speak of smoothing the passage of this Bill; but surely the great object was not to smooth the measure in Parliament, but rather to smooth it for Ireland. The proposal was a reasonable one. It would cost nothing to the English Exchequer; and he urged the Prime Minister, seeing that Irish opinion was so unanimous, and that the proposal was supported by reason and common sense, not to stand upon the financial consideration he had dwelt upon, but to improve the Bill in order to commend it to the Irish people, thereby adding to the chance of its producing the great results desired.

MR. M'COAN proposed, in page 14, line 37, to leave out the word "five," in order to insert "four." The Government, he remarked, had resisted the appeal of the Irish Members to extend the term of 35 years, and they had been justified in that by the division; but he felt that he had just as much faith now as he had before in the friendly desire of the Government to do what was right to the Irish farmers. He would, therefore, urge upon the Prime Minister, as he would not consent to extend the term for the advance, he would consent to a reduction of the interest to be paid on the advance. The proposal would not prejudice in any way the Imperial Exchequer, and he hoped the Prime Minister would therefore be disposed to accede to it.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 37, to leave out the word "five," in order to insert the word "four,"—(Mr. M'Coan,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the word 'five' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE thought the hon. Member could really not be serious in making this proposal, because it was asking the Government to deduct £20 out of every £100 which was to be paid back to the Government. That was a proposition which only required to be stated to be rejected, and he was sure the hon. Gentleman would not press the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not think the proposition was so absurd as the Prime Minister supposed, and thought that the right hon. Gentleman rather overstated the case against the Amendment when he said that the Amendment asked the Exchequer to make a present of 1 per cent to the tenants per annum.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say that; it is one-fifth for the whole of the advance.

MR. PARNELL said, he understood that the State in this country could borrow money at 3 per cent. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Oh, no.] He understood the State could borrow even at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, Consols being above par. If that were so, the Government would be able to pocket  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent per annum from the transactions under this Bill, at the very least. That would be charging the Irish tenant  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent more for money advanced than they would have to pay themselves. When they saw the United States Government funding its National Debt—the old Debt—at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, and looking forward to a time when they would be able to fund it at 3 per cent, it was not unreasonable to suppose that the Government would always be able to borrow at 3 per cent, and for a short time at  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. He would suggest that, as the interest had been calculated at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, in making out the financial payment at 5 per cent, leaving  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent for a sinking fund, 3 per cent interest should be taken, that being the rate at which Government were borrowing money in the open market, and that these holdings should be charged with an annuity of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent over 35 years, instead of 5 per cent; otherwise the Exchequer would make an annual profit of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent on every £100 they advanced.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that what he had stated was a very simple proposition—a much more intelligible plan than any other. But when the Government proposed to obtain 5 per cent for principal and interest for 35 years, 4 per cent was offered them, and that meant deducting 20 per cent of interest and 20 per cent of principal. With regard to the hon. Member's description of the money market, and the power of the Government to borrow, he must say it was exceedingly kind of the hon. Gentleman to instruct them on questions of finance; but he denied that the British Government could borrow at 3 per cent. If they went into the market at the present moment for £20,000,000 at that rate they could not get it. But that was not the question. It was not like the case of £20,000,000 for the emancipation of the slaves, when the Government had to borrow the money at once; for in this case that would have to be done over a series of years, and  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent was the rate at which over a series of years the Government could borrow. But did the hon. Member suppose that all the operations could be conducted, the balances kept, offices maintained, and salaries paid without any addition to the charge? Did he (Mr. Parnell) suppose that if he were turn banker he would be able to lend money at the same rate at which he borrowed? This sort of instruction was a thing no one who had been in a responsible position could accept, and he could not but regret the pertinacity with which these proposals were followed up one after another in a matter where it was impossible for the Government to yield.

MR. SHAW hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, and said, in a case where the Government were making concessions which might amount to a large sum of money spread over many years, it would be impossible for them to lend so close up to the borrowing rate. They must have a margin, and he thought the margin was so small that the Government would not gain anything. At the same time, he hoped the Prime Minister would not think the Irish Members acted unnaturally, for this was a question which had been very prominently before the Irish farmers, and the Irish Members were anxious to see the Bill made as acceptable as possible to the farmers. Still, he hoped his hon. Friend would accept the provision as it stood.

MR. M'COAN suggested, with a view to saving the time of the Committee, that "four and a-half" should be substituted for "four" in his Amendment. He did not, he said, do this in any haggling or bargaining spirit, but with the hope that  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent would supply a sufficient margin for the Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot amend his Amendment in that way. The proposal before the Committee is that the word "five" stand part of the Bill. That is a question which it is possible to withdraw, but not to make an Amendment to.

MR. M'COAN asked permission to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE objected to the withdrawal of the Amendment.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL thought the objection of the Prime Minister to the withdrawal would not do much to promote the progress of the Bill, and said there was no precedent for an hon. Member being refused leave to withdraw an Amendment, not by the Committee, but by the Prime Minister.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not insist upon the Amendment at all, but the time of the Committee was occupied by a multiplication of these proposals; and if this Amendment were withdrawn without the judgment of the House being taken upon it, it might be revived on a subsequent occasion, and further time taken up by discussing it.

MR. E. STANHOPE pointed out that the question was whether "five" should stand part of the clause. The Committee could perfectly well decide upon that, and then "four and a-half" could be proposed.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the Irish Members attached very great importance to the difference between 5 and 4 per cent, and suggested that the Government might make up the difference by means of the Church Surplus Fund.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY wished to remind the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that whatever the rate upon which a country might borrow money at a particular moment, its credit depended upon whether there was peace within its borders. The reason why the United States could borrow at a reduced rate was that they had composed their differences, and become one united nation. The hon. Gentleman had been engaged throughout in reducing the credit of this country.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is travelling altogether beyond the Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY failed to see that an argument showing why the Government of this country could not always borrow at 3 per cent was not germane to the question. He denied that the Government would make a profit on it advances; and he was convinced that the rate at which a country could borrow depended entirely on the relations she had with the external world. These proposed advances would be made, not on the credit of England, but on the credit of the United Kingdom; and that credit depended on whether this Bill would make the country so united that there would be no desire for a dissolution of the Union, and whether people would be willing to pay the proposed rate for 35 years. If they were not, they could not borrow at 3, or 6, or even 7 per cent; and Gentlemen who accepted the low rate were bound to maintain the credit of this country by ceasing their efforts to dissolve the Union.

MR. RITCHIE stated, that of all the witnesses examined before the Agricultural Commission in Ireland, not one advocated a less interest than 5 per cent on advances for the purchases of holdings. He was sure the Government could not advance money safely at a less rate.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that the Prime Minister seemed to think that the Committee should agree at once to his terms without hearing what could be said against them; but, with all deference to the right hon. Gentleman, he (Mr. Biggar) did not think that was the proper way in which to conduct an important Bill. A charge had been made against the Irish Members collectively that whenever an attack was to be made on the British Exchequer, they were unanimous in support of that attack; but, for his part, he had as frequently voted against proposed grants for Irish purposes as in favour of them. As to the present question, it was known that 3 per cent was rather above the market price, and he did not see why the Government should make a profit of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent on loans, when the interest and security were undoubted. The principle upon which the Government were now acting was very different from the principle on which they acted in regard to the Bill of last year. When they were proposing to lend money to landlords, they offered the loans at 1 per cent, and gave one or two years free; but when they were dealing with the unfortunate tenants, they wanted  $3\frac{1}{4}$  per cent from the first day of the advance. A great deal was said as to the gratitude due to this very Liberal Government; but he failed to see with any great clearness that, if the farmers had to borrow at this high rate, any great gratitude was due.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 35: Majority 161.—(Div. List, No. 298.)

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 23 (Provision as to purchases and sales by Land Commission).

THE CHAIRMAN: There are several Amendments to this clause of the same kind as that of the hon. Member for Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan)—namely, to require corporate bodies to sell their property upon compulsion. One Amendment makes it compulsory on Corporations and Companies; and a further Amendment extends the obligation to limited owners to sell their estates to the Land Commission. Parliament has been careful to protect the rights of property by various Standing Orders. These Orders are ordinarily applicable to Private Bills; but wherever it appears that private rights of property are affected by a Public Bill it is usual to refer such Bill to the Examiners in order to ascertain whether the securities provided by the Standing Orders have been afforded to the parties interested. On no matter has Parliament been more particular than in making provision for the compulsory purchase of lands. Undoubtedly, there is a distinction between a Private Bill and a general measure of public policy; but I believe it to be without precedent for a Committee on a Public Bill to entertain an Amendment which, without Notice and without the consent of the parties interested, proposes to take compulsorily the lands of a particular class of proprietors, and, so far as I am concerned, I am not prepared as Chairman to make a new precedent. This Amendment, therefore, cannot be put.

MR. LITTON: Does this ruling apply to the Amendment at line 12?

THE CHAIRMAN: No; I do not think it does.

MR. LITTON said, he had placed an Amendment at line 12 which he thought would be of great value. The Irish Church Commissioners, under the Irish Church Act, were not only authorized but directed before they sold Church property, to offer to the tenant of that property the opportunity of purchasing their holdings by way of a right of pre-emption; and he suggested that the Committee might add a similar provision to this clause. The question of corporate estates in the North and other parts of Ireland had excited a great deal of interest; and if corporate bodies, looking forward to future legislation, were disposed to offer their estates for sale, it was desirable that they should not be at liberty to sell to private individuals until they had offered to the tenants the right of buying on equitable terms. The words he proposed to introduce were taken from the Church Act of 1870, and would carry out the principle of that Act, that public bodies should not be allowed to sell their estates to private individuals regardless of the claims of the occupiers.

Amendment proposed,

In page 16, line 12, at end of Clause, add "No body corporate, public company, trustees for charities, commissioners or trustees for collegiate or other public purposes, shall sell to the public the fee simple of any land which is held immediately from or under them by virtue of any lease or tenancy in writing until they have given notice to the lessee or tenant that they are willing to sell the fee simple to him for a price to be fixed by the Land Commission, and such lessee or tenant has declined to accept their offer within the prescribed period."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he had to make the general acknowledgment to his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Litton) that there was in this Amendment and in the subject-matter with which the Amendment was connected, what well deserved the attention of Parliament; but he was afraid that he could not go further than that there were many observations to be made on it. One, for example, was that many of those parties had no power to sell, as he (Mr. Gladstone) understood, their estates. They had power given them under the Bill to sell to the Commission, but no sale otherwise than to the Commission. Then, it must be very hard upon any body, whether they held the land under mortmain or not, to place them under limitations of this kind with respect to each particular part of an estate which they held, because they might produce such a honey-combing of their estates as might be inconvenient and objectionable in the highest degree. But he would base his objection on the more general ground—namely, that however important it might be, it was not in its place in the middle of the clause. These were clauses for regulating purchases by the Commission, and this proposal was entirely independent of that. He would rather, therefore, stand on that point as a more comprehensive objection than to prosecute the matter in its present shape. It did not even take in the matter on grounds of public policy.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR wished to elicit some information from the Government with reference to the question which they had just decided; and, to put himself in Order, he would end with a Motion. ["Oh!"] Well, for reasons which were perfectly justifiable to his mind, he was entitled to take that course. If he caught the ruling of the Chairman aright, the Committee were precluded from considering the question of compelling Companies principally in the North of Ireland to sell their estates—that was, that it would not be permissible for a private Member to propose in this Bill the insertion of any clause to have that effect.

THE CHAIRMAN: Without safeguards provided already by Parliament for that purpose?

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Quite so; without the necessary safeguards. What he wished to do was at once to learn from the Government whether they were prepared to take that matter in hand, because the ruling would be quite compatible with a Minister of the Crown dealing with this question. From what he knew, especially of the North of Ireland and from several Members of that part, the opinion there was very strong that the experiment of establishing peasant proprietary should begin with the properties that were under the control of those Companies; and therefore he thought it was only due to the people of the North of Ireland, who were looking forward to this matter with the gravest anxiety, to tell them whether they had any reason to hope that the Prime Minister would, in the course of the next week or so, consider whether there was any way of dealing with this question. To put himself in Order he would move that Progress be reported.

MR. T. COLLINS could scarcely believe it possible that the Chairman should rule that power should be denied to a private Member upon a question of public policy in a Public Act to move any single clause dealing with the rights of private individuals, and to allow a Minister of the Crown that power. It was impossible to conceive that Ministers of the Crown had any special privileges of that kind.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it would appear that Ministers of the Crown had certain duties or privileges with regard to the taxes laid upon the people and to questions affecting the property of the Crown; but they had no privileges with regard to property other than those which he had described. In answer to the questions which had been put to him, he must repeat that it was really and absolutely beyond his power and that of his right hon. and learned Colleagues, engaged, as they were, with the Bill and the consideration of Amendments upon it, in the course of their ordinary Business to touch this matter. He made this frank admission, that if he endeavoured to introduce it into the subject-matter of the Bill, even if it were politic, that it could not be done.

MR. PARNELL said, the question of corporations and absentees was undoubtedly a very important one. He did think that it might be in the power of the Government to draw some distinction between absentee landowners and residential landowners. It had always, in Irish legislation, been the practice to draw a practical distinction between absentee landowners and those who resided in Ireland; and there were a great number of the large owners in Ireland whose estates were rented at the present moment at a fair rent, but who, very probably, under the provisions of this Bill, might be tempted to raise those rents. A practical way to meet the absentee difficulty would be to prevent absentee owners from raising their rents any higher than they were at present. It surely would not have been too much to ask for the tenants on the estates of absentee owners that the Government should consider whether it would be fair to allow those owners the same right to raise their rents as other Irish landowners had, or whether they might not impose some limitations on them. This was a matter which would not press upon the absentee landowners very hard—at any rate, those of them who had allowed their estates to remain at a fair rent; but some of them might feel that when this Bill was put into operation that they were put on their strict rights, and they might make a move in the direction of rent-raising, which might cause great confusion and strife on the estates in Ireland. Therefore, he hoped when the Government had had its attention called to this matter that they would consider whether they might not insert a clause in the Bill depriving absentee landowners of the right of raising their rents any higher than they were at present.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that he had paid a great deal of attention to this subject, and he had come to the conclusion that from an Irish tenant point of view there were no landlords so good as the absentee landlords. They did not worry their tenants or interfere with them, and they did not take excessive rents. What he had found was that the agents of the absentee landowners were something like Indian collectors, for they had a great deal of sympathy with the people, and they entered into their feelings and were inclined to do the best they could for them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy sometimes told them that they were wasting time by discussion. He hoped that the hon. Member would except the present discussion from that censure.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

He did not wish to interfere one moment longer than was absolutely necessary; but he had a strong impression that the Companies themselves would be as glad to sell as their tenants would be glad to buy, and he was sure that there was nobody in "another place" who had the least desire to preserve these Companies in their property.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LITTON asked leave to withdraw his Amendment, remarking that the explanation of the Prime Minister was most satisfactory.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 24 (Conditions annexed to holdings whilst subject to advances).

MR. GLADSTONE proposed to omit sub-section

"(a.) The holding shall not be sold by such proprietor without the consent of the Land Commission until one-half of the whole charge has been discharged."

They had considered this matter, and they had come to the conclusion that this limitation was unnecessary, and would restrict the purchaser's power of borrowing. He did not see that the Land Commission had any interest in this restriction.

Amendment agreed to; sub-section struck out accordingly.

MR. LALOR moved the omission, in page 16, line 22, of the words "or sub-let." He said it was generally agreed in Ireland that tenants would purchase under this Bill, and if these landlords were allowed to grow up in Ireland on the strength of this Bill they would be the very worst class of landlords. The people of Ireland had a great objection to these purchasers being allowed to sub-let the land. Instead of sub-letting, however, it would be in the power of the Court to allow them to sell it, and thus get rid of it.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 22, to leave out the words "or sub-let."—(Mr. Lalor.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or sub-let' stand part of the Clause."

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the hon. Member (Mr. Lalor) wished to take away one limitation, in order to impose one of a different character. The Government thought that they ought not to sub-let while being largely indebted to the Commission. But considering the Amendment, and fully admitting that there was considerable practical truth in what the hon. Member had said about the abuse by the small landlords of their powers, still he did not think that it was possible to affect with a perpetual disability a certain proportion of the land of the country in regard to the powers which the proprietor of that land possessed of setting out the land as he pleased. However well the Amendment might be meant, it was one that they could not agree to.

MR. PARNELL was sorry that the Prime Minister did not see his way to accept this Amendment. The large holders of Ireland might purchase them under the Purchasing Clauses; and he very much feared that one of the results would be that pointed out by the hon. Member for Queen's County (Mr. Lalor), that they would have such persons, after having benefited by the action of the State in putting an end to one system of landlordism, setting up another and a worse system of landlords than that which existed before. He thought that the principle which his hon. Friend sought to have recognized was a very fair one. The State stepped in and did a very unusual thing. It offered to lend money to those tenants for the purpose of enabling them to become owners of their holdings. It did that from the point of view of public policy; and, of course, if the State pleased to impose on that transaction a condition that that land should not be sub-let by the new owners, he did not see how the new owners, taking advantage of the arrangement, could grumble at such a limitation. If they did not wish to be owners under that limitation, they could remain tenants, and they would have nothing to complain of. But if they wished to become owners under the limitation that the House of Commons pleased to affix, he did not see why they should complain of the limitation. There was another way in which this question might, perhaps, be dealt with—namely, by making them the present tenants, instead of future tenants, as they would be under the operation of the present Bill. In that way they would encourage a system of sale where an owner had more land than he could profitably employ or cultivate himself; and he thought it was to the encouragement of the system of selling land in Ireland, instead of letting it, that they must look to escape from the present entanglement. Owing to a variety of circumstances, which it was not necessary to allude to, the system in Ireland had been to let and not to sell land. Both owners and occupiers generally preferred to let it or rent it. If they encouraged the system of selling land, instead of letting it, and thus perpetuating the pernicious system of landlordism, it would be much better.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, it appeared to him that the point deserved earnest consideration. Of course, so far as the security of the Treasury or the Land Commission, or whoever might be regarded as the person who advanced the money, was concerned, there could be no doubt that it was very reasonable that proposals should be made which should secure the repayment of the money; and, as sub-letting or subdividing, without the consent of the Land Commission, might endanger the repayment, it was very reasonable that there should be a proposal that the holding should not be sub-divided or sub-let without the consent of the Commission. All the Commission would do would be to see that what was done did not imperil the security on which they had advanced their money. Well, but the hon. Member proposed to leave out the words "or sub-let." That would appear, at first sight, as if he intended to allow a purchaser, under this clause, to sub-let without the necessity of going to the Land Commission; but he proposed, subsequently, to put in words which restrained the proprietor, who had purchased under those peculiar conditions, from sub-letting at all—that was, from turning himself into a landlord. He understood that the whole of this proposal was to get rid, sub-modo, of landlordism, and he understood that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman was to carry that into effect—that was, to prevent the present tenants from becoming landlords. If it were otherwise, they would have all the evils of landlordism brought up again, and the land would be in the hands of persons who had been assisted to become landlords by the aid of the State in turning out the previous landlords.

MR. SYNAN was at a loss to understand how an owner in fee, which at least a purchaser would be at the end of 35 years, was to be restrained by law from exercising his ownership in fee by attaching a condition to it which would be totally inconsistent with the estate. Who was to enforce the condition? Was the State to enforce that condition against an owner in fee, and say that he was not to sub-let or sub-divide his ownership in fee? He did not care whether he had 1,000 or 10 acres, the condition was inconsistent with the estate, and they could not have such a condition on any estate in this Bill or any Bill.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL suggested that the object of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Lalor) could be met consistently with the view which his hon. Friend (Mr. Synan) had recognized, to some extent, by making a distinction between the present tenants and those who came after.

MAJOR NOLAN was quite satisfied that some such provision as this Amendment contained would be necessary before the tenants would become the proprietors. On the Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Reading (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), it was made quite clear that they could not prevent the purchasing tenant from mortgaging, or sub-letting, or doing anything he liked with his land. He must become the natural proprietor, and that would be the chief inducement to pay the instalments during the 35 years.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, they must not look only to the present requirements, but to Free Trade in land in Ireland. They could not hamper it. It was in that way that many of the provisions of the Bill which seemed now to hamper the relations of man and man with regard to land were to be remedied; and he thought it was utterly impossible to restrain purchasing tenants by any such conditions as were now proposed in this Bill. He thought it would not be possible to prevent the consolidation of these peasant proprietary holdings in Ireland in face of the difficulties which must be obvious. As far as sub-letting was concerned, they would have to contend in Ireland with the same difficulties which had been experienced in other countries where what was called land hunger had prevailed. There would always be found intending tenants ready to take land at high prices; but that did not, in his opinion, refute the objection which he held to any attempt to prevent the free sale of land in Ireland or elsewhere. He did not think it was possible to trace any of the difficulties now complained of to the wish of a large section of the Irish people for freedom of sale in land.

MR. LALOR said, he objected to the clause on the ground, mainly, that it would work gross injustice to the tenants in the case of re-letting of estates.

MR. BIGGAR said, his main objection to the clause was that it would give ample opportunity for the exercise of their calling to land-jobbers in all parts of the country, and would effect such a change in the legislation as could only have the effect of injuriously affecting tenants who would be powerless for their own defence.

MR. DAWSON said, the clause was bad enough; but it would not work so injuriously if the Amendment was adopted, for no one could doubt that, in the point of view of the tenants, a system of sale was preferable to one of sub-letting.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that, whatever might or might not be the relative merits of sale and sub-letting, he did not think any hon. Member could legitimately urge that it was raised by the present Amendment. He thought when the Committee came to consider the whole principle involved in the clause they would arrive at a somewhat different view of the matter from that which had been laid before them by some hon. Members.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR objected to the clause, and supported the Amendment on the ground, mainly, that it would not have the effect of facilitating the sale of land in Ireland. It was not only the ideal but the real land system in many European countries, and particularly in France, that the ownership of the land should be distributed over as large a number of the inhabitants of the country as possible; and he hoped that principle would not only be recognized in theory by the Government, but would be acted up to in practice.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, inasmuch as in his view the present was not the most opportune moment for raising the great principle which was involved in it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LALOR moved, in page 16, line 22, to leave out the word "sub-let."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) said, he had no objection to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to; word struck out accordingly.

MR. LALOR moved to insert the word "let" in place of the word "sub-let," just struck out.

Amendment agreed to; word inserted accordingly.

On the Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL for IRELAND, Amendment made in page 16, line 30, by leaving out the words "or judgment."

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Reclamation of Land and Emigration.

Clause 25 (Reclamation of land).

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL moved, in page 17, to leave out line 15, and insert the words "the Land Commission may, with the concurrence of the Treasury." The general impression among a large section of the Irish people was that the Irish Board of Works had not used their powers for the benefit of the country at large, and had thus become very unpopular and were ineffective.

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, leave out line 15, and insert "the Land Commission may, with the concurrence of the Treasury."—(Mr. Charles Russell.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'The Treasury may authorise the Board of Works to' stand part of the Clause."

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH opposed the Amendment.

MR. GIVAN said, the Board of Works in Ireland was entirely made up of a system of red-tape, and it was impossible to get a loan through the Board for any purpose under the sun without an immense amount of unnecessary trouble. As a justification of what he said, he might mention the action of the Board with regard to advances under the Act of 1870. In the clause that enabled the Board to advance money to the tenant, the words were—

"Where a tenant is desirous of purchasing his holding he may apply to the Board of Works to advance any sum not exceeding two-thirds the whole amount;"

but the Board actually refused to advance the tenants any money, unless they applied before they purchased at all to the Board for an advance on an amount which they did not know, because it was said the words of the Act were—"Where the tenant is desirous of purchasing." They, therefore, held that a purchase made by the tenant without consulting the Board first of all, while the transaction was inchoate, and which, in fact, was no purchase at all, did not comply with the provision, "where a tenant is desirous;" and the Board would not advance any money at all. The result was, that numbers of purchasers, supposing they had a clause in the Act of 1870 enabling them to purchase, went into the Landed Estates Court and made a purchase of their holding, having one-third to pay; but, when they went to the Board, the Board said they could not advance the two-thirds balance because the application was not made before the purchase. And so an Act of Parliament had to be passed through the House to get rid of this miserable technical objection that the Board raised to defeat the object of the clause altogether. No wonder the Board of Works was unpopular, because no more frivolous objection was ever made than this under the 47th section of the Act of 1870. If the Land Commission was to have the working power under the present Bill to carry out the peasant proprietor part of the scheme, it should have in itself all that power, and certainly a part of it should not be relegated to the decision of an unpopular and obstructive Board.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, of course, it was easy to find fault with the Board of Works; but that Board was a Department that had assigned to it one of the most important, delicate, and invidious duties it was possible to discharge. The history of the case was this. Parliament was prepared to sanction advances of certain money for certain purposes in Ireland under certain restrictions. The conditions under which the advances were to be made were laid down in an Act of Parliament, and expressed in that Act the mode in which it should be done, and charge of the machinery. The Board of Works was devised as the machinery for the work being carried through; and it was the duty of those gentlemen who formed the Board to adhere strictly to the orders that were given by Parliament. If Parliament had made its orders more strict than necessary, they might require alteration, and the House had the opportunity of making alterations in the conditions on which Parliament chose to advance money; and it was open to Parliament to make those conditions more or less stringent, as it pleased. But do let them have fair consideration for those who had to carry the orders into effect; they were pressed in every manner, as any body was which had in its charge the disposition of public money; and it was the duty of the House to support those engaged in this administration. He was not prepared to say that the Board of Works had made no mistakes in their administration, or that there had been no mistakes in the administration of the Treasury in relation to these matters; but he was certain that great honesty, great ability, and great firmness had been shown in cases where, if these qualities had been wanting, the public would have been serious losers. He therefore hoped that justice would be done to those employed in a disagreeable, but important, task. He thought that the Board of Works, under the authority of the Treasury, was the best proposal for the machinery that could be devised, and he hoped that proposal would be adopted.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he gave his concurrence to what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote), and he wished to point out that only one particular case had been stated against the Board of Works as to the manner of their administration in which there had been something like a miscarriage. In regard to that—first of all, it must be said that the duty imposed upon the Board of Works was an exceptional duty outside its proper functions and province; and, secondly, he would go further, and say that he thought it was impossible, if there was blame due—he was not saying whether this blame was due, or was not—it was not possible to stop at the Board of Works; it must be carried to the Treasury, for the Board of Works was simply an instrument of the Treasury, and it was impossible to bring any serious charge against the Board without the Treasury taking that charge on its own shoulders. As to what had been said about the unpopularity of the Board of Works, perhaps that made less impression upon his mind than it did on the minds of some. He had never heard that the Treasury was popular—it might be so, and he hoped it was—but the fact had never come to his knowledge. Under an economical Administration, it was held to be extremely penurious in the disposition of public money; and when the Administration was more disposed to be liberal, then the appetite grew faster than the supply, and the Treasury was never enabled to establish itself permanently in the good graces of those who made the demands. In furtherance of what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman, he must say that, seriously, the faults of the Board of Works were those of the Treasury; and, if they existed, it was in Parliament and before the House that the Treasury were liable to be questioned, and were bound to answer; there they could be tried, and the blame should not be laid upon a body which, after all, was but instrumental and subordinate. He did not wonder that, at first sight, the notion should impress itself that this work should be intrusted to the Commission; but let the Committee consider whether they had not gone far enough in the duties they had charged upon the Commissioners. There had been laid upon them the working of a judicial duty connected with the administration of new Land Laws; and, having done that, having gone into a new system, and a new application of a system of advances, the working out of which had been laid on the Commission, a part of the Bill was now reached entirely separate and distinct from these matters, and which, in point of fact, was an extension of what now existed, and had nothing to do with the subject-matter on which the Commission would be engaged. It was to extend an Act that now existed, to allow public money to be advanced in aid of private and individual purposes in Ireland, and, therefore, the Committee must look beyond the machinery of the Bill. Having done their part, the Commission would not have the experience, the engineering staff, nor, he might be allowed to say, the leisure to discharge this new duty. He confessed he almost trembled when he thought of the calls that would be made upon the care, the mind, the thought of the Commissioners; but where there was a body which had an engineering staff and great capacity, and which, also, was an authorized body under the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown, he could not help thinking that the mind of his hon. and learned Friend would be satisfied, and that he would himself think that the Government were right in maintaining the position of the Bill as it stood.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, the very work that the Board would have to do was the very work it did most successfully, until, unfortunately, some years ago, the system was changed, and drainage was taken from the direction of the Board of Works and handed over to Drainage Boards. Therefore, it seemed to him that the Board of Works was specially qualified for any work in the nature of drainage and the reclamation of waste lands. As to the charge which had been made against the Board, he did not wish to undertake their defence; but he was certain that the accusation made against the Board in relation to the "Bright Clauses" was not due to their own action, but the course they took was imposed upon them by the Treasury. There was one thing, however, he would mention in reference to the Board of Works. A Committee, some years ago, recommended the reorganization of the Board and the retirement of the Chairman, and he would appeal to the Government to consider whether that recommendation could be carried out. No doubt, the Chairman was an old and valuable servant; but there was no doubt, also, his ideas were not in harmony with what was expected from the Board, and, surely, he might now be relegated to that retirement he had so well earned.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell) would not press his Amendment to a division. It was evident that the Board of Works was best qualified for the work. He was far from saying that the Board did not want improvement. It did; but the Board had the staff and means of carrying out the work which the Commission would be unable to carry out, unless a similar staff was created. As to the charge brought by the hon. Member for Monaghan (Mr. Givan), he was very much struck by what he said, that after the Board had raised technical objections abiding strictly by the rules laid down, the point had to be made the object of another Act of Parliament to enable the thing to be done as tenants desired; and that, at all events, showed that it was not the Board of Works or the Treasury which had to bear the blame, but it was due to a defect in the Act of Parliament.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, he would, with the leave of the Committee, withdraw his Amendment. ["No, no!"]

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, it was remarkable that both the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst) and the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had said how excellently qualified was the Board of Works for engineering operations such as the reclamation of land in Ireland; but what had that to do with this clause? Would the hon. Members who vindicated the efficiency of the Board of Works for drainage and other improvements look at the clause, and they would find not a word about engineering operations, but a great deal about executing money-lending operations. Now, he had heard a few people confess that the Board had completely discharged its duty in one or two engineering operations, but he had never heard one man say that the Board of Works did anything but obstruct the advance of public money for useful purposes; and he would ask his hon. Friends who pointed out the advantage of handing the administration of this clause to the Board of Works, to remember what it was. The Treasury might authorize the Board to advance from time to time monies for objects they might think expedient, and for which there was sufficient security; therefore, all that the Board would have to do would be to look after the security for the money. If the Government had any idea of making the clause what it purposed to be—merely a matter for the working out of the Act in harmony with the spirit of a great scheme—surely they should not commit a part of the scheme to one supreme authority, and another part to another. Already in Ireland there was a sufficient number of divided authorities working over the same ground; in fact, he had often said it was one of the banes of the country. Five distinct bodies over the same ground—different taxes, different tax collectors, different officials, different secretaries, and different instructions—and now there was going to be an addition to the evil in this case! If all that Clause 25 proposed to do was to advance money to Companies and look after the security for the money, he would suggest that the Land Commission should be the authority, because the Land Commission would, in the discharge of other duties, have cognizance of the reasons that would justify the recommendation of a particular advance. It was the Land Commission alone that would be charged with the knowledge of all the operations taking place under the Bill, of the reclamation and value of land, and with a knowledge of the whole working of the Act, where it might be that reclamation was needed to relieve the congestion of population and where not. If, then, the clause had not any purpose but to see that the money had full security, then the Land Commission was the proper authority. This was really so large a subject that it was quite impossible, utterly impossible, to discuss it now; and, therefore, since it was obvious that several hon. Members wished to speak, he might as well say what he had to say and not divide it between to-night and Monday, and he would, therefore, ask the attention of the Committee to one of the reasons why he thought the Government should give the Commission the authority over the reclamation of waste lands in Ireland. He would like to know whether some effort could not be made by the Government to extend this clause to the taking in of foreshores—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member is going considerably beyond the Amendment.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he must have failed to convey his meaning with sufficient clearness. The Committee were discussing whether the Board of Works or the Land Commission should have charge of Clause 25, and his argument was that if this was only to be a money lending operation, his contention was that the Land Commission could do that as well as the Board of Works. But if it was to be for the purpose of conducting engineering operations, the clause must be altered to give the Board or the Commission, whichever it might be, the power of undertaking these operations. That was his argument. But he did not think anything was to be gained by trying at this part of the clause to make any suggestions, or use arguments in connection with the reclamation of land; and, as they would be more in Order at a further stage, he would reserve his remarks.

MR. HEALY said, he would ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether the Bill would not throw a great deal of work on the Board, and whether it was not a fact that the additional work under the Relief of Distress Act of last year absolutely broke down the Board of Works? Did not the clerks in the office work day and night, and were they not absolutely broken down? Further, he would like to know, was it not notorious that when works were undertaken by landlords under that Act, the Inspector of the Board of Works went down and certified for the work being done, when in fact it was not done, and it was popularly believed, and indeed in some cases known, that the money supplied on account of the work supposed to be done was spent in buying heifers—the gentleman sent down by the Board of Works certifying for the work after dining and wining with the landlords? Was it to a body so universally distrusted in Ireland that the carrying out of important provisions in the Bill was to be intrusted? The late Conservative Government a few years ago promised to have the Board represented in the House, but it was never carried out. It used to be the custom, whenever comments were made on the Board of Works in the House, for the Irish official to say—"It's none of my child;" and to state that he was not responsible for the mismanagement, nor would the Secretary to the Treasury acknowledge he had any responsibility. Certainly, if the Board of Works were intrusted with the authority proposed, it would take away any confidence as to the working of the Act.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, said, it was quite true that the Boards of Works was not under the control of the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary; it was under the Treasury, and his noble Friend the Secretary to the Treasury had acknowledged the responsibility. But a question had been asked as to the action of the Board of Works during the distress of last year, and he really must say that, so far as his knowledge went, and what he heard of their action, and especially speaking from his contact with the Board from his official connection with the Local Government Board, he thought that the conduct and management of the Board during the great pressure of the time of distress was such that no fault could be found with it. True, the clerks were hard worked, and so they were in the office of the Local Government Board and other offices under the great pressure; but he confessed his own opinion of the Board of Works was raised considerably by the manner in which they got through the necessities of the distress. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) alluded to particular charges of which, of course, he (Mr. Forster) knew nothing, and he did not think it was fair to bring forward such charges as acknowledged facts, when he did not suppose any Member of the Committee had heard of them before.

MR. PARNELL said, the Committee could not decide on this important question, on which the whole of the clause depended and upon which Amendments hereafter would hinge, at such a late hour, and he would therefore suggest that it would be reasonable for the Government to assent to a Motion to report Progress and to adjourn the discussion to Monday. The Board of Works was introduced into the Bill now for the first time, and the effect was important.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to know whether the Government intended to make any other alteration of procedure in respect to the Bill besides those announced by the Prime Minister at the beginning of the evening? He had stated that when the Committee arrived at Clause 34, he would move that it be postponed; and he (Sir Stafford Northcote) desired to know whether it was the intention to proceed in regular order with the other clauses—and especially he would refer to Clause 36 and the Emigration Clauses; and whether it was intended to proceed with the other clauses having reference to the duties of the Court?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the question should have been put to his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister; but to the best of his (Mr. Forster's) knowledge, there was no intention of making any other alteration beyond the postponement of Clause 34.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the Emigration Clauses would be proceeded with?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Yes; certainly.

MR. GIBSON said, the Committee was getting on quickly, and would very soon reach the clauses dealing with the constitution of the Court and the functions of the Land Commission, upon which he understood the Prime Minister was going to make a statement on Monday. It seemed to him that the Government Amendments would not appear on the Notice Paper till Tuesday, and hon. Members, if not satisfied with the Government Amendments, would have to put in manuscript Amendments, and this would be a little hard upon the Committee. What he wished to ask was, that the Government would make known their proposals and give hon. Members full opportunity of considering them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked, did the right hon. and learned Gentleman mean that the Amendments were not expected till Tuesday?

MR. GIBSON said, they were not on the Paper now, and, unless given in within the next 10 minutes, would not appear till Tuesday.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked, would they appear on Monday morning?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: No.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, then, in that case, the Committee would not see them till Tuesday.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked, would the Government undertake not to discuss them until after they could be seen on the Paper?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR hoped that they would not be discussed until they had appeared for a day in print, so that they could be seen with other Amendments.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the Government would do their best to put them on as early as possible; but they could not undertake to postpone the proceedings for a day.

MR. GORST said, he thought they had been waiting at least a month; and he did not see how it would be possible to discuss the constitution of the Court until the Amendments of the Government and of other responsible, and irresponsible Members were before the Committee.

MR. HENEAGE urged the Government to put their Amendments on the Paper as soon as possible, and said that he had had an Amendment on the Paper for nearly two months, for doing away with all reference to County Courts, and he should be in a difficult position if the Government only produced their Amendments on the day when the clause came up.

Question put, and agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

LONDON CITY (PAROCHIAL CHARITIES) BILL.—[BILL 13.]

(Mr. Bryce, Mr. Pell, Mr. Cohen, Mr. Walter James, Mr. Davey.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment on Second Reading [25th May], and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. W. H. SMITH appealed to the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) to withdraw his opposition to the second reading, believing the Bill would be of great service to the City of London.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that having appointed the Commission to inquire into the subject dealt with by the Bill, he thought it would be a great mistake not to read the Bill the second time, and he implored the hon. Member to take off his opposition.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he had not been aware that the Bill was down for that evening; but he would confer with those who were interested in the matter with regard to the course they would take as regarded it.

Debate further adjourned till Monday next.

REMOVAL TERMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Mr. James Stewart, Dr. Cameron, Mr. Patrick, Mr. Mackintosh.)

[BILL 8.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. James Stewart.)

MR. ORR-EWING moved the adjournment of the debate on the ground that the Bill ought not to be discussed at so late an hour.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Orr-Ewing.)

MR. DONALD CAMERON observed that the Bill appeared to have entered upon a new phase. As long as the Bill stood in the form proposed by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. James Stewart) he saw no harm in it; but when the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr-Ewing) put down his Notice, a great many of his (Mr. Cameron's) constituents objected to it. If, as was reported, the Government accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dumbarton, the intention of the original Bill would be reversed. In that case, he must oppose the Bill; but he hoped the Government would announce what their intention was one way or the other.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR hoped the debate would be adjourned, for this was a Bill interfering with local customs all over Scotland, and it would be impossible to get through a debate on such a measure in less than an hour and a-half or two hours. After the House had been working at high pressure all day and every day on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill, it was impossible to expect Members to discuss measures like this in a sober and clear spirit.

MR. GORST also objected to discussing the Bill at that late hour.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

THE LATE LORD HATHERLEY.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, since your Lordships last met the House has been deprived of one of its greatest ornaments and one of its most distinguished and honoured Members. I have some difficulty in endeavouring to do justice to my own sense of the loss which this House has sustained, because I lived on terms of close intimacy for not less, I think, than 40 years with the eminent man who, now in an honoured old age, has been taken from us—and personal affection makes me sensible of the difficulty of doing justice, in the few words which I shall address to your Lordships, to his admirable qualities—at the same time, I am most desirous not to fail in expressing, in some measure at all events, the feeling which I think all your Lordships must have on the subject of his loss. My Lords, Lord Hatherley was a man who, I believe, from his earliest years lived a life of as much consistency and diligence in doing his duty in every private relation, and in every grade of the professional and public stations which he was called upon to fill—I think he had as much purity and simplicity of character, as much thorough conscientiousness, as much energy and sound judgment as, taking into account the infirmity of man, any of us could hope to attain. From that intimate knowledge which I had of him, and which, as I have said, lasted for 40 years, I may even go further. There are not a few men of whom one would say that, as far as one may presume to judge from public and outward signs of character, they may be looked upon as examples to be held up for imitation by other men; but of him I would presume even to say that I am sure that judgment cannot be mistaken. Most men, looking back to their earliest life, must be sensible of many faults and errors, known to themselves if not known to others. Certainly, his modesty never would have permitted him to claim to be more free from faults and errors than other men; and yet I do verily believe that such as he appeared outwardly to others he was from his earliest years inwardly in himself. A man of the most remarkable gentleness and sweetness of character, and at the same time of firmness and decision which never quailed or failed before the performance of any duty, and which enabled him, in all the different posts he was called upon to fill, to discharge their duties to the admiration of all who were able to observe his career. He was as little ambitious of personal distinction as any man so distinguished whom I have ever known. It might be truly said of him that he was not one of those—“who stoop, or lie in wait

“For wealth, for honours, or for wordly state;”
but was one—

“Whom they must follow; on whose head must fall, “Like showers of manna, if they come at all.”

Yet come they did; and it is well for this country that such qualities should be appreciated as they deserve. He was called in due time to a distinguished place on the Bench of Justice, first as Vice-Chancellor, afterwards as Lord Justice; and then he was called to shed lustre upon the Office in which, when I think of him, I feel more than ever my own unworthiness to succeed him. He was called to the great Office of Lord Chancellor, and he carried himself so meekly in the discharge of his public duties, so diligently and so zealously supported every measure which, according to his judgment, was for the benefit of the country and for the advancement of liberty and justice, that when from failing health, or rather failing eyesight, after four years' sitting in this place and presiding over your Lordships' deliberations, he was compelled to relinquish that Office, he carried with him into private life, I am sure I may say, as large a share of esteem and respect as ever fell to the lot of any Predecessor of his in that exalted position—as large as any who may be called upon hereafter to succeed him can possibly hope to obtain. Nor did he, even when his eyesight was partially destroyed, cease to labour in the Public Service to the public advantage; for still as a Judge he discharged his duties in your Lordships' House with that sound, accurate, and extensive knowledge of the law, that calm, equal, and dispassionate judgment, that desire to do justice, incapable of being biassed by any other feeling, which had previously distinguished him throughout his judicial career. And even when suffering under the heaviest calamity which could fall upon him or upon any other of your Lordships who may be blessed with domestic happiness as he had been for a very long time, a calamity which bowed him down with sorrow in his old age, and from which undoubtedly he never recovered, still as long as strength and health remained he continued to lend aid to the discharge of the duties of your Lordships' House. My Lords, I feel how inadequate are the words I have used to express all the value of such a man to the country to which he belonged, to the House of which he was an ornament, to the Profession in which he laboured and in which he rose, and I will say to the Christian society, to the Church of which he was one of the most faithful members, though he always found it consistent with his attachment to the Church of England and to its principles to be foremost in the application of the great principles of civil and religious liberty upon every occasion on which they could possibly come in question. My Lords, I will only add that I hope your Lordships will pardon the inadequacy of the expression I have endeavoured to give to the feelings which I am sure you share, and believe me that what I have said comes thoroughly from the heart.

EARL CAIRNS: My Lords, all that my noble and learned Friend has said, all that he could say, in praise and admiration of him who has been taken away from us, will, I am sure, in this House find a response from every one of your Lordships. It has been my lot to have had a long acquaintance with Lord Hatherley. I well recollect the kindness which, as a young man, I received from him, and I can bear witness from personal observation to the excellent manner in which for many years as one of the primary Judges of the Court of Chancery he discharged the duties of that important office. His subsequent life has been in the eyes of every one of your Lordships; and it is not too much to say, now that he is gone, that as a Judge, as a Christian, as a gentleman, and as a man, this country has not seen, and probably will not see, anyone who is his superior.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, it is certainly not necessary for me to add anything to the eulogies which have been passed by the two noble and learned Lords upon one who was so great an honour to this House and to the country; but perhaps your Lordships will excuse me if I add one single word of testimony to the worth of one with whom I had the honour of acting for many years. I can conceive no one who in the position of Lord Chancellor could have greater qualities to entitle him to the respect and attachment of his Colleagues. While the most consistent politician on the lines which he had laid down for himself, he was one of those lawyers—and I am happy to say that they exist in both political Parties of the State—who, when they attain to the highest honours of their Profession, can look back upon a career absolutely unstained either in public or in private life. One of his most important characteristics was that he not only pointed out difficulties which might occur in politics, but he was singularly fertile in suggesting means for remedying them. I feel sure that, whether remembered as Page Wood or as Lord Hatherley, his name will remain an honour to his Profession and to both Houses of Parliament, of which he was in turn so distinguished an ornament.

UNION OF BENEFICES (CITY OF LONDON).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

THE EARL OF ONSLOW, in rising to call attention to a statement recently published in the "St. James's Gazette" purporting to be a census of the City of London churches alleged to have been taken on the morning of Sunday, 1st May, 1881, by which it appears that at 57 churches, all situate within one square mile, with, according to the Ordnance Map, 31,055 sittings, and, according to the Clergy Directory, an annual income of £40,266, the total present were 6,731, of which number 571 were officials and their families, 706 choristers—mostly paid, 227 paupers for alms, and 1,374 school children, leaving as general ordinary congregations 3,853—namely, 1,227 men, 1,796 women, and 830 children; also to the present population of the City of London (for which, in addition to the churches, St. Paul's Cathedral and the Temple Church are also available) compared with the population in 1801-81; and to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to issue a Commission to inquire into the working of the Union of Benefices Act, 1860, and the state of the several ecclesiastical parishes in the City of London with reference to their population, and to the value of the benefices attached to them, with a view to the suggestion of such further union of benefices, disposal of the sites of churches, and application of the funds arising therefrom, as may, with due regard to the architectural and historical features of the existing edifices, be more conducive to the efficiency of the Church in the Metropolis and its vicinity," said, that, for his purpose, it would be advisable to take only those churches which were situate within the City walls, as those on the edge of the City, such as St. Botolph, Aldersgate; St. Andrew, Holborn; St. Bride, Fleet Street; St.

Giles, Cripplegate; and St. Botolph, Aldgate, drew their congregations principally from without the City. Taking, then, those within the City walls, it would be seen that of 48 churches the congregations in 13 did not exceed 20; in 28 churches it did not exceed 50; and in only 4 did it exceed 100. The capacity of the 48 churches was 10 times that required for the congregation (exclusive of officials). The officials, choristers, recipients of charity, and school children constituted three-fourths of the whole congregation; a chorister was supplied for every fourth person, and an official for every six. The total actual congregations did not exceed more than 2,300, or an average of 48 to each church; the stipendiary portion, exclusive of incumbents and curates, consisted of 21 lecturers, 513 choristers, 374 officials, with their families, and the emoluments amounted to an average of upwards of £1,000 to each church. These statistics were taken under the superintendence of one of the most efficient clerks and accountants in the City, who employed for the purpose some 80 clerks, a body far more reliable than that of necessity employed in taking the Imperial Census. Their Lordships were fully aware of the increasing depletion of the City at night, which had been going on for many years; but it was not until the latest Census was laid on the Table of the House that the extent of this could be fully appreciated. And it should be borne in mind, in considering the figures which he was about to lay before the House, that a large number of those who were compelled to sleep in the City rarely lost an opportunity of absenting themselves from it during the day on Sunday, especially in summer. In the year 1801, the population of the City was 156,859; in 1811, it fell to 120,909; and did not vary greatly until 1861, when the population was 112,063. The fall in the next decade was rapid. In 1871, there were only 74,897; and the recent Census showed that that had fallen still further to 50,526, of whom only 18,712 resided within the City walls. During the same period the population around London had been increasing at a marvellous pace. He would not enter into the statistics of the East End, knowing that the spiritual wants of that population might be safely left in the hands of the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London), further than to say that, with the exception of Hackney, the districts in the East, such as Shore-ditch, Whitechapel, and St. George's in the East, showed a slight decrease of from 2 to 9 per cent. If they turned to the South and West of London, and to the county of Surrey, in which he (the Earl of Onslow) resided, and of whose spiritual necessities he might, therefore, claim to have some knowledge, they would find that the increase had been stupendous. In the districts of Fulham, Hampstead, Wandsworth, and Kensington the increase had been 198, 137, 186, and 85 per cent respectively; and, in the registration district of Fulham, the increase had been 50,000; while in that of Battersea it had increased by 54,000, nearly exactly doubling the population of 1871, and the increase being greater in that one district alone, within 10 years, than in the whole population of the entire City of London. South London, hitherto the centre of the market gardening industry, was now becoming covered with a mushroom-like growth of small bow-windowed houses, inhabited by that class, almost exclusively, whose daily avocations lay in the City. He knew of one contractor, and that only one of many, who had contracted to build 1,000 of these houses, turning them out at the rate of four a-week, which were filled before they were dry, often with two families. It should be observed that while the area of the Metropolis North of the Thames covered 50 square miles, the area South of the river covered 68; and that while the increase of the population in the 20 years from 1851-71 for the entire Metropolis was at the rate of 34 per cent, the increase in the Southern part of it had been at the rate of 57. It should also be known that while the increase in the rateable value in the Metropolis might be calculated to be three times greater than the increase of population, in the South of London it was at the rate of 127 per cent, against 104 per cent for the entire Metropolis, while the increase from 1871 to 1881 had been in still greater proportion. The Metropolitan counties showed no exception to that growth, that of Surrey being no less than 1,344,000 in the decade. It could scarcely be supposed that spiritual provision could have kept pace with that gigantic increase. It was estimated by the Secretary to the Bishop of Rochester's Fund that at least four churches should be built immediately, and an endowment of £10,000 a-year secured to give church accommodation and spiritual ministration to the population of South London in that diocese. It was impossible that the inhabitants of these houses, hardly able as they were to pay their rent, could find the funds necessary for the purpose of erecting and endowing additional churches; what more natural, therefore, than that the endowments of the empty City churches should follow those for whose good they were intended to their new homes? He did not wish it to be supposed that no efforts had been made in this direction; on the contrary, the most rev. Prelate and the right rev. Prelate, during their Presidencies over the See of London, had both done their utmost to lessen these anomalies. The right rev. Prelate had succeeded in diverting a sum of £5,500 a-year for church purposes without the City; nor had the right rev. Bench been less active in Parliament. In the year 1860 a Bill was brought in by the most rev. Prelate for the union of benefices, the opponents to which, however, succeeded, ere it passed into law, in introducing clauses with, he (the Earl of Onslow) believed, the avowed design of impeding the objects which were sought to be obtained. The process under this Act might thus be described—The Bishop of London issued a Commission to certain Commissioners; they made a return to him as to the terms of the proposed union. Those proposals were then completed, and submitted to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for consideration. When these proposals came before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, they had had the general assent of the Vestries, and of the patrons, and of the Bishop of the Diocese. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners then considered the proposals which were put before them; and if they thought they were consistent with the provisions of the Act, and could properly be carried out, they expressed their approval of them, either with or without modifications, and then copies of that scheme were sent to the Vestries and to the patrons of the cures affected. They were allowed two months under the Act to consider any alterations or modifications which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners might have inserted ; and when their replies were received, the scheme was again brought up before them, and when the necessary assents were given, or the objections overruled, the scheme was, by direction of the Board, laid before Parliament, and after the expiration of a period of two months from that time, the sealed copy was sent to the Privy Council Office with a view to ratification by Her Majesty. When the scheme had been ratified and published in The London Gazette, the subsequent proceedings in carrying out the terms of the union commenced. The consents contemplated by the 17th section of the Act being obtained, the first process generally was the removal of the fittings of the church which was to be pulled down, taking care of the sacramental plate, the font, Communion table, and all things which were not to be sold, and then the arrangement for the removal and re-interment of the human remains which were under the church. That was usually a very long process, and when everything of that kind was complete, then the sale of the site took place. Their Lordships would observe that it was necessary to conciliate two bodies whose veto was absolute. The first and most difficult to deal with was the Vestry, a body which had passed into a proverb for narrow-mindedness and incapacity for organization. The length of time also necessary for the completion of the scheme frequently allowed of a complete change in the constitution of that body, which was at all times a small one, and swayed by the minds of one or two of its more active members. With the patrons of the livings less difficulty might be experienced in the City than elsewhere, inasmuch as they were, for the most part, what he might term public bodies. The patronage was thus disposed of.

He believed that if some power were given to override the caprice of the Vestries far more might be done than hitherto had been effected ; for it could not be denied that self-interest was the ruling spirit amongst these bodies, which was clearly exemplified in the case of the union of St. Benet's, Gracechurch Street, with another benefice. In that instance, the scheme was assented to, gazetted, and became law ; but then, under the 17th section of the Act—where four consents of Her Majesty's subjects were required, after she had signed it, to the pulling down of the church—the late Archdeacon of London exercised his veto on the church coming down, and the reason was because it was not to be sold by tender, he objecting to having it sold by auction ; the consequence of his refusal was that they were obliged to have a supplementary scheme to change “ auction ” into “ tender.” The parishioners then woke up and said—“ Well, but now we will have something ; we will not give our consent to the supplementary scheme, unless £4,000 is given to us as a reparation fund ; ” and it was obliged to be given. Then they said—“ We will stand out that the Commissioners of Sewers shall have these two frontages for nothing ; ” that was resisted ; a long battle was fought as to what the money should be ; ultimately they agreed to £3,000, so that it was calculated that £12,000 must have been the loss to the church.

He believed that if a Royal Commission was granted which could consider the City parishes as a whole, and which would have the public confidence, they might recommend a large scheme for the union of benefices, selecting at once those churches which, from their historical or architectural interest, should not be touched, forming them into mother churches for groups of parishes, to serve a real, not a phantom, population, and, where that might not be the case, they might transfer their wealthy endowments—leaving sufficient to repair the fabrics—to some of the adjacent districts, whose spiritual destitution he had pointed out. Thus those who worked in the City by day, and for whom these endowments were intended, would derive the benefit from them to which they were entitled, while a principal weapon would be removed from the enemies of the Church of England as to the alleged great waste of her rich possessions. He begged, in conclusion, to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Moved, that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to issue a Commission to inquire into the working of the Union of Benefices Act, 1860, and the state of the several ecclesiastical parishes in the City of London with reference to their population and to the value of the benefices attached to them, with a view to the suggestion of such further union of benefices, disposal of the sites of churches, and application of the funds arising therefrom, as may, with due regard to the architectural and historical features of the existing edifices, be more conducive to the efficiency of the church in the metropolis and its vicinity.—(The Earl of Onslow.)

VISCOUNT MIDLETON said, he quite concurred in the sentiment that this was a question that could only be dealt with by a Bill in Parliament. There could be no question that in the City of London there was great waste of ecclesiastical power. They had there a large number of churches with no congregations to fill them on the Sunday. For years the population of the City had been steadily diminishing, and that of the suburbs increasing. There were very few clergymen of such exceptional abilities as to tempt the people back to the City churches from their residences in the suburbs. So far as regarded the Union of Benefices Act, the machinery was of far too cumbrous a character to render it workable, and the result was that nothing had been done under it which was worthy of the name of reform. He confessed that his experience was that unless the recommendations of Royal Commissions were backed up by the aid of the Government they very often failed in their object. In point of fact, the success or failure of a Royal Commission depended very much on the encouragement given to them by the Government of the day, and he instanced the case of the Alkali Commission as an example. In regard to the present question, he pointed out that a very large amount of evidence had already been taken on the subject. There had been an attempt to introduce a general measure by a private Member in the other House; but they all knew how very little chance a private Member had of getting a Bill through unless the subject had the hearty sympathy of the Government. He would suggest that if Her Majesty's Government saw its way to supporting any measure on this question, the Ecclesiastical Bench were well able to deal with it. He thought that a Bill dealing with the question would be a more satisfactory solution than the issue of another Royal Commission; but if the Government thought otherwise, if they wished to be fortified with another Royal Commission, then he should support it in preference to nothing being done. At all events, looking at the great importance of the question, he hoped that it would be dealt with at no distant date.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he should have preferred to have the matter left over until another Session of Parliament, when something practical might be done; but as the subject had been brought forward he could not avoid offering a few words on the question. The population of the City of London had been reduced to 52,000, which was 900 less than the increase of only one of the parishes referred to—that of Kensington, and for that population there were 60 churches. But even the sleeping population was much larger than the average Sunday population, for a large number of those who lived in the City left it on the Sunday. Meanwhile the population of the suburbs had increased enormously; and whole towns had been built and inhabited by artisans and others of a class quite unable to provide themselves with churches and clergy. The action of the Union of Benefices Act had done something to cause this disproportion. Of the 70 churches in the City nine had been removed and 12 built in the suburbs entirely, and eight others materially aided. But the Act was too cumbrous to work effectually and required too many consents. It was said that if these City churches were properly served, and if the services in them were made attractive, they would be filled. Those who argued thus pointed to St. Paul's as an example. But it must be borne in mind that there was a limit to the supply, and if the population went to fill one church another church must suffer. Others deprecated any attempt to reduce the number of the churches on the ground that they were ornaments to the City of London; but he ventured to say that a large proportion of the 60 City churches were passed by hundreds and thousands of people who never observed that they were churches at all. The question then was—Could it be maintained that this large number of churches, with a diminished surrounding population, should be left untouched, while the wants of the increasing suburbs were so great? The great difficulty, as had been stated by the noble Earl, was as to the rights of the incumbents, and others interested in the maintenance of the churches. All these had vetoes. In consequence of the difficulties thus interposed, there was hardly any means of dealing with the City churches at all. The present state of things, however, was acting injuriously to the Church, inasmuch as it prevented many who were willing to assist in Church extension from giving that help while there existed that disproportion of churches to population that was seen in the City of London. But he ventured to doubt whether a Royal Commission would expedite a settlement of the question. The proceedings of a Commission would cause much delay; the facts were already known, and the question was one which should be settled as soon as possible. In his view, the best way to deal with it was by Act of Parliament. He trusted that next Session the question would be taken up by the Government, when, it was to be hoped, more time could be devoted to such a subject than could possibly be expected now, and he hoped that they would then arrive at some settlement of this difficult question. He quite agreed that they ought to proceed on one general plan, and pointed out that a Bill founded on that basis, which he introduced in 1873, was considered by a Select Committee, and passed their Lordships' House. If any Bill was again brought in, he hoped that it would deal with the question by way of a general scheme.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY said, he felt called upon to defend the ecclesiastical patrons of benefices in the City of London from any charge of opposing difficulties in the way of settling this question. It was a great mistake to suppose that the ecclesiastical patrons as a body were opposed to the union of benefices allowed by the Act of 1860. Certainly he could speak on that point for the right rev. Prelate the (Bishop of London) and himself. Never, so far as he knew, had they offered any objection to the removal of City churches which were not required, and the erection of them where they were much wanted. On the contrary, perhaps it was worth noting, considering the use that had been made of these statistics elsewhere, to call attention to the fact that all movements for the improvement of the City in this respect had emanated from the Episcopal Bench. It was found by experience that no improvement could be effected when the origination of the movement was left to the Vestry, because the controlling power of the Vestry was generally the Vestry clerk, and as the Vestry clerk was very unwilling that his parish should disappear, it was very difficult indeed to get a Vestry to move in the matter. He was quite sure of this—that every well-wisher of the Church of England was desirous to see such an anomaly as the noble Earl had so well pointed out removed, consistently with the principles of justice. At the same time, he ought to remark that the effect of the Act for the Union of Benefices had been that 10 churches in the City had been removed in 20 years, which was a considerable result, and the funds derived from the removal had formed a fund to erect 12, and partly eight more, in the suburbs. The existing law might be cumbrous; but he did not think it was much more cumbrous than the necessities of the case, except in the number of consents, required. The difficulty was that the churches had to be dealt with one by one. He did not think a Commission could add anything to the information that had already been obtained. What was wanted was a vigorous effort, if he might be allowed to say so, on the part of those who had the control of Parliament, to carry this question to a solution. There was no slowness on the part of the Episcopal Bench or the clergy, though there might, no doubt, be interested persons who were not willing that their livings should be interfered with during their own lifetime; but there was great slowness on the part of Parliament in adopting a general measure. The matter required to be dealt with cautiously. He thought that the only mode in which much could be done, under the difficulties of the case, would be by the Government introducing some such measure as had been suggested by his right rev. Brother.

LORD HOUGHTON said, that, looking at the question from an æsthetic point of view, it was a great pity that these fine old architectural edifices, some of which were products of the genius of Sir Christopher Wren and other eminent architects, should be pulled down and ruthlessly destroyed. He thought it would be a good plan, if any of these churches were found not to be requisite for religious services, to put them to other uses, and especially to make them available for educational purposes. He believed the School Board for London, if they were handed over to that body, could utilize them to great advantage in the promotion of higher education in the Metropolis.

EARL GRANVILLE agreed that the noble Earl (the Earl of Onslow) had raised a very useful discussion, and had adduced facts tending prima facie in favour of an alteration of the existing law. He thought, however, it was not probable, after the discussion that had taken place, that the noble Earl would carry the question to a division. He agreed in almost all that the noble Earl and those who followed him had said, but thought he had been fully answered by the difficulties which had been pointed out by his right rev. and most rev. Friends. No doubt the evil was a great and increasing one; but he very much doubted whether the mere fact of appointing a Commission would tend to expedite legislation on it, because that was certainly not his experience with respect to other Bills; and considering that this subject had been on more than one occasion referred to a Committee, he thought it would be worse than useless to send it to another. There were several views to be taken of this subject. There was the sentimental and æsthetic, so well represented by his noble Friend (Lord Houghton) and those who agreed with him, who thought the churches might be utilized for other purposes. If it could be shown that of a certain number of churches some were absolutely useless for religious purposes, but could be made use of for very important moral purposes, he, for one, certainly would not object. There was, however, this difficulty in the way of the suggestion of his noble Friend (Lord Houghton), that if there were no people to go to church there would be nobody to go to school. It appeared, moreover, that the greatest difficulty was with the Vestry clerks, and he doubted whether the Report of a Royal Commission would have very great effect upon them. It had been suggested that the Government should deal with the question. This was not a very opportune moment for making that suggestion, and certainly he could give no undertaking in the matter. To him it seemed that the question was one which would most fitly be dealt with by those persons who took an intelligent view of it, such as had been expressed in the House that night, communicating with the right rev. Bench. Any proposals that might be made as a result would not meet with discouragement from the Government.

LORD DENMAN said, the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London) had expressed a wish for something practicable. He (Lord Denman) could recollect the removal of a house stone by stone and timber by timber to a distance of three miles; and he thought that churches might be removed to the more healthy places to which City congregations had migrated, and even their ministers go with them.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he thought their Lordships would share his opinion that the speech in which the noble Earl had introduced this question was most interesting. Nevertheless, the state of mind of noble Lords was rather nebulous in regard to the question. They all desired some improvement in the present state of things; but even the noble Earl himself did not appear to perceive more clearly than the rest of the House the precise mode in which that improvement could be made. He would not, therefore, express any opinion on the general subject; but he agreed with the most rev. Primate that the difficulty had always been the Vestry and the Vestry clerk. A letter had been sent to him by the Rev. W. J. Hall, President of Sion College, who took very grave exceptions to the kind of evidence on which this movement was based. The rev. gentleman said that in the Return 125 was given as the number of his congregation. The rev. gentleman demurred to the census being taken exclusively on Sunday morning, and stated that the number of attendances in his church in the years 1876, 1877, 1878, 1879, and 1880, were 117,500. These figures showed a yearly average of 23,500, or a weekly attendance of something like 450 persons, which would not seem an inadequate number for the spiritual ministrations of a single incumbent. He did not venture to state any opinion in opposition to that which both spiritual and temporal Members of that House had expressed as to the existence of a grievance which required redress; but he had merely said these few words in order to impress on their Lordships' minds that these statistics ought to be received with care.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—MORTALITY AT THE GOLD COAST.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT BURY asked, Whether it is the fact that there has been during the Spring much mortality and sickness among the troops stationed at the Gold Coast, particularly in the 2nd West India Regiment; whether such mortality and sickness is not greatly aggravated by unhealthy quarters and by road making during the hottest hours of the day; and whether any steps have been taken to prevent the recurrence of such of these evils as are due to preventable causes? The noble Lord said that he had the evidence of eye witnesses that the regiment referred to arrived at the Gold Coast at the rainy season of the year, no preparations having been made for them; and that they were quartered in the worst part of the town—the sanitary condition of which was frightful. The consequence was that fever broke out, and that great hardships were endured by both officers and men. It had been stated by Mr. Childers that the men had been put under canvas, and that the health of the regiment had since been better; but he (Viscount Bury) was informed that the climate did not allow of men being put under canvas, and that as soon as they were so quartered the medical authorities were chiefly exercised in devising means for getting them out of it. He was also told that troops were landed on the Gold Coast at a season when they could not be employed up the country, and when they might perfectly well be detained at St. Helena, only a few days distant. And not only, he believed, were the troops made to work in the hottest part of the day, but they were not allowed to carry umbrellas or other head coverings, although the thermometer stood at over 100 degrees in the shade. The rationing of the troops, too, he understood, was unsatisfactory. Necessaries were so dear that the 1s. a-day allowed to the men was not enough; and animals sent from Sierra Leone for their consumption were in such a diseased state that the men refused to eat them. Of course, he did not impute any blame to the Government for this state of things, which was no doubt due to the action of officers on the spot; but he should be glad to hear from the noble Earl opposite how matters really stood. He felt it was his duty to ask these Questions, and he believed the lives of Her Majesty's troops were dear to their Lordships on both sides of the House.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that the welfare of our troops must always be a subject of great interest. In answering his noble Friend, he would recall to his mind that when the troops were sent to the Gold Coast fears existed that difficulties would arise between ourselves and the King of Ashantee. It was consequently necessary to send a large body of men to that Colony, and the Government telegraphed to the West Indies that the 2nd West India Regiment must proceed to Africa without delay. It was not possible to detain the troops at St. Helena, because it was anticipated that an attack might be made on our Colony. It was not a question of sending troops into the interior, for it would have been difficult, if not impossible, at that season of the year to send troops into the jungle; but it was a question of defending the possessions of Her Majesty at the Coast. He ventured to say that the prompt presence of the troops which were ordered to repair to the Colony had a most useful and quieting effect. There was undoubtedly considerable mortality among the troops, the climate on the coast, always unhealthy, being specially so when they were there. But in the 2nd West India Regiment only one officer died in April. It was true that out of 55 officers 21 were on leave. The barrack accommodation in the Colony was limited, and the troops had therefore to be housed in Fantee towns, in huts, and under canvas. In the early days of the month of April the sanitary condition of the Fantee towns was pronounced to be very bad by the principal medical officer, and the troops had to be removed from them, and placed under canvas. The malaria fevers which prevailed in April and May attacked the men when they were in tents with less violence than when they were in the Fantee towns. The medical officers would call the attention of the local authorities to the desirability of trying to mitigate the unhealthiness of the Colony. In a case of great emergency it was, of course, impossible to make provisions which should be absolutely satisfactory in so unhealthy a quarter. With regard to the question of supplies, he had to say that as soon as the telegram was despatched ordering the departure of the 2nd West India Regiment, orders were also given for the despatch of a large quantity of supplies, which arrived at the Colony on March 12, and were landed on the 17th. The 2nd West India Regiment did not arrive until March 19. The supplies consisted of preserved meats, biscuits, lime-juice, and other stores. In fact, there were abundant supplies in addition to those sent from Sierra Leone. Supplies and cattle were also sent from Sierra Leone. It was known that some of the cattle on that coast was unhealthy; but the fact that the consumption of fresh meat by the troops at the Gold Coast increased in each month during their stay there proved conclusively that the disease was not so general as the noble Viscount assumed, and that there were a considerable number of cattle which were not unfit for food. Another point that had been raised referred to the route-marching of the troops, and their employment in road-making. Well, on May 8, the officer in command of the troops said he had discontinued route-marching, as in their delicate state of health it was trying to officers and men. The road-making, he said, would continue, for the working parties were healthy, and worked willingly for the extra pay which they earned. It was clear from these statements that the officer in command was not unmindful of the health of his troops. The garrison at the Gold Coast was now almost reduced to its normal strength. The headquarters of the 2nd West India Regiment left the Gold Coast for the West Indies on June 16. He did not deny that troops ran great risk of disease and fever on the Gold Coast, especially in the unhealthy seasons. No one, however, could be held responsible for the illness which had prevailed. It was the result of natural causes, and causes which, under those circumstances, were unavoidable. He would only add, in conclusion, that on the occasion to which the Question of the noble Viscount referred most valuable services were rendered by the troops which were despatched to the Gold Coast, for though they not called upon to take the field their presence not improbably prevented serious complications.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, the question was not as to the time when the supplies arrived at the Gold Coast, but as to the time when they were issued to the troops. According to the information which his noble Friend (Viscount Bury) had received, there were no stores issued during the months of March and April. As the question was a very serious one, it would be satisfactory to ascertain whether these stores when they arrived were immediately issued, or at what time they were issued.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, he should like to have a more full and categorical reply to the question raised by the noble Duke who had just sat down. If there was any truth in the allegations of the noble Lord who had brought this subject before their Lordships, a serious case, not only of mismanagement, but of corruption could be based upon the charges which he made. All who knew anything of the circumstances of the Gold Coast must be aware that it was almost, if not quite, the most unhealthy station to which troops could be sent. Though in recent years there had been an improvement in the general health of the White population on the coast, no one could doubt that the health of troops hastily moved to that Colony for special purposes must be very seriously jeopardized. When he was at the Colonial Office he had in view some arrangements as to barracks; and he should recommend to the Government that such provision should be made for the better accommodation of the troops at the Gold Coast as might at any time be needed. So long as we held that station, so long should we be exposed from time to time to the dangers of sudden and sometimes very serious incursions from Ashantee and elsewhere. The employment of any White troops in that part of the world was very undesirable; and, therefore, it should not be forgotten that the West India Regiments were officered by Englishmen. He hoped the excellent practice of training a sufficient Houssa force would not be departed from. So long as they maintained that force in a state of efficiency, they would be free, as a rule, from Ashantee invasions; but if the force was allowed to deteriorate they would always be threatened with this danger.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) presumed that when the stores arrived at the Gold Coast they were distributed; but special inquiry would be made. With regard to the general question brought before the House, he might repeat that the troops had been sent to the Gold Coast to meet an extraordinary and sudden emergency. They had not the slightest intimation of the proceedings of the King of Ashantee until they heard that an Ashantee invasion of the Gold Coast was imminent. They then ordered troops to be forwarded from the West Indies without delay to the Gold Coast, and a detachment also went from Sierra Leone. He was bound to say that the troops sent there had the effect of preventing what might have been a most dangerous and troublesome war. As to the provision of the barracks, he hardly thought it possible they could build a considerable number of barracks to be kept there only to be used in an emergency. That would be a great burden on the Colony. Before these occurrences took place there were not more than 180 men quartered there, and at present there were not more than 350, and they would soon be able to reduce the force to its normal number. With regard to the Houssa force, his noble Friend would be glad to hear that this most valuable force was kept up to a high state of efficiency. He (the Earl of Kimberley) fully recognized their value, and was not likely to overlook them, particularly as they were organized while he was in Office on a former occasion. The Houssas were men who could be thoroughly relied upon; they were born soldiers; they were temperate because Mahomedans; they were perfectly faithful and amenable to discipline. On several occasions parties had been sent far into the interior to recruit, and the response was always friendly. An attempt had recently been made to induce the Houssas to settle near the Coast, with their wives and families. The real difficulty was that there was a difficulty in procuring a sufficient number of recruits. As to the Coast, he feared the climate and the deficiency of sanitary arrangements there would lead to the loss of valuable officers; but everything that was within their power was being done to remedy the evils which existed.

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE (SCOTLAND)
BILL.—(No. 142.)

(The Lord Watson.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."
—(The Lord Watson.)

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, there were some points in the Bill on which it would be desirable to have explanations before the Bill was passed, as it appeared some persons might be deprived of their property if absent, even through no fault of their own, as might easily happen to officers in the Navy through shipwreck.

LORD WATSON said, that he hesitated to trouble the House, at that stage, with any details of what was purely a legal Bill, and that for this reason—the Bill had passed through all its stages in the other House, and was there considered by a Select Committee composed of Scotch and English lawyers, who were very well qualified to deal with the subject. He quite confessed that there were many matters of detail connected with the several clauses of the Bill which required grave consideration, and it certainly was not his intention that the measure should be pressed through the House without receiving consideration. He could assure his noble Friend that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack and the noble and learned Earl his Predecessor in Office (Earl Cairns) had both undertaken to consider the details of the Bill before it passed through Committee. He should be very happy to receive communications on the subject from any quarter, and to consider them before the Bill passed through Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the general object of the Bill was to lay down rules as to the period of time within which an absent person might be presumed to be alive. He had no hesitation in approving generally of the Bill; but whether any particular clauses might require alteration was another question.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>d</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eight o'clock, till To-morrow,

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—SUB-POST-MASTERS.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that the salaries of some of the sub-postmasters in Ireland are, and have been for the last twenty years, as low as £3 per annum, with a very small commission on the sale of stamps; and whether for this sum they have to attend their offices from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. on all week days; whether during the last twenty years the business of many of these has considerably increased; and, whether any representations have been made to him as to the inadequacy of this remuneration?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that the remuneration of sub-postmasters, not only in Ireland, but in the rest of the United Kingdom, partly depends upon the amount of business done. A commission is paid on the sale of stamps, and also upon the issue of Money Orders and Postal Orders, as well as upon each savings bank transaction. Hitherto no commission has been given, except in London, upon registered letters. I lately made a proposal to the Treasury that such a commission should be given, and I am glad to be able to say that the Treasury have agreed that in the future a commission shall be given to sub-postmasters and town receivers upon all registered letters, whether issued or delivered. The minimum salary of £3 a-year, which is received by many sub-postmasters, not only in Ireland, but also in the rest of the United Kingdom, does not, it is evident, after what has just been stated, represent the whole remuneration which they receive. As a general rule, a small portion only of their time is occupied. These post offices are usually at shops, to which they attract additional business. At any rate, whenever there is a post office vacant, I believe it is the case that there are a great number of applicants for the appointment.

NAVY—H.M.S. "VANGUARD."

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why it was that the Admiralty refused to give Captain

Coppin (the contractor for the raising of H.M.S. "Vanguard") an extension of time for so doing, notwithstanding the fact that he wrote to say he would pay all expenses which may be incurred in accordance with the 16th clause of his contract; and, if they were aware at the time that the contractor had laid out over fifteen hundred pounds in preparing for this work?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, my hon. Friend will be aware that this is rather an old story, the responsibility for which rests with the late Board. In May, 1877, Captain Coppin contracted to raise the Vanguard by the 31st of October, 1878. It was a matter of importance that the work should be done quickly, since the masts were a great danger to navigation, and a lightship had to be kept on the spot at the expense of the Admiralty. On the 25th of August, 1878, Captain Coppin applied for an extension of time, and their Lordships declined, on the ground that—"There is no evidence whatever to prove that progress has been made in providing the necessary plant for raising the ship."

In September Captain Coppin applied again, and was told that he still "refrained from giving any evidence of preparations made during the past two years." Then, on the 10th of October, Captain Coppin sent in a detail of alleged expenditure amounting to nearly £20,000; but of this over £18,000 was for the steamer Sherbro and its fittings. Now, it so happened that on this very 10th of October the Sherbro was ordered to be sold by the liquidators of the Salvage Steamship Company; and the balance of Captain Coppin's account was of a nature which did not bear serious examination. Five hundred pounds of it was for Captain Coppin's own time and expenses. The fact is, that no solid and real work had been done towards raising the ship, and the Admiralty had no choice but to allow the contract to expire, in order that the masts might be blown up with gun-cotton, and the navigation once more rendered safe, which service was carried out without delay.

STATE OF IRELAND—CAR OWNERS—RENEWAL OF LICENCES.

MR. LALOR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he is aware that a copy of the following Minute has been forwarded to respectable publicans in the Queen's County:—

Mr. O'Sullivan

"Maryborough Quarter Sessions Court,
"21st June, 1881.

"Sub-inspector Grene having reported to the Bench that several licensed persons in the district had since last quarter sessions obstructed the constabulary in the discharge of their duty by refusing to lend them cars for their conveyance on duty, the Chairman directed the sub-inspector to give notice to the parties referred to, that their licences would not be renewed at next annual licensing petty sessions;"

and, if magistrates in petty sessions in Ireland have the legal power to refuse to renew the licences of respectable persons because they refused to lend or hire their cars to constables?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): Sir, I find that the magistrates assembled at quarter sessions at Maryborough on the 21st of June made the Minute stated in the Question of the hon. Member, subject to this qualification—that the refusal referred to was not a refusal to lend cars to the constabulary, but a refusal to hire them. Magistrates in petty sessions in Ireland have, I apprehend, legal power to withhold their certificate of "good character" from any licensed publican keeping cars for public hire who is shown to have assisted in obstructing the constabulary in the discharge of their legal duties by refusing to hire them the cars which he professes to keep for hire by all comers. The object of the Minute in question was, no doubt, that the police should give such publicans due notice that their applications for certificates of good character would be opposed.

MR. HEALY asked whether the refusal to give cars implied bad character?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW): The refusal to give cars to the constabulary for the purpose of obstructing them in the reasonable discharge of their duty would, I think, be inconsistent with the maintenance of a good character.

TURKEY—THE LATE SULTAN ABDUL AZIZ—TRIAL OF MIDHAT PASHA.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE (for Mr. STAVELEY HILL) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has been instructed to call the attention of the Advisers of the Sultan to the allegations of the grave irregularities in the trial of Midhat Pasha, and to urge upon His Majesty that the execution of that distinguished statesman upon the result of such a trial may be regarded as a judicial murder brought about by political rivals?

MR. M'COAN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Christoferides Effendi, who presided at the recent trial of Midhat Pasha, is identical with the person of the same name who, in May 1871, was an employé of the Turkish Ministry of Police?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, with regard to the first Question, I have to say that this is a somewhat delicate matter. I have already said that communications are passing. Looking to the object which the hon. Member has in view, it would not be wise that I should make any public statement at the present time. The second Question I must answer in the affirmative.

MR. M'COAN said, that as the hon. Baronet had answered his Question in the affirmative, he hoped the House would permit him to add a short rejoinder to that answer. In view of his ability to prove against Christoferides Effendi the grossest corruption in other political functions, he appealed to the Government, in the interests of justice and humanity, to use its influence with the Turkish Government to procure for Midhat Pasha a new trial before an impartial tribunal, or, at least, to have him banished to Europe instead of to some remote Turkish Province, where his early death would be certain.

FRANCE—MOBILIZATION OF AN ARMY CORPS.

MR. NORTHCOTE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the truth of the report published in several daily newspapers of the intention of the French Government to mobilise a force of 120,000 men?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, we have reason to believe that there is no intention on the part of the French Government to mobilize any force at all.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—TRAVELLING EXPENSES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in the case of persons arrested under the Coercion Acts, their return travelling expenses have been paid when discharged from prison at a distance from their homes; if not, whether he will arrange about this in future?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the Protection of Person and Property Act provided that travelling expenses should be paid in the case of those prisoners who were discharged at a distance of more than five miles from their homes. If the hon. Member knew of any such cases in which the proper expenses had not been allowed, he should be glad to have information on the point.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT—REGULATIONS AS TO VISITORS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that since Monday last a notice to the following effect is placed in the hands of persons visiting their friends in Kilmainham Prison:—

"The attention of visitors is requested to the rule that conversation with, and letters to, prisoners detained under warrant issued pursuant to the Protection of Person and Property (Ireland) Act should be confined to business and personal matters, and that, in case of political matters being introduced into conversation by visitors or prisoners, the visit will be brought to a close.

"(Signed) Governor.

"4th July 1881."

if it is true that a Member of this House was on Monday last refused permission to copy this notice—first by a warder, and next by the Governor—until he insisted on his right to do so, and gave them the choice of making himself a copy, or temporarily retaining for that purpose the paper which had been placed in his hands; whether he approves of the original refusal of the prison authorities to allow a copy to be made of a document intended for public guidance; if its issue had his knowledge and sanction; and, if he will state which of the eighteen rules made by the Lord

Lieutenant as to the treatment of prisoners (dated 14th March) is the rule referred to in the foregoing notice?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was cognizant of the Notice which had been placed in the hands of persons visiting their friends in Kilmainham. He was also aware that a Member of the House was refused permission to copy this notice. He admitted it would have been better if the prison authorities had allowed that Member to have a copy of the notice in the first instance; but he did not think it was a matter of very great consequence. It was a regulation which the Governor had a right to make.

MR. HEALY asked how it was that during the four months the Act had been in operation no such rule or regulation was thought necessary?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could only state that it was found necessary to do this.

FRENCH COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

MR. JACKSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If Her Majesty's Government will ask permission to send a representative of England to be present at the Conference about to be held to discuss the terms of Commercial Treaties between France and Belgium?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government cannot make any such proposal, as it would be certain to be declined. I have already stated in this House that it would, I believe, be without precedent for a third Power to ask to take part in commercial negotiations between two other countries. If, however, the French Government were inclined to consent to an examination by delegates of the Powers affected of the proposed specific duties, Her Majesty's Government would make no objection.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—NAAS GOAL.

MR. LALOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, During how many hours in the day, and in what amount of space, are the prisoners who are confined under the Peace Preservation Act in Naas Goal permitted to take exercise?

Mr. Healy

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the prisoners referred to were allowed to take exercise for four hours a day, and two hours of association in the large hall of the prison.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS ACTS— THE ELECTION COMMISSIONS— EXPENSES.

MR. H. H. FOWLER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will lay upon the Table a statement of the costs of the Election Commissions, showing the principal items, and whether such costs have been revised or audited?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, if my hon. Friend will move for a statement of the costs of the Election Commissions, showing the principal items, there will be no objection to giving it. The costs in each case have been examined at the Treasury before being allowed.

WAYS AND MEANS—INLAND REVENUE —AFFIDAVITS OF EXECUTORS.

MR. H. H. FOWLER asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the affidavit of executors disclosing the amount of the debts of their testator is not a confidential document for the exclusive use of the Revenue officials; and, if so, if he will state by whose authority the contents of these affidavits are communicated to the public press?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the affidavits referred to in the Question are strictly confidential. Their communication to the Press would be wholly unauthorized, and, if made by an official, would render him liable to dismissal. The subject is now under the consideration of the officials at the Probate Registry, with a view to insure that the particulars contained in the affidavits are not allowed to transpire.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE ACT AMENDMENT BILL—FLOGGING.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether Her Majesty's Government will be inclined to grant a Committee of this House to inquire into the provisions of the Naval Discipline Act Amendment Bill, in accordance with the wish of Naval officers who are members of both political parties in this House, as shown by the Notice on the Order Book, which there has been no opportunity to discuss; and, whether, seeing that the infliction of the sentence of corporal punishment can be suspended by Order in Council, Her Majesty's Government will, in preference, consider the prudence of so suspending it, rather than abolish entirely a punishment which, especially on distant and detached service and in time of war, is held by many essential to the maintenance of the discipline of the Navy?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, with regard to the first part of the Question, the Government are not willing to grant a Committee which would re-open the question of corporal punishment. That punishment has been abolished in the Army, and the Government, as far as in them lies, have decided to abolish it in the Navy. I understand that the right hon. and gallant Baronet is prepared to apply to the Naval Discipline Act Amendment Bill an amount of unfavourable criticism, which will take it out of the category of measures which the Government proposed to press. Under these circumstances, the Bill will not be proceeded with this year; but a Circular Letter will at once be written to commanders-in-chief and senior officers acquainting them that all the Regulations authorizing the use of the lash as a summary punishment are to be considered as cancelled; that as the powers of courts martial to award sentences of flogging can only be removed by legislation, commanders-in-chief are to take care that such sentences are not carried into effect without reference to the Admiralty in each case; and that the president of every court martial should be advised that corporal punishment should not form part of the sentence. This letter will, I think, meet the views of the right hon. and gallant Member, as expressed in the last part of his Question.

SIR JOHN HAY said, the hon. Gentleman had conceded what he desired.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF EDMUND GALLEY.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has considered the Memorial presented to him by more than 5,000 of the inhabitants of the county of Devon, on behalf of the convict Edmund Galley, to whom the House of Commons unanimously, in 1879, prayed Her Majesty to grant a free pardon; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will award him compensation for his sufferings abroad for a period of upwards of forty years, so that he may be enabled to pass the residue of his life in his native country?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes, Sir; I have seriously considered the Petition; but, as my hon. and learned Friend knows, this matter was fully considered in the House of Commons in 1879. After that consideration of the matter, I should not feel justified in awarding the compensation to which he refers.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, that in consequence of the answer of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he would feel it his duty to call attention to the subject on going into Committee of Supply.

ARMY—DEATHS BY SUNSTROKE AT ALDERSHOT.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will state the numbers of the regiments to which the three men belonged who died at Aldershot of sunstroke the other day, in consequence of those regiments "hurrying the pace" in their anxiety to get back to their lines; if he will cause the commanding officers of those regiments to be reminded that anxiety to get back to luncheon or dinner does not justify them in setting aside the General Orders with respect to "marching" which have long been in existence for the safety and well-being of the troops; and, whether he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing, by regiments, the total number of men who fell out of the ranks on the 4th of July? He also wished to ask, Whether it is true that no less than six deaths have now occurred?

MR. CHILDERS: No, Sir; it is not true. In reply to the Question of which my hon. and gallant Friend has given Notice, I have to state that two of the three men who died of sunstroke on the 4th instant belonged to the 1st Battalion of the Royal West Surrey Regiment (the Queen's), and one to the 3rd or Militia Battalion of the Middlesex Regiment. Of these three men, two were, as I stated the other day, found on the inquest to be predisposed to sunstroke, by habit of body. The instructions issued last Tuesday about exercising the troops in hot weather give, in the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief, a sufficient warning to commanding officers. With reference to the last part of the Question, I see no occasion to give this detailed Return, which would be of no practical value to the House. If my hon. and gallant Friend will call on me, he is welcome to see the Returns.

ARMY VETERINARY SURGEONS—WARRANT OF 1878.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether certain actuarial calculations, bearing upon the reconsideration of the Army Veterinary Warrant of 1878, and which the late Secretary of State for War stated in the House of Commons, on the 7th August 1879, were necessary in order to enable him to form an opinion as to the necessity of altering the terms of the Warrant in question, have been completed; and, if so, has he come to any conclusion as to the reasonableness of the complaints of Army veterinary surgeons as regards the operation of the Warrant of 1878, and is it contemplated to modify the terms of the present Warrant so as to remove the disabilities complained of?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. and gallant Friend's Question, I find that the actuaries' calculations to which he refers were completed in September, 1879; but that after considering them, the late Government determined not to alter the Warrant of 1878.

ARMY ESTIMATES—NATAL AND THE TRANSVAAL MILITARY EXPENDITURE.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, antecedent to the approaching Debate, he will place upon the Table any Supplementary Estimate of the Military Expenses incurred between the 1st of January and the 1st of July of the present year, together with a statement of the number of Troops of all arms now stationed in Natal and the Transvaal?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, so far as we can at present calculate, and I think that our information is accurate, no Supplementary Estimates will be required for military expenses on account of the troops in Natal and the Transvaal between the 1st of January and the 1st of July instant, and we are at present considering with the Colonial Office what reduction can be made, and when, in the garrisons of that part of South Africa. If my noble Friend will move for a statement of the number of troops now in Natal and in the Transvaal, it shall be given without delay.

STATE OF IRELAND—CO. LIMERICK—
SHERIFF'S SEIZURE FOR RENT.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that the sheriff of the county of Limerick, accompanied by several hundred soldiers and police, seized on twenty-eight cows, the property of Mr. Patrick Browne, on the 23rd ultimo, for one year's rent due to Charles John Coote; whether four respectable and substantial persons offered the sheriff to go security for the amount due if the cows were allowed to remain on the farm until Mr. Browne (who was undergoing a surgical operation in Cork) returned home; whether the sheriff refused this security; and, if so, could he state the grounds on which he did so; did he send the cows to Limerick City, a distance of twenty-three miles, to be sold, in the place of keeping them at the local pound at Kilmallock; is it true that Browne owed only one year's rent up to last Gale day, and was put to £45 5s. costs by his landlord, which he had to pay; and, whether this seizure occurred on the same property as the eviction of Denis Murphy with his wife and six children, which took place in the same parish last month?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was true that the sub-sheriff of Limerick did seize for one year's rent the cows referred to; but he was informed that it was not a fact that four respectable and substantial persons offered to become security, and that no actual offer of the kind was made at all. The real facts were that when the cattle were driven to Kilmallock by order of the sub-sheriff some of Mr. Browne's relations begged the principal local Land Leaguers to sign a security for the rent; but when it came to a question of security they declined. The cattle were taken by train to Limerick. Had the cattle been kept in Kilmallock serious disturbances and riots might have been the result. In addition to paying the year's rent, £158, Mr. Browne had to pay £45 14s. costs. It would be more correct to say that Mr. Browne was put to this extra expense by the Land League rather than by the landlord. He was informed that Mr. Browne was a rich and prosperous farmer, holding under more than one landlord, and well able to pay his rent. He refused to pay the rent at first in obedience to the Land League; and, as Mr. Browne was a very respectable man, he attributed that refusal to terrorism. His reason for that opinion was that he was informed that some months ago Mr. Browne was suspected of having paid his rent, and in consequence was "Boycotted" at market and could not sell his farm produce. On another occasion his sons were hunted through Kilmallock by a violent mob, because their father was suspected of paying his rent, and they had to be rescued by the police. It was true that the seizure was made on the same day that Denis Murphy was put out of the farm of which he took forcible possession, and to which he had no claim whatever.

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT (INDIA)
—THE CIVIL ENGINEERS.

MR. CARBUTT asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether any scheme for the reorganization of the Indian Public Works Department is under contemplation, and whether it would in due course be laid before the House; and, whether due consideration would in any such scheme be given to the frequent request from the Civil Engineers in the service for an amelioration of their pension rules, and for equality of treatment generally with officers of the Royal Engineers in the same service?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the question of re-organizing the Engineering branch of the Public Works Department in India is now receiving the consideration of the Home Government, and due attention will be given to representations which have been made in respect to the pension rules and to the position generally of the officers of the Department. The question will form the subject of communications between the Secretary of State and the Government of India, and when a scheme has been settled there will be no objection to lay the same before the House.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS IN CORK.

MR. DALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that at Cork, on Monday 4th July, Mr. John O'Connor, of that city, was arrested under a warrant charging him with being suspected of treasonable practices; whether it is true that on Wednesday 6th July, Mr. Patrick J. Murphy, a town councillor of the borough of Cork, was arrested at Cork under a warrant charging him with being suspected of treasonable practices; whether it is true that the treasonable practices alleged against these gentlemen consisted in their having advised members of the Royal Irish Constabulary to resign their positions in that Force, and to emigrate rather than to assist in evicting from their homes their fellow-countrymen and their families; and, whether, if this be not the reason for those arrests, he will state to this House when and on what occasions the treasonable practices were committed on suspicion of being concerned in which these gentlemen were arrested?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he hoped the hon. Member would not think it discourteous in him if he gave the same answer to this which he had given to similar Questions—namely, that he could not state the grounds. It would be found in the Warrant that the persons named had been arrested on reasonable suspicion.

MR. DALY wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman would answer the concluding paragraph of his Question?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he must decline to answer it further than he had done.

MR. DALY said, that as the right hon. Gentleman declined to answer the Question he should feel it his duty to call attention to the subject. [Cries of "Order!"] He had no desire to obstruct Business; but any reasonable man would think him justified in raising a question which involved the liberty of two of his constituents. [Renewed cries of "Order!"] He would conclude with a Motion. During the present Assize Circuit, testimony proceeding from the Judges had been given to the great improvement which had taken place in Ireland; and the testimony of an unwilling witness as to the improved demeanour of the people was given by the Irish Correspondent of The Times in that morning's paper. The two men who were arrested were personally known to himself. Mr. O'Connor he had known for a series of years, and he knew that in honour and respectability he need yield to no man in that House. Mr. Murphy was a well known Councilor in the Corporation of which he (Mr. Daly) was an Alderman; and, therefore, he could speak not only as to his respectability, but also to the part he had taken in public affairs. He (Mr. Daly) could not but think, taking into account the improved state of things in the country, that these arrests must create in the minds of many the greatest apprehension, for they had no assurance why or when they might not be deprived of their liberty like these two gentlemen. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had been intrusted with extraordinary power; but it was intrusted to him to meet a state of things which it was acknowledged did not exist now, if the testimony of the Irish Judges was to be accepted. It was no answer for the Chief Secretary to say he could give no information. These two men would, perhaps, lose their lives from this imprisonment, and certainly would lose their social position. Their arrest in no way afforded any protection to the State, but would be fruitful in keeping up, by intention, the agitation that unfortunately did exist in Ireland. He protested against these arrests; and every Member who took any interest in Constitutional liberty was bound to see that the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant answered the questions which had been asked in a satisfactory manner. He begged to move that the House do now adjourn.

MR. PARNELL said, he rose to second the Motion as a protest against the arrest of two of the most respectable men in the City of Cork, and against whom the Government could find no cause of accusation whatever as regards their connection with the Land League. The Government, therefore, had taken refuge in a charge of this kind, which could be trumped up against anybody, and the details of which they refused to give. It was most desirable that the House should know how this matter rested. Information was not wanted when it was of a secret character, and when it was desirable to keep it secret. They recognized, to the fullest extent, the discretion of the Chief Secretary not to give information where it was likely to lead to any violence against the party who had given the information on which the arrest had taken place. But the vast majority of those imprisoned under the Coercion Act had been arrested for acts openly and publicly committed, and speeches delivered on public platforms and in presence of Government shorthand writers. Therefore, it was, in such cases, impossible that the Chief Secretary could make the excuse which he advanced during the passing of the Coercion Bill, that the information must be kept secret. It was perfectly impossible, from the nature of the case, that Mr. O'Connor or Mr. Murphy could have been arrested for any secret offence. His hon. Friend had asked whether Mr. O'Connor was arrested for the speech he had delivered in the presence of the Government shorthand writers, and which was reported in all the newspapers, in which he advised the Irish Constabulary to emigrate; and the details for which he asked were refused. It was manifest to everybody that the details asked for in that case—if the alleged allegation in the Question was correct—could not endanger anyone. In the case of all those highly respectable men who had been arrested in Ireland, the Government could give the requisite information without endangering in the slightest degree the safety of any individual, because, in most cases, the information was derived from the shorthand writers and the public newspapers. When the Coercion Act, which, they maintained, was so shamefully abused, was passed, they predicted it could be used for the purpose of putting down open combinations, and open and advised speaking in Ireland. The Chief Secretary said he wanted it to put down "village ruffians;" but the result had justified their expectation that it would be used to arrest the leaders of the Land League in Ireland. Mr. O'Connor was a man who had done more than anyone else in Cork to prevent outrages, and yet he had been arrested upon a vague charge. It should be known to the world that there were now in prison over 200 respectable men, and the Government refused to give to the House the information on which they had been arrested. The Prime Minister had told them that every arrest would be open to challenge on the floor of the House; but when they impugned the conduct of the Chief Secretary they were told he was ready to meet any charge of censure they might move against him. But the fact was they could not support a Motion of Censure without the information for which they sought in vain. Of course, if the Chief Secretary was conscious that he was abusing the powers intrusted to him, those extraordinary powers were a most important protection to him; but he asked whether it was fair to those 200 respectable men—the majority of whom he would say were as respectable as any hon. Member of that House. Those men were entitled to know the offences with which they were charged, and it was useless for the Chief Secretary to shelter himself behind the allegation that the House had intrusted him with the power he possessed. The power was intrusted to him to use against the “village ruffian,” and he had used it against town councillors, clergymen, and Members of Parliament—against anybody but those for whom the Act was passed; and they had no hesitation in saying that, if the truth were known, it would be seen that the offences of those men who were imprisoned were offences against which the Act was not originally directed. They had taken too little notice of these outrageous arrests, and permitted the character of those gentlemen who were imprisoned to be taken away by the Chief Secretary. He protested against the information which was asked being so persistently refused by the Chief Secretary.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That this House do now adjourn.”—(Mr. Daly.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would not enter into the details asked by the hon. Gentlemen; but it must not be supposed that he admitted the correctness of their statements. He acted thus in the belief that, in the opinion of the House, he ought not to enter into details. He did not admit the interpretation the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) put upon what he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had said at the time the Coercion Act was brought in, neither did he agree in his statements with regard to the prisoners themselves. In regard to the two cases in question, he did not feel obliged to give the special grounds for the arrest of these prisoners any more than he did for the others. He should follow now the course he took on the arrest of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon)—a course which was supported by the majority of the House. On that occasion he stated that, when the adjournment of the House was moved, and when the sense of the House could not be definitely taken on the issue raised, the Government did not think they ought to enter into any defence of the action they had taken; but he was quite ready to defend that action whenever a definite charge was brought, and the Government had the opportunity of meeting it.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, that, in all probability, for every guilty man arrested by the Government there were five or six innocent men. The Question of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Daly), or, at any rate, the first portion of it, might reasonably have been answered without any great departure from the principles hitherto maintained by the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman did not now follow the course he took on the arrest of the hon. Member for Tipperary, for he then quoted from speeches which the hon. Member had made.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I did so in reply to a definite Question.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA did not know whether the present Motion of the hon. Member for the City of Cork was definite enough to enable them to get at the root of the complaints against Mr. John O'Connor and Mr. Patrick Murphy. He knew one of these men, and was sure he was innocent of anything justifying his arrest. His desire, and the desire of those who supported the Motion, was to obtain sufficient information to enable the friends of Mr. O'Connor and Mr. Murphy to prove, or at least attempt to prove, and establish their innocence; but they could not do so unless they were made aware of the grounds of suspicion on which they had been arrested. These almost indiscriminate arrests were calculated to add fuel to the flame in Ireland rather than to extinguish it.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, the Chief Secretary had declined to give information on a Motion for the adjournment of the House, and, only last week, when a noble Lord (Viscount Sandon) moved the adjournment of the House because the Government had not furnished a translation into English of a document already issued in French, the Prime Minister said he did not complain, because the question was one of public importance, and there was no chance of finding another opportunity to bring it forward. These arrests were surely matters of as much importance as an English translation of a French document; and there was, therefore, some authority for the Chief Secretary to deviate from what he said was his course, and to give some information on the Motion for Adjournment. There was a danger of the House getting gradually accustomed to these arrests, and losing sight of what was involved in the suspension of the Constitution; and, therefore, there was good reason why the attention of Members should be emphatically called to each successive arrest when it was made. From day to day there were now being arrested in Ireland men of the highest character on no stated charge, and without any information being given to the House. They appeared to be arrested not even on the suspicion of their having committed any crime, but because they were active members of the Land League, which had been authoritatively declared to be not an illegal body. Every English Member who valued Constitutional liberty ought to join in protesting in some way against these arrests. As there was no other means of doing it, the Irish Members were driven to move the adjournment of the House.

MR. DAWSON said, that, as a Member of the Municipality of Dublin, he thanked the hon. Member who was connected with the Municipality of Cork for asking the reasons why a member of that body had been arrested. It was not worthy of the Chief Secretary to take refuge in a mere point of Order, or to speak of the absence of a definite charge. Were he the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Daly) he would not allow the right hon. Gentleman to have any such excuse. If he could actuate the Irish Party, if he could influence the Irish nation, if he could bring the Party to which he belonged to a sense of duty, he would not be content with asking Questions and making Motions in that House, but would draw the attention of Europe to the frivolous nature of the charges brought against Irishmen. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen did not laugh when the attention of Europe was directed, as it was at the Congress of Berlin, to the conduct of Turkey. They did not laugh when attention was drawn to the treatment of foreign prisoners. If Ireland could only be transplanted into Bulgaria or Naples—if they could only substitute in the history of Ireland the name of Mazzini or Garibaldi for O'Connell, hon. Gentlemen would act very differently. As a member of the Corporation of Dublin, he had to say that he thanked his hon. Friend for having had the courage and the good sense to call attention to the incarceration of one of his colleagues; because, when the Government imprisoned the representatives of the people of Ireland without trial they did a dangerous, impolitic, and an unstatesmanlike thing. He wished to affirm, as he had done previously, that the police of Ireland were not preservers of civil order, but were, in every respect, a military force. They were a noble body of men, whose moral character deserved the warmest support; but they were essentially a military force. He was in the country a few days ago, when he saw a man driving a horse and cart; the man, as if seized with a fit, fell from the cart, and the horse moved on unattended. There were standing by three stalwart policemen, and what did they do? These guardians of civil order and peace turned upon their heels, ran into their barracks, and shut themselves up. [A laugh.] It might be a laughable matter for those who wished to take it in a comic sense; but he went to the barracks and told the police authorities that he should bring the matter, if necessary, before the notice of the House of Commons. Then they condescended to turn out and assist the unfortunate driver. This instance only showed that the police were schooled or more inclined to sniff out cases of treason than to discharge their primary duties, which the people of Ireland had a right to expect from them. He had great pleasure in supporting the Motion, and trusted every subsequent arrest of the kind would be followed by a notice such as the present.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant was not able to be present on the occasion of the close of a debate in the House a short time back on a substantive Motion bearing on the question now under consideration, because some suggestions were made as to what might be done in order to allay the prevailing widespread suspicion that many innocent men had been arrested under the Coercion Act. Without doubt, the right hon. Gentleman was within his right in concealing from the public the evidence on which his warrants of arrest were issued; but, at any rate, he ought to permit persons so arrested to lay before him statements in exculpation of themselves. In any country subjected to coercive legislation there was always found a large number of people who were willing to suspect and to accuse people in the most deliberate manner for considerations of the most miserable kind. Anyone who had read the history of coercion in Ireland must be aware that this was a time peculiarly suitable for such persons to ply their trade, and in the case of everyone arrested under this Act the Chief Secretary ought to give them the opportunity of meeting the accusation. Although he had felt during the present Session that the Government had a great many difficulties to contend with in the government of Ireland, he had never concealed his opinion, and never should, that a Government that could not govern Ireland without coercion was not entitled to govern Ireland at all, and the sooner that position was hammered into the English public mind the better chance there would be of laying permanently the foundation of peace and good order between the various classes of Irish people, and peace and good-will between the people of Great Britain and Ireland. He appealed, therefore, to the Chief Secretary to give to every man arrested under this Act an opportunity of laying a statement of his case before the Viceroy, in order that it might be ascertained how far the accusations on which he was arrested were really founded on fact or not. He considered the two hon.

Members for the City of Cork, in cases of this kind, had no option but to move the adjournment. They had the advantage of being acquainted with the gentlemen who were the most recent victims of the Coercion Act. They spoke from personal knowledge, and made themselves responsible for the characters of the two gentlemen. He therefore joined them in a Motion which was not obstructive, but which was made with the object of eliciting information which he thought the right hon. Gentleman might give without impairing either law or order in Ireland.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he wished to say a word in the interests of the Liberal Party. He was a very strong Liberal in his general opinions, and he believed he expressed the opinions of the Liberal Party generally, certainly of those below the Gangway, when he said that no news could give them more unalloyed joy than the news that the Cabinet was rid of the Chief Secretary. ["Oh!"] He challenged any Radical to deny that in the opinion of the entire Radical Party, and of all political leaders of the Liberal Party throughout the country, especially the North of England, the Chief Secretary was the ruin of the Party. ["Oh," and "Order!"] He was sorry to see that the Prime Minister at this moment was not awake. He believed the right hon. Gentleman was sincerely anxious to do his best according to his lights and opportunities for Ireland; but if the right hon. Gentleman wanted to send a real message of peace to Ireland he should insist on the resignation of his right hon. Colleague. The action of the right hon. Gentleman had been described in no very flattering terms in newspaper articles signed with the name of the junior Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. Ashton Dilke), and had also been referred to in a similar sense by deputations of Northern Miners' Associations, whose reports had met with the approval of the Prime Minister. Another comment upon the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman was to be found in the way in which certain respectable ladies—ladies quite as respectable as the wives of Members of this House, and some related by blood to a Member of that House—had been treated by Major Clifford Lloyd, one of the pets of the right hon. Gentleman, a magistrate who had dragged these ladies through the mire of a police court for no greater offence than that of standing at their own doors in their native town. Attention was called to these proceedings by a Scotchman, Dr. Boyd Kinnear, who said they would do credit to the Third Section in Russia. This Major Lloyd acted as policeman, spy, and informer, and the next day he changed his garb and sat as a judge in the cases he had himself instigated. At the trial of these respectable ladies the policeman swore they used insulting language towards him, and when asked what it was his modesty prevented him from answering. Pressed, however, for an answer, he said they called him "Major Lloyd's pet," and that they had obstructed the thoroughfare, although it was not stated who had been obstructed. This was the kind of thing that was going on in Ireland, and which the Chief Secretary liked, encouraged, and stimulated. The Chief Secretary had been warned against sending this Major Lloyd to Ireland on the ground that he was a firebrand. But it was a firebrand that the Chief Secretary wanted, in order that, having set Ireland in a blaze, he might the more easily ride rough shod over the Irish people. Things were going on in Ireland which were sufficient to make any people rise against the Ministry, and especially against the Minister who permitted them to take place. He was never afraid to express his opinion upon any subject; and he ventured to say that he sincerely believed that there was not a man in that House who was more sincerely desirous of sending a message of peace and goodwill to Ireland than the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister; but, notwithstanding that fact, he still permitted the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to persevere in the coercive course he had adopted towards the Irish people. It was most unfortunate that, side by side with the Bill now before the House, which, although it fell short of the requirements of the Irish people, would, when it became law, have a healthy, beneficial, and tranquillizing influence, this bitter memory and hate of the Chief Secretary should be allowed to grow. He appealed to the Prime Minister, by his better instincts and by his good intentions towards Ireland, not to estrange, but, if possible, to bring the two peoples closer together—to bridge over the chasm. [A laugh.] The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) laughed; but he maintained he had done more to bring the English and Irish people together than he who misrepresented the people of Galway had ever done. If the First Lord of the Treasury even now said—"We will close the bitter chapter of Irish history, and we will send a message of consolation to the Irish people"—it might not be too late yet to bring about that result; but the first step in that direction was to do away with the Minister who was responsible for coercion—the man who led English opinion astray on the question—the man who dragged his Colleagues into the wretched mire of coercion—this must be the holocaust which must precede the conciliation of the Irish people.

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, he rose with great diffidence, because he should be sorry to fall out with the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), and because he did not desire to say a word in favour of coercion. But he did not feel justified in remaining silent after the language that had been used towards his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He was not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman did not satisfy Irish ideas; but he believed that the House would be of opinion that no more conscientious statesman ever sat upon the Treasury Bench. The Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster might be deservedly praised as the friends of Ireland; but neither of them had seen with their own eyes the misery and sufferings which had been produced in Ireland by famine and by bad laws. It was not so with the Chief Secretary. He had believed the right hon. Gentleman took Office last year not through any shuffle of the political cards, but with an honest and sincere desire to carry through remedial legislation for the Irish people. It was a remarkable fact that before any coercive legislation had been introduced into Ireland the right hon. Gentleman had been denounced in that country, and that his name had been associated with certain ammunition. He did not think that the hon. Member opposite would do the cause he advocated much good by firing off these severe and bitter shots across the floor of the House at the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. FINIGAN said, he had heard in the House that night certain interesting Questions put with regard to the fate of Midhat Pasha; but when similar circumstances to those connected with Midhat Pasha occurred in Ireland, then Englishmen had no interest in the matter. He would have thought that in such cases as those which they were discussing the Government would have had more than ordinary information; but if these men were really guilty of treasonable practices, why did not the Government proceed against them in the ordinary way? The Government could easily have sought and obtained a verdict from a jury, and that, no doubt, they would have done, but that they knew the men in question were not guilty. The Irish Members had proceeded in that way simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the English people to circumstances which they would reprobate if carried out in any other country than Ireland. The arrests had been a great error on the part of the Chief Secretary, who was a most mistaken and misguided man; and he had proved to the present Ministry, as he had proved to the last Liberal Ministry, its evil genius. Probably, however, the right hon. Gentleman would not have taken that course if he had not been cheated into it by the permanent officials at Dublin Castle, who were fully as corrupt as the servants and Ministers of the Sultan, and with them no more good would be done in Ireland than would be done in Turkey with the present officialism. Until they governed Ireland as they governed England—with the consent of the people—they would never have that peace and concord which they all desired. If it was decided that this coercive policy should be abolished at the same time that the Land Bill was given to the Irish people it might do something, and create confidence in this Liberal Ministry, and produce peace and concord in Ireland; but so long as men were arrested on mere suspicion, without trial, the Government must be content to witness such scenes as these, and the continuance of the use of every method of stopping Public Business, which the Rules of the House permitted.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that reference had been made by hon. Members as to the feelings of hostility that existed in the North of Ireland in regard to the Chief Secretary; but he (Mr. Macartney) wished to contradict such a statement, as far as the Party he was identified with, point blank. The opprobrious epithets which had been applied to the right hon. Gentleman had never emanated from the Conservative Party in Ireland. On the contrary, they regarded the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of Office with great satisfaction. Not that they approved of absolutely everything that the right hon. Gentleman had done; that was, of course, impossible; but as a statesman, as a Member of the House, and as a man, they had no stone to throw at him. All he could say was that it would be impossible to expect an honourable and sensitive Gentleman to act as Chief Secretary if every occupant of the post was assailed with unmitigated hostility and the most virulent attacks.

MR. GLADSTONE: On Motions of this kind, which most of us consider illegitimate, a Member of the Government may as well keep silent, and that is the rule that I have hitherto uniformly acted upon; but there are occasions when that is impossible, and then I think my duty takes the form of saying what is necessary and no more. I rise, therefore, to give utterance to a single sentence, which I think the House will feel cannot be dispensed with after the attacks that have been made upon my right hon. Friend. Admirably as my right hon. Friend has been vindicated by the hon. Member from the North of Ireland (Mr. Macartney), it would be impossible for the Members of the Government, and for me as their Representative, to allow these attacks to pass over without saying one word in relation to them. Sir, I cannot accept any of the compliments given me by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), upon pretences which would be untrue and unfounded. And now, with reference to my right hon. Friend, I wish to say simply these two things—that if there is anything severe, harsh, or unwarrantable, either in the powers which have been obtained from this House or in the present administration of the laws of Ireland, he is not one whit more responsible for it than the Members of the Government to which he belongs, and no distinction whatever can be drawn between us and him. And if, on the other hand, in the Bill now before the House, there is anything kindly or beneficial to the Irish people, there is no

Member of the Government to whom the credit is in any degree due more than to my right hon. Friend.

MR. HEALY said, he must congratulate the Chief Secretary on his defender from the North of Ireland, a Gentleman who represented the most aggressive form of Conservatism, who said that, having watched his career in past years, he was delighted at the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman to the Irish Office. It was not to be wondered at that the Prime Minister should endeavour to defend his Colleague; but he (Mr. Healy) still wished to know what good the Chief Secretary had done, who wanted him, and why he was not sent somewhere away? What they complained of was, not that the man was merely unfit for his position, but that he was an absolute failure. [Cries of "Order!"] It was all very well for hon. Members to cry "Order;" but the Irish people were those who were most concerned; it was their country which was being misgoverned; it was they who felt where the shoe pinched. He begged to suggest to the Prime Minister that there were probably many places in the wide British Empire in which the services of the right hon. Gentleman would be more appreciated than they had been in Ireland. Why not send the right hon. Gentleman to Hong Kong? [Cries of "Order!"] Bulgaria, he heard, was in want of a King, and the right hon. Gentleman knew as much of Bulgaria as of Ireland. He had travelled there during the atrocities, and perhaps he had imported some of his experience into the government of Ireland. One of the meanest and shabbiest acts ever performed by a responsible Minister was the arrest of these two men on suspicion of "treasonable practices," but really for their connection with the land agitation. One of them he knew personally and well. There was not in Ireland a more loyal man than Mr. J. O'Connor; but his loyalty was to his countrymen, the Irish people. If such a man had worked as unflinchingly for the people of this country, he would not be in a prison cell at this moment. Some time or other, please God, the right hon. Gentleman's tenure of Office would run out, and then these men would issue from their cells and be received with acclamation by the Irish people when the right hon. Gentleman lay howling. ["Oh!"]

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I can truly say I am not anxious to prolong this discussion. But it is hardly fit or proper for me to sit entirely silent and hear such an abuse of the Rules of the House, as I consider this to be, without saying one word by way of protest. The practice of moving the adjournment of the House at Question time has frequently been remarked upon, and well deserves the consideration of the House. But at present we have the practice established. When there is sufficient cause for discussion, no doubt it is an arrangement which hon. Members have a right to resort to. But it is an entire abuse even of that privilege which is so elastic, when it is made the occasion for the sort of personal attacks upon the Benches opposite to which we have so frequently listened. If hon. Members have cause to bring forward these questions they can do so at a proper time; and if they desire to challenge the conduct of the Government, I am not here to say upon all parts of their Irish policy, I would defend it. But this sort of personal attack is one which I think deserves the reprobation, and certainly the disfavour, of all hon. Gentlemen.

MR. LEAMY said, he wanted to know how they were to describe the Minister's policy towards Ireland if they were not to use strong language. The hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. J. N. Richardson) had said that the right hon. Gentleman was one of the most conscientious Ministers that ever came to Ireland. That also was his opinion when the right hon. Gentleman came first to Ireland; but it was not his opinion now. The right hon. Gentleman went to Ireland as the Representative of a Liberal Government. But the Orange Emergency Committee, in a pamphlet issued the other day, stated that they had induced the right hon. Gentleman to forbid assemblies of people at sales, and they issued "a list of farms in Ireland for which Protestant tenants were required." It was that proselytizing spirit which the right hon. Gentleman was bolstering up in Ireland. The Chief Secretary, therefore, instead of representing a Liberal Ministry in Ireland, was nothing more than the instrument of petty despots and the tool in the hands of the Orange Emergency Committee. He did not believe, in the whole history of Ireland, there was an instance of any man having fallen so suddenly, swiftly, and irretrievably from popular confidence. He did not wish to make any personal attack, he would only say that the system of misgovernment in Ireland would shock hon. Members opposite if they were only aware of it. A large number of Liberal Members stated at the time of the passing of the Coercion Act that they voted for the measure with reluctance. There was, therefore, every reason that they should see that the Act was not carried out unfairly.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) had blamed his hon. Friend for moving the adjournment of the House. But it was not so many days since a noble Lord (Viscount Sandon), a Member of the right hon. Gentleman's Party, moved the adjournment of the House on a question of not so much importance. The Question of the noble Lord was only whether the Government would publish a clear statistical Paper. The Irish people were tyrannized over by an autocrat who was allowed by the House to do what he pleased without giving a reason for his conduct. The hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. J. N. Richardson) stated that the right hon. Gentleman had seen more of the misery of Ireland than any other Member of the Government. That was a reason why the right hon. Gentleman should protect the people instead of making himself the instrument of the landlords. Under these circumstances, the House would do well to agree to the adjournment, that the Government might consider whether they would keep the right hon. Gentleman as Chief Secretary. Why did not the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary resign? They talked of emigration—why did the right hon. Gentleman not emigrate? He was told on Saturday that the right hon. Gentleman was going to be sent to India. He did not know whether that was so or not, but he was delighted with the news. But if he were sent to some much warmer climate on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces, he would be likely to receive a less retiring pension, and be less of a burden to the ratepayers.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 305: Majority 279.—(Div. List, No. 299.)

EGYPT—SLAVE TRADE IN SOUDAN.

MR. BRETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, considering the great increase of the slave trade in the Soudan, since the appointment of the present governor of that province, Her Majesty's Government will consent, first, to make further representations to the Khedive on the subject; and, secondly, to appoint British Consuls at Khartoum and Suakim?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government lose no opportunity of urging the Khedive to do all in his power to put down the Slave Trade in his Dominions, and have reason to believe that His Highness is sincerely desirous of hastening its abolition. The appointment of additional Consular officers is under consideration; but it has not yet been finally decided whether Khartoum and Suakim are the places at which it would be most desirable that they should be posted.

TUNIS—ALLEGED CONFISCATION OF GROUND BELONGING TO THE ENGLISH CHURCH.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is aware that the portion of land adjoining the garden surrounding the English church at Tunis, which has been used as a lawn tennis ground pending the collection of funds for the erection of a parsonage house thereon, includes not only the land allotted to the British residents with the Bey's sanction, but also a portion of the land conveyed in perpetuity to the British Colony by a legal agreement entered into between the Bey and the Bishop of Gibraltar; if he is aware that, in reply to a protest made to M. Roustan by Her Majesty's agent, the former stated that he could only defer occupation of the land aforesaid for a fortnight, as M. Shemmama intended to commence building at once; and, if Her Majesty's Government will instruct Her Majesty's agent at Tunis to take immediate steps to prevent the interests of the legal owners being in any way prejudiced by M. Shemmama's action, and to protest against M. Roustan's intended confiscation of the land aforesaid?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, I have nothing to add to the answer which I gave to the noble Lord's Question last week. If any land has been transferred to a French protected subject to which the British residents have a claim, they should represent the matter to the British Agent and Consul General, and take proceedings to maintain their claim in the Courts usual in such cases.

THE EARL OF BECTIVE: Has the hon. Member communicated with Her Majesty's Agent?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; we have the fullest confidence in his taking the necessary steps in the cases brought before him. He has the fullest instructions to take action in cases of this kind.

TELEGRAPH ACTS, 1863, 1868, AND 1878 —TELEGRAPH WIRES OVER PUBLIC THOROUGHFARES.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to the responsibility of the local authorities of the Metropolis for any mischief which might result from the fracture of telegraph wires, he will state whether these wires are not vested in the Postmaster General by Statute; and, if he will also state under what Statute local authorities have a right of interference, or the power to call on the Postmaster General to remove any wires they may consider dangerous to the public safety?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, the Question had already been answered in the House. The matter was regulated by three Acts of 1863, 1868, and 1878. The first of these measures gave power to the Telegraph Companies to make such erections, with the consent of the local authorities; and the Act of 1868 transferred the powers vested in the Telegraph Companies to the Post Office. By the Act of 1878, if any question arose between the Postmaster General and the local authorities with respect to these matters it was to be settled by the arbitration of a magistrate. The local authority was thus prima facie intrusted with the safety of the public; it was their duty to see that the public were not exposed to danger in the streets that were vested in them.

The Earl of Bective

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL— THE RAILWAY LOAN.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Sir T. Shepstone issued a proclamation on behalf of Her Majesty's Government on the 12th of April 1877, which contained the following words:—

“All bonâ fide concessions and contracts with governments, companies, or individuals by which the State is now bound, will be honourably maintained and respected, and the payment of the debts of the State must be provided for;”

whether the fact that Her Majesty's Government propose to place the Transvaal under the suzerainty of Her Majesty is held to free this Country from the obligation of fulfilling the above promise; whether he is aware that the Railway material purchased by the Transvaal Government in 1876 for a sum of £71,813, which was the security for the payment of the principal and interest of the Railway Loan, has been sold by the authority of Her Majesty's Government for a sum greatly below its value, having afterwards been resold at a large profit; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government propose to take for compensating the bondholders for the loss they have thereby sustained?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Question of the hon. Member appears to indicate an impression that the words used by Sir Theophilus Shepstone, which are correctly quoted, were intended to convey an engagement on the part of the British Government with respect to the Consolidated Fund; if there be such an impression, I believe it would be an entire misapprehension. The engagement given by Sir Theophilus Shepstone was given entirely on behalf of the Colonial Government, which had replaced the Government of the South African Republic as it was called. The question as to the sale of certain rails I can answer only as a matter of information, and not as in any way clashing with what I have just stated. I learn that the rails in question were sold for the best price that could be had for them, and they were sold in consequence of their being held under a lien to a creditor of the Company, who had the power to take them. Of course, it has been the duty of Her Majesty's Government to look to this matter in the communications now going on.

The Convention for the settlement of the Transvaal, which will probably be signed in a very short time by the Boer Leaders, but which will have to be submitted for ratification to the Volksraad, will contain provisions under which, as I understand, it will be declared that the loan is a first charge on the revenues of the Transvaal State.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE (NEGOTIATIONS).

LORD JOHN MANNERS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is true that the French Government have announced their intention to adhere to the system of specific Duties as the basis for negotiating a Commercial Treaty with this Country; and, if so, whether Majesty's Government propose to accept that basis?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I understand the French Government have repeatedly stated that they insist on the principle of specific duties. This principle in itself does not meet in limine as a principle with objection from the British Government; because it is conceivable that in many cases specific duties may be levied so as to represent and correspond very fairly to the value; but I am bound to add that in these cases those who represent the British Government are under the impression that if specific duties be thus broadly insisted upon, they will raise most formidable difficulties in the way of a settlement, which our negotiators do not at present see their way to surmount.

COMMISSIONERS OF WOODS AND FORESTS—WINDSOR PARKS AND WOODS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will cause to be laid upon the Table of the House a detailed statement showing how the amounts of £5,017 and £25,734, stated in the Abstract of Accounts of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to have been received and expended during the year ended 31st March 1881 for Windsor Parks and Woods, are made up?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he believed the citation of figures by the hon. Member was a correct citation from the accounts of the Crown estates; but they referred to the year ending 31st March, 1880. The whole details he would find at pages 129 and 128 of the Report of the Commissioners of Woods for the year 1880.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—THE COURT OF COMMISSIONERS.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, we understood the other day from the Prime Minister that he would to-day be able to make a statement as to Clauses 31 and 34 in the Irish Land Bill, relating to the constitution of the proposed Land Court. I want to know if he is now in a position to give that information?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am not in a position to state with completeness the particulars in which we propose to modify the clauses with respect to the Court; but, of course, there is one point on which I can state distinctly the intentions of the Government in explanation of what I have previously said. I used a general expression that it would be in the power of the parties to pass through the Civil Bill Court to the Commission; our meaning is that it will be in the power of either of the parties to do so. With respect to the clauses, what we should propose is this—It may probably be found a convenient course that when we come to any clause that embraces points that will be modified by us, we should postpone those clauses, and finish the legislative clauses, for we have yet remaining some important legislative clauses. We shall find it convenient to postpone the clauses that require to be modified in relation to the constitution of the Court; and particularly it will be necessary to postpone, undoubtedly and unconditionally, the clause in which the Members of the Commission will be named.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL—MR. PARNELL.—EXPLANATION.

MR. LONG said, he had to ask the indulgence of the House while he made a personal explanation. He very much regretted, especially after the interruption they had already had to the Land Bill that day, to interpose between that Bill and the House. But he should not detain the House for more than a few minutes, and he was quite sure the House would extend to him the kind indulgence which it always did extend to Members who desired to make explanations about anything said in a previous debate. Perhaps he might remind the House that on the 16th of June, in the course of Committee on the Irish Land Bill, he made a statement with regard to the management of his estates by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). In taking this somewhat unusual course, he had been animated by the feeling that it was right first of all to vindicate himself in the eyes of the House for the statement which he had made; and, secondly, he desired particularly that the House should thoroughly understand the information upon which he made those statements. In that statement which he made to the House there were two errors. One of them was an error which he committed at the time from accident, and it was an error of which the hon. Member for the City of Cork took full advantage. When he (Mr. Long) told the House that he quoted the county in which the property was as Wicklow, instead of Carlow, he thought the House would agree that the mistake was not of great importance, seeing that the two counties were only divided by a small river, and that the property and residence of the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the property and residence of his (Mr. Long's) own relations—the two people concerned in the question—were in Wicklow and Carlow both. He stated also that the rents on this estate had been raised to an average of 70 per cent over Griffith's valuation. That he had not an opportunity of proving at the moment; but he now held in his hand a copy of the Landed Estates Court rental, and a full copy of the rents showing that previous to the sale in 1873 the rents were fixed at 75 per cent above the Government valuation, and also showing that the average he quoted was the correct one. He next came to the more important error which was made in the statement which he had the honour to make to the House, and that was not an error made through any fault of his own; but was contained in other information which was given to him of a very accurate nature. He said that his property was solely the property of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, and the hon. Member for the City of Cork met that statement with a deliberate denial, and he confessed that that denial startled him considerably. After investigating the matter, though he thought he did investigate it before, but after going again fully into it, he found that the property in question belonged to the younger brother of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. The facts were very brief—

MR. PARNELL said he rose to Order. The hon. Member commenced by saying he was going to make a personal explanation, and he now announced that he had discovered that the property in question belonged to his (Mr. Parnell's) younger brother. He submitted that if the hon. Member had any accusation to make against his (Mr. Parnell's) younger brother with regard to the management of his property, the hon. Member was not entitled to do so under cover of a personal explanation. The proper course, he submitted, for the hon. Member to take in such circumstances—his brother not being absent from, but not even a Member of, that House—would be to give Notice of his intention in order that the person accused might, if he so desired, put his version of the case before the House.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for the City of Cork seems to have assumed that the hon. Member who is in possession of the House is about to make some attack on his younger brother. I have no reason to suppose that that is so; and, at all events, until such attack is made, it will not be for me to interfere.

MR. FINIGAN rose, amid loud cries of "Order!"

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member for Ennis rises to Order, the House no doubt will hear him; but he is not entitled to interrupt the hon. Member who is in possession of the House.

MR. LONG, resuming, said, he would set at rest the suspicions of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. He had no intention of calling in question the manner in which the younger brother of the hon. Member managed his property, and had only alluded to him in order to express, in as strong terms as possible, the regret he felt that the information furnished to him should have induced him to say anything which was not absolutely correct, or to have mentioned the name of the hon. Member for the City of Cork, when he ought to have mentioned that of his brother. The mistake of his (Mr. Long's) informant had arisen from the fact that when the property was re-valued the elder accompanied the younger brother in his visit to the tenants when the increased rent was demanded, and the neighbours not unnaturally concluded that the elder brother was the owner of the estate. In reference to the statement of the hon. Member for the City of Cork that he had never sold any landed property in the counties of Wicklow or Carlow, he would venture to read to the House the following letter, a copy of which had been supplied to him:—

"Avondale, Rathdrum, September 16, 1874.

"Dear Sir,—If Mr. Dick is desirous of purchasing lots 29 and 30 (Ballinagilty and Blindennis) of my brother's estate in Carlow, of which I have been declared the purchaser, I should be glad to learn what price he is prepared to give for these lots before I conclude negotiations for the sale of them to another party.

"I am, dear Sir, yours faithfully,

"CHARLES S. PARNELL."

His (Mr. Long's) relative declined to buy these two lots, which, as he understood, were now the property of Major Newton; and probably the hon. Member for the City of Cork would like to say whether that gentleman bought the property or had it presented to him. He apologized to the House and to the hon. Member for having been led into any error, however slight, and he was willing to submit the information upon which he had furnished his statement to any Member of the House who might desire to see it.

MR. PARNELL said, he thought the hon. Member had attempted to make an attack upon his younger brother with reference to the management of his property. It was no part of his business to defend his brother's management of his property. If the hon. Member repeated the charge, and vouched again for its correctness, that the rents of the property belonging to his younger brother were raised 70 per cent, he submitted it was, so far as it went, an attack upon his younger brother. Let him explain to the House that the two lots of land referred to in the letter read by the hon. Member belonged to himself, so nominally that he had forgotten about the circumstances, for they only nominally belonged to him for a few weeks. At the sale in 1878, the solicitor acting for his brother asked him to bid for the two lots. He did bid for the two lots, and they were knocked down to him. His brother asked him to write the letter referred to and to transfer the property to this gentleman, who, he believed, subsequently became owner. His (Mr. Parnell's) ownership was entirely nominal, and only lasted a few weeks. He had no concern whatever with the management, and he thought the hon. Member might have mentioned that the lots in question were not connected with any charge of rent raising. He repeated what he said before, that he never sold any property in Wicklow with the exception of these two lots of which he became nominal owner under the circumstances he had stated. He did not wish to put himself forward as a good landlord, for poor Irish landlords were not usually the best landlords, and he did not happen to be a rich man; but he had never raised the rent of a tenant 70 or any other per cent.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 135.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [TWENTY-FOURTH NIGHT.]

[Progress 8th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART V.

ACQUISITION OF LAND BY TENANTS, RECLAMATION OF LAND, AND EMIGRATION.

Acquisition of Land by Tenants.

Clause 25 (Reclamation of land).

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, line 15, to leave out the words "the Treasury may authorise the Board of Works to," in order to insert the words "the Land Commission may, with the concurrence of the Treasury,"—(Mr. Charles Russell,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. PARNELL said, he would appeal to the Government to re-consider the decision they had arrived at. The clause proposed that the Board of Works should advance the money from the Treasury for the purposes of reclamation or improvement of waste or uncultivated land and other works of agricultural improvement. The Amendment proposed to substitute the Land Commission for the Board of Works. He submitted that the Board of Works, a Board which stood condemned for incapability and mismanagement, was not a proper institution for carrying out important works of this character. It must necessarily follow that questions, grave and weighty, would arise from time to time in the working of the whole Bill with regard to the desirability of allowing Companies to purchase tracts of land in certain districts; and it was absurd to suppose that a body like the Board of Works could be trusted in regard to the decision of those questions of policy. But he might be told that it was not the Board of Works that would have to decide questions of policy, but that such questions would be decided by the Treasury. He did not think, however, that the Treasury was a proper body to decide questions of this character. What had been one of the chief grounds for believing that no Bill containing the "three F's," or no Bill establishing a peasant proprietary, would remove one of the chief evils of the Land Question in Ireland? It had been because there existed in the West of Ireland—in three or four of the Western counties, and in a few other counties—crowded districts where the tenants were settled in such numbers on poor and small holdings that it was utterly impossible for them to make a decent subsistence and to pay any rent at all. That fact had been vouched for by everybody who had studied the Land Question on the spot. They had the evidence of both of the Royal Commissions on this point. They had the evidence of Major Robertson and Professor Baldwin, the two Assistant Commissioners, who were appointed for the purpose of inquiring into the state of the poorer and smaller tenancies of Ireland, and more especially in those districts in which they had been told no measure could satisfactorily settle the Irish Land Question which did not in some way make provision for those small holders. After the Famine and at other times lands in many of the Irish counties were cleared of their population, and the people who had been cleared from the richer land sought refuge upon the poorer and more barren portions of the country. They had reclaimed the bogs and brought in the hill side, and they had been allowed to stay upon their little holdings, because at the time of their settlement the land on which they located themselves was absolutely worth nothing. They had made that land worth something, and since then the landlords had placed a rent upon the holdings such as the people were not able to bear, partly by reason of the excessive nature of the rent. Professor Baldwin and everybody else—he believed that hon. Members on both sides of the House had pointed out that something must be done for these small tenants, that they could not live where they were, and that it was absolutely necessary to give them some opportunity of settling down on holdings of a larger area than they at present occupied. There were in Ireland 360,000 holdings of a value of less than £8 per annum, and, he believed, something like from 200,000 to 250,000 which were valued at less than £4 per annum. Hence it followed that much of the misery which had been the chief cause of periodical famines and periods of scarcity in Ireland was owing to the fact that large numbers of the people were crowded upon small holdings which were absolutely insufficient to afford a living to such poor families. There were, undoubtedly, contrary opinions as to the best way in which this evil could be remedied. Some advocated emigration, and others advocated migration. He did not wish to go at any length into the question of emigration, because it was connected with a separate and distinct clause of the Bill. However, it came incidentally into this clause, because the clause seemed to have been pitchforked into the Bill for the purpose of providing an alternative scheme to that of emigration. In other words, the Government seemed to have relied on the Bill for the purpose of trying what could be done in the way of migrating families from the poorer districts to better holdings. But if they started by giving this duty to the Board of Works they would deprive the clause at the very outset of all possible chance of success. He did not wish at the present moment to enter into any discussion or to make any observations in regard to the nature of the clause itself, but rather to draw attention to the fact that it was proposed to hand over this power to private Companies instead of establishing a public body to undertake these beneficial operations of improvement. That, however, was a matter which would come on for discussion upon later Amendments which were lower down on the Paper. But he would say that no matter what the case was, the object was generally to improve land in Ireland which was capable of improvement, and to give employment and the means of living, perhaps by excessive labour, to the smaller tenant farmers living on the land he had described. The Board of Works was an institution which was already exceedingly overworked. It had, it was true, at its disposal a staff of engineers, and it had been said that they could not give the working of this clause to the Land Commission because the Land Commission had no staff of engineers at its disposal. He agreed to the highest and fullest extent that it was desirable that the Commission, if it was to undertake the duty of carrying out the clause, should have skilled and scientific help at its disposal; but what was to hinder the Committee from inserting power in the clause, or bringing in a new clause to give the Land Commission power to avail itself of the services of the engineering staff of the Board of Works, or of the department generally of the Board of Works, for the purpose of carrying out the engineering and mechanical works that might devolve on them in giving full effect to the clause? He submitted that if the Board of Works was to be brought in it must not be brought in as a prime mover—that questions of policy, questions of setting the machinery in motion, and what persons should be entitled to be brought under the provisions of the clause, were not questions to be decided by the Board of Works in the first instance, but should be decided by the Land Commission in the first instance, subject to the approval of the Treasury itself. By all means let the Board of Works be used as an instrument, as it was an engineering body, and had a skilled staff of experts at its disposal. Let it by all means be used for the purpose of carrying out the details which might require its aid; but do not let the Board of Works be introduced into the Bill as an imperio in imperium, because if they did that they would upset the whole principle of the Bill, which proposed that there should be a ruling authority in Ireland to decide questions of importance in regard to the land. He contended that they could not separate the clause from the rest of the Bill. If the clause was to be used at all, questions would come up as to the way in which they were to deal with the smaller tenants in the West of Ireland, and it was impossible that the Board of Works could have sufficient weight and knowledge to enable them to deal with such questions. He therefore trusted that Her Majesty's Government would reconsider their decision, and that they would substitute for the Board of Works some such body as the Land Commission, which was alone capable of directing the future policy of the country upon these matters.

MR. P. MARTIN remarked, that this was one of the most important questions involved in the Bill. He entertained a hope that the reclamation of waste land in Ireland would be able to provide considerable employment throughout the country, and by that means afford a prospect of remedying, to a considerable extent, the prevailing distress. Under these circumstances, he thought it right to address a few words to the Committee with respect to the machinery proposed by the Bill. It appeared to him that they would entirely nullify and destroy all chance of the clause being made effective, and of insuring that the reclamation of waste lands should take place in Ireland if they intrusted the matter to the Board of Works. How had the Board of Works up to the present time administered the functions intrusted to them in Ireland? He did not wish to make any personal attack upon the members of the Board which was foreign to the administration of the Board, and he was content to take things as they were. As the Prime Minister had been pleased to observe, the Board of Works was really under the control of the Treasury. At any rate, they had been under the control of the Treasury up to the present time, and he did not care to inquire whether the faults connected with their administration rested with the Board of Works itself or with the Treasury. He would, however, remind the Committee that at the present moment there had been two Departmental Committees appointed to inquire into the control of the Board of Works, one of which was presided over by Lord Lansdowne, and the other by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) and the late Member for the County of Carlow (Mr. Kavanagh), both of which reported adversely to the administration of the Board, and both were of opinion that it was not desirable to intrust the work of reclamation to the Board of Works at all. Therefore, they had the Board of Works arraigned and condemned so far as being intrusted with the reclamation of land was concerned. The Report of the last Committee had been before the House since 1878, and right hon. Members who now sat on the Front Opposition Bench had promised, from time to time, ever since that Report was presented, that the whole of the administration of the Board of Works should be re-organized, and that there should be a new constitution of that Department. But, like most Parliamentary promises, although these two Reports had stood on record since 1878, nothing in the world had been done, and, having had nothing in the world done, they were now about to hand this most important matter of the reclamation of the waste lands of Ireland over again to the control of the Board of Works. Even supposing that the Board of Works up to the present time had worked effectively, and had not stood condemned by these two Departmental Committees, he should say, having regard to the structure of the present Bill, that the Board of Works was the worst body they could possibly intrust with the work of reclamation. Under a previous part of the Bill which had been already assented to by the Committee power had been given to authorize large purchases of property by the Land Commission. It would be necessary, in the purchase of these properties, that the Land Commission should buy a quantity of uncultivated and waste land, and it might experience some difficulty in disposing of it to the tenants of adjoining property unless they executed some works of drainage or reclamation upon such land. Under these circumstances, why should they have such a cumbrous system as that which was proposed to be established by the Bill?—namely, one Board purchasing land that must necessarily be reclaimed, and another Board dealing with the matter of reclamation and the question of drainage. He would ask the attention of Her Majesty's Government, without entering into any controversy at all as to the past demerits of the Board of Works, to the question whether these powers and functions ought not necessarily to be intrusted to the Land Commission? What were the Land Commission to do with large uncultivated tracts of land when they purchased property in the West of Ireland? Was it not the first part of their business that they should have the means of reclaiming and putting it in order for the benefit of the country? What was even more necessary would be found in an Amendment a little later on, which was intended to be proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), who knew very well what would probably be the mode in which the matter would be dealt with—namely, by the reclamation being carried out by the tenants themselves. Everyone who had studied the evidence given before the Bessborough Commission would be aware that no small portion of that evidence dealt with the question of reclamation, and it was abundantly pointed out that the reclamation of land could alone be made beneficial by the tenants of the property—that the small tenants and men of that class were alone the men who could execute the work. Every single witness, landlord as well as tenant, had actually declared that the reclamation of waste lands by private Companies was a perfect chimera, and one which it was utterly absurd and impossible to give effect to. Under these circumstances, he would ask Her Majesty's Government, before they finally proceeded to vote upon the clause, to consider whether the duty of authorizing and superintending advances could not be transferred from the Land Commission to a body which, without entering into its merits or demerits, had mismanaged and destroyed all the beneficial operation of the "Bright Clauses" of the Land Act of 1870.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he firmly believed that Her Majesty's Government, in putting this clause into the Bill, intended that it should be a beneficial clause, and were thoroughly genuine and honest in that intention.

Mr. P. Martin

His faith, however, had been very rudely shaken in the Board of Works. If he wanted to tell the Committee all the opinions that he had formed about the Board of Works in Ireland, he should not know where to begin. Outside the circle of Dublin Castle there was not a single man, woman, or child who had the slightest confidence in the Board of Works. That was the opinion of almost every Irishman of every class and shade. To give the Committee an idea of the mode in which the Board of Works conducted its business—he could give lots of ideas, but he would only state one fact. He believed that the Board of Works had had to advance money upon two-thirds of the property in Ireland. He did not think that that was at all an exaggeration. But would it be believed that the Board of Works had never yet kept a record of titles? He knew a case in which a landlord had had 10 loans in 1870, and 10 times did the Board of Works desire his title to be investigated. Was a Department which carried on its business in that way a fit Department to intrust with these new and important duties? The Irish Government had no control whatever over the Irish Board of Works. The Irish Government might be extremely anxious to carry out a particular policy in relation to the land of Ireland; but they found themselves thwarted over and over again by the Board of Works, under the control of the Treasury and Sir Ralph Lingen. He wished to point out that the Board of Works had been twice investigated, and twice condemned. The Government had constantly expressed their intention of reforming the Board of Works; and if it was to be reformed at all, it would be better to reform it before they gave it these new and important duties. It was certainly idle, while they declared that it was unfit to discharge the duties already devolving upon it, to intrust to the Board of Works new and important duties, and then reform it in another year. It was acknowledged by all parties in Ireland that the First Commissioner of Works was not able to perform his present duties satisfactorily, and that he ought to be superannuated. At the time of the recent distress the country ran the danger of famine, because Colonel M'Kerlie, not from any fault of his own, was quite unequal to the work which fell upon him. So far as the Land Commission was concerned, it was to be a pre-eminently judicial body; and he doubted very much whether a body intended to be pre-eminently judicial ought to be intrusted with functions of this nature. Nothing, however, was more calculated to reduce the clause to a nullity than the course taken by Her Majesty's Government with regard to the Board of Works.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have endeavoured to gather, as far as I can, the feeling of the Committee; and I own, with great regret, that I see a disposition to support this Amendment, because it is a matter upon which the Government cannot change their ground, and I will give the Committee absolute reasons why the Government cannot do so. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) has made a most ingenuous speech upon the subject. He fairly alleges that the misdeeds of the Board of Works are misdeeds of the Treasury, and he says that the Treasury are totally unfit to manage this matter—that is to say, that the Treasury are totally unfit to control the expenditure of public money.

MR. PARNELL: No.

MR. GLADSTONE: But that is the whole question. Some other body is to be appointed to do it.

MR. PARNELL: I did not say that.

MR. GLADSTONE: If I have misquoted the hon. Gentleman, perhaps he will explain?

MR. PARNELL: I did not mean that the Treasury should not control the amount of money to be authorized. What I said was that the Commission should have the conduct of the policy of recommending the Treasury to advance the money, and not the Board of Works. I do not wish to take the matter ultimately out of the hands of the Treasury.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman, from time to time, is one of the most ingenuous men I know. Every now and then comes from the lips of the hon. Gentleman some of the most ingenuous declarations; and the hon. Gentleman in this instance did fairly let fly at the Treasury, and I think justly, because it is on the Treasury that the sins of the Board of Works ought to be charged. There is no mistake about that. The hon. Gentleman now seems to think that he is completely master of all the machinery of government, and that he understands it from its inception upwards. That, however, is not the fact, and he must be content to take the assurance of some of those who know what the working of the machinery is. If the Treasury is bad, it is your duty to improve the constitution of the Treasury; but if you are merely to take over the functions of controlling the Public Expenditure, then this House would lose its security and its usual means of checking the expenditure of public money. What is the declaration of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill). He says that the Irish Government ought to be intrusted with the making of these advances.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I added, with the concurrence of the Treasury, in the words of the Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: I understood the noble Lord to say that the duty was to be discharged by the Irish Government alone.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Concurrently with the Treasury.

MR. GLADSTONE: But what is the use, if the Treasury are to have no means of forming a judgment upon the merits of the case? We should then have to make a Board of Works in the Treasury; we should have to equip the Treasury with a set of engineers who should survey and overlook the Board of Works. The Commissioners would suggest the policy, and the Treasury would be the judges of the amount of money required. But how are you to separate the policy and the amount of money? If the Treasury say that they would not allow more than one-half of the sum you ask, what becomes of the policy and judgment of the Commission? And if the Commission are to fix the amount, then what becomes of the control of the Treasury and of this House? The Board of Works is nothing but the arm of the Treasury, and if you regard the Treasury as unfit for its duty, it is exactly like saying that the Foreign Office is not fit to settle a foreign question; and, therefore, you will take such questions out of the hands of the Foreign Office and place them in the hands of the Home Secretary. If the organization of a particular Department is bad, amend it; but do not suppose that you can improve the administration of Public Offices by throwing them into chaos. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) says it is quite unnecessary, and that it is a principle of this Bill that all matters relating to the management of land in Ireland should be under one Public Department. The hon. Gentleman must excuse me if I say that he is entirely wrong. He seems to forget that this clause is nothing in the world except the extension of very large statutory powers now in existence; powers so large that when I look at them I seem hardly to know how they are capable of being still further widened. Yet all of those powers are powers exercised under the control of the Treasury by the Board of Works. Then, what do we come to next? That a public authority in Ireland has been inquired into and condemned. And the noble Lord comes down upon us with his own incomparable knowledge of the state of Ireland, and declares that there is not a man in Ireland outside Dublin Castle who has any confidence in the Board of Works. He says, further, and this is a most important part of the case, that the Board of Works has been condemned by two Executive bodies who have inquired into it. The Board of Works has, I believe, been censured in a former inquiry specially in reference to the execution of works made by the Board on the responsibility of the Government. But that has nothing to do with what this clause proposes, because, under this clause, the Board can do nothing of the kind; and, therefore, that condemnation is of no effect whatever, so far as the present case is concerned. The Board of Works, under this clause, is to advance money to the parties who are willing and desirous to do these things, and that is just the function in which they have been engaged for the last 30 years. And now let us see what Irishmen, whether in or out of Dublin Castle, think of it in that capacity, because here is a Report, signed as lately as the 20th June, 1878, by Lord Crichton. [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: A Government official.] Lord Crichton was a Government official, and that, of course, entirely deprives him of any weight, or of the confidence of the noble Lord. Still, the noble Lord surely requires to know why it was that this Government official—this guilty man—gave his opinion in this particular sense, for it was just as open to him to have given it in any other sense, had he so chosen. But it is not only with Government officials that we have to deal. Here is another Gentleman, Mr. Arthur Kavanagh, I believe he is an Irishman, and I rather think he is a person of some authority. I never heard that he resided in Dublin Castle. Then there is Mr. Mitchell Henry—is he tainted with the poison derived from Dublin Castle? There is also Mr. Fremantle, Master of the Mint—a most able man—not a man of our political Association, but an able, a very able, and distinguished public servant. Lastly, there is Mr. Herbert Murray. I am not quite certain that I can except him altogether from the taint of Dublin Castle; but, at any rate, I believe he is one of those who have been there. What do these fine gentlemen say when they are describing acts for purposes precisely analogous to those which are embraced in the present clause—namely, the business of advancing money to parties desirous of executing agricultural improvements? And in their official Report they say—

“The success of these acts is unquestionable. No legislative measures for Ireland have ever been more freely taken advantage of, and from no measures has the country probably derived greater benefit. They have been the means of securing, within the last 30 years, a capital expenditure of £3,000,000 in agricultural improvements, and of enhancing the value of landed property without involving any loss to the Exchequer. The successful working of these Acts must, in a great measure, be attributed to the Commissioners of Public Works. The administration of them has been liberal and judicious, and we think that it reflects much credit upon the Board.”

I think, after this, we shall have no more condemnation of the Board of Works; but I have heard one or two speeches to-night which make me think that what is really in view is to get rid of this principle of control altogether, and to substitute for it a principle of expenditure by the Government. [Mr. BIGGAR: Not at all.] I did not refer to anything said by the hon. Member for Cavan; but I have heard one or two speeches which have led me to surmise that that is so. We shall not agree to set the Government in motion for a purpose for which, in our opinion, it is quite unfitted. That would be a very great mistake. We shall endeavour to occupy a position in which the public funds may be made available, by way of judicious advance, for the purposes of this Bill, but only after the matter has been tested and ascertained by a Body armed with a competent staff of experienced agents, and fortified for the purpose of its duties by a long experience. But, instead of that, the proposition on the other side is that, while we are charging the Land Commission with the enormous duty—first of all, of the judicial administration of the law between landlord and tenant; secondly, with this most complex and difficult operation of the purchase and re-purchase of property; and, thirdly, with the superintendence of any measure that may be adopted with regard to emigration, it is also proposed that they shall charge themselves with the work of making advances to landlords and tenants. I say “tenants,” because that is a matter which has been pressed upon the Government, and, so far as it is in their power, the Government will be glad to accede to such a proposal. But we cannot consent to put this duty upon the Commission; for, if we did, the consequence must be that the Commission, appointed for purposes wholly different, laden with charges and responsibilities of quite another character, and having no instrument suited for such a purpose as this, must immediately create another Public Establishment by the side of the Board of Works to overlook and superintend all these arrangements, notwithstanding the fact that the Board of Works has already a number of officers engaged in precisely similar work—for you do not propose to dispossess them of the work which they are now doing under the existing Act of Parliament. It is quite impossible for the Government to listen to a proposal of that kind. We should be very glad to listen to any reasonable proposal; but I think the Committee will not be surprised at the resolution which I have announced. I hope that hon. Gentlemen who are now in the House heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), who bore testimony on this point, as I have no doubt the right hon. Member for Westminster, who sits next him, would also do. [Mr. W. H. SMITH: Certainly.] It is very difficult to get over the force of testimony thus rendered by Gentlemen who found their opinions and knowledge upon experience long gained in the Public Service. Therefore, I must adhere, and adhere firmly, on the part of the Government, to the clause as it stands, so far as this part of it is concerned.

MR. HEALY said, he thought that, although the Prime Minister had in some degree stated his points very fairly, the right hon. Gentleman would have done well if he had promised some inquiry into the character of the Board of Works. The Prime Minister had said that, no doubt, the ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer could give them some important information. He (Mr. Healy) hoped the right hon. Gentleman would get up and do so, especially as he had been over to Ireland, in 1879 or 1880, in company with the then Secretary to the Treasury (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), about this very Board of Works. It was a misfortune for Ireland that the late Conservative Government went out of Office when they did, because they were pledged to deal with the Board of Works, and had promised that an officer should be appointed specially responsible to Parliament to represent the Board of Works in this House, and that officer would, he believed, have been Lord Crichton. The condition of affairs was so bad, that the right hon. Member for North Devon and the then Secretary to the Treasury went over specially to make a Report. The present Prime Minister now said that the Government were unable to take this matter out of the hands of the Board of Works; but would he promise that some inquiry should be made as to the way in which the Board of Works was managed? In the course of a debate which took place in 1879, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) gave the character of Colonel M'Kerlie, the Chairman of the Board, showing that the Board had kept no minutes for nearly 14 years, that there were no minute-books in existence, that Colonel M'Kerlie was one of those men who ought not to be at the head of any Department, that he insisted on the smallest letter on the most trivial business passing through his hands, that he insisted on doing everything himself, and that he did not possess that power which was so essential to public men—of making use of other people. The Prime Minister, in his remarks to-day, had set great value upon the Report signed by Lord Crichton, Mr. Mitchell Henry, Mr. Fremantle, and other distinguished gentleman; but would not the right hon. Gentleman, when insisting on the importance of one part of that Report, set an equal value upon the remainder? What was it that Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson said in his Report in 1879 with regard to Colonel M'Kerlie? Why, that Colonel M'Kerlie was in a position of great difficulty, because the Board which he had to superintend had had so many additional duties placed upon it which rendered it utterly impossible for them to be efficiently carried out. That there were so many complaints was to be attributed mainly to the fact that the Commissioners had been excessively reduced in number, as two of them had been taken away—one of them having died, and the other having been appointed to another office—and the Treasury of the day, on the occasion of a vacancy occurring, refused to allow it to be filled up. The work of the Board had increased so enormously that it was impossible for two Commissioners to do it properly. That was the condition of things in 1879; and what had been done since then? They were promised by the late Tory Government that Lord Crichton should be made officially responsible in this House for the Board of Works; but now the present Government and the present Chief Secretary were allowing the Board of Works to come into this Bill. The fact was, that the Chief Secretary was in a condition almost of blind ignorance as to the existence of these complaints against the Board. The hon. Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson) had admitted that he was inclined to believe that the Chairman of the Board had been anxious to do everything himself and not to allow assistance. But that was not the sort of man to whose charge should be handed over the working of the Irish Land Bill, so far as establishing a system of peasant proprietary was concerned. He (Mr. Healy) was perfectly ready to agree with every word of the Report read by the Prime Minister when it spoke of the Acts in question, and said—"From no measures has the country probably derived greater benefit." But then it should be remembered how very few Acts of Parliament had been passed which were of any use to Ireland, except the Irish Land Act and the Irish Church Act, and the legislation of quite modern years. And the fact was, with regard to the Land Act and those other Acts which the Report referred to, that even Colonel M'Kerlie could not prevent, by any arrangements he might make at the Board of Works, the spending of £3,000,000. He did his very utmost to strangle every application that was sent in, and if £3,000,000 had been spent over a long series of years, Colonel M'Kerlie was not to be thanked for it. What was it that the hon. Member for Cork County (Mr. Shaw) had said in 1879? Why, that he knew in his own county of farmers borrowing money at 6 per cent rather than go to the Board of Works to get it for 4 per cent, on account of the red-tapeism which prevailed there. The hon. Member added that he had done everything in his power to induce these farmers to be more careful of their own interests, but without success. He (Mr. Healy) would say, let them give poor Colonel M'Kerlie a retiring allowance, and let him go about his business. He had done the State some service, but he was an old man now, and it would be well to let the old man go and to put a new one in his place. Under any circumstances, he (Mr. Healy) hoped the Government would have a searching inquiry made into the condition of the Board of Works and into its personnel—an inquiry which would be likely to give some satisfaction.

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH wished to point out that many of the most important recommendations of the Report that had been referred to had been acted upon. As to the complaint that there were only two Commissioners upon the Board of Works, he wished to remind the Committee that there were now three. With regard to the anything but encouraging references which had been made to the long services of Colonel M'Kerlie, he would ask anyone who had studied the Report of the Public Works Commission, and who knew anything of the great task imposed upon them last year by the measures taken for the relief of distress, to say whether they had not discharged in the most praiseworthy manner the heavy duties imposed upon them?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I was not aware, Sir, that the question of Colonel M'Kerlie's services or the general management of the Board of Works would be brought forward to-day, and I am sorry that my hon. Friend the Member for West Essex (Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson), who has taken so large a part in dealing with these questions, and who went to Ireland with me, is not now in his place in the House. He would have been able to speak upon the subject much better than I can do. The hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) has told us that I went over to Ireland in the autumn of 1879 with my hon. Friend with a view to consider what was to be done and how the Board was to be re-organized. That is not quite correct. I was in Dublin, and my hon. Friend went over also. He did not go with me, but he was over at the same time, looking at various Departments, and especially, no doubt, into this question of the Board of Works. I had several conferences with him upon the subject, both with reference to the general conduct of the business of the Board of Works, and especially as to the pressure put upon it, and apprehended at that time, in consequence of the distress. Undoubtedly, we were of opinion that it was our duty to do all that could be done in order to strengthen the Board; and it was found impossible that that special work could be done without some additional assistance. But with regard to the general character of the Board, I think the step taken previously of promoting Mr. Roberts to be Assistant Commissioner, and subsequently Commissioner, was a most important step. No doubt, if more duties are to be thrown on the Board, it is necessary to take care that there is full strength to discharge them. With regard to Colonel M'Kerlie himself, I feel that I must take the opportunity of protesting against the language which has been used with regard to that distinguished public servant. I know he has sometimes attempted to do more than was possible for one man to do, and I know he has sometimes brought himself into disfavour, not unnaturally, with those who are making applications for public money, owing to the great care and caution with which he has guarded the interests of the fund he had to lend. If that is a sin, it is, I think, a sin which is for the benefit of the country, and sinning is more commonly on the other side. No doubt, the Board ought to be continually watched and strengthened, so as to enable it to perform its duties properly; and I am sure there will be no indisposition on the part of the Treasury to recommend a proper liberality of treatment. As to the object of the Amendment now before the Committee, I must say I think we should be committing a very grave administrative error if we did not make use of the machinery we have—strengthened, it may be—already in use in the Board of Works. They are cognizant of the subject—they have a well-trained staff, and are capable of dealing with it. To attempt to set up two pieces of machinery side by side for the performance of what is practically the same work would be altogether useless and misleading, and, in my opinion, it might lead to serious consequences.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought this was scarcely a good opportunity for discussing the character of the Board of Works—whether it did its work efficiently or not, and whether it required any re-construction. The proposal of the clause was merely to add one other function to the Board of Works in the matter of recommending the Treasury to advance public money, and enabling the Board of Works to investigate the security offered by anyone who attempted reclamation. He had been delighted to hear the Prime Minister say that advances might probably be made, not only to Companies, but to tenantry. That was a most important concession. As to the Board of Works, he thought there could be no question that it did require reform to make it efficient. It had been agreed for a long time by both political Parties that that should be done. He did not agree with the noble Lord (Lord Frederick Cavendish) that the Board was strengthened merely by making an Assistant Commissioner into a Commissioner. It was true that a particular individual was promoted; but then his time was thoroughly taken up in the work before, so that there was no real increase of strength. The fact that there were only two Commissioners before was a distinct violation of the Act of Parliament, and the appointment of a third, when that appointment only amounted to the promotion of a man whose time was already fully occupied in the work, did not improve matters or strengthen the Board in any way. It was not correct that an Assistant Commissioner had been appointed, and there could be no doubt that the Board was greatly overweighted. In England, the Board of Works was a very agreeable ornamental Department; but in Ireland the Board performed all the great functions of the Government, and all those duties depended upon a very small staff. When the Board was appointed, its duties were, in comparison, hardly anything; but it had never been strengthened, and the result was that the Board had broken down on many occasions. There had never been a greater waste of money than over the measures taken with respect to the relief of the famine. He opposed the policy of the Government before, and he opposed it now; and if there was any credit due to the Board—and he admitted there was credit due for the manner in which they discharged their functions—that credit did not appertain to the head of the Board, but to the other members of the Board, and especially to Mr. Roberts. However, the Board did want looking into and strengthening, and he urged the Prime Minister not to throw fresh duties on the Board until it was strengthened. The announcement that money would be advanced to tenants would mean a great boon to the people, and he trusted the Committee would not continue the discussion on this particular question.

MR. MARUM said, that he had endeavoured to induce several proprietors of land to join him in undertaking work for repairing certain damage which had been done by a back-water at the confluence of the Nore and the Dinan in Kilkenny, and they all refused because the Board of Works was in bad odour, and they would have nothing to do with it.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he adhered to his opinion that the Board was the proper body to perform the duties which were in the 2nd clause of the Bill, with regard to reclamation. But he must admit that one suggestion which the hon. Member for the City of Cork had made deserved the consideration of the Government and the Committee. He did not think it could be denied that there would be great utility in having a central body, as suggested by the hon. Member, which would take a bird's-eye view of the whole country with regard to agriculture and to reclamation. He should be very sorry to take from the Board of Works the duty of seeing that the security for the money advanced was satisfactory, and equally sorry to take away from the Treasury the right to decide whether an advance should be made. He also thought the rules laid down in the 2nd sub-section with regard to advances were very wise; but, at the same time, he thought it would be possible to bring the Commission into operation without interfering with the authority of the Treasury or the powers and duties of the Board of Works, and he would suggest that the Commission might with advantage be empowered, in the first instance, to recommend that any scheme of reclamation should be taken up. If the words "on the recommendation of the Treasury" were inserted after the words "Treasury may," that would be as much as the hon. Member for the City of Cork would ask; and the effect of that would merely be that a Company, desiring to start a scheme of reclamation and wanting an advance, should submit their proposals to the Commission, who would then decide whether the advance asked should be recommended or not. That would not interfere with the authority of the Board of Works or with the powers of the Treasury, which he should wish to maintain. This suggestion was strengthened by the fact that money was to be advanced to tenants for reclamation purposes, many of whom would be already in connection with the Commission, and of whose character and solvency and general circumstances the Commissioners would be the best judges. Colonel M'Kerlie had one fault—he attempted to do too much, and whenever he thought it right to spend money, he always advocated it strongly and warmly; and the hon. Member for Kincardineshire, who sat on the Committee for improving Harbours, would remember the firmness with which that gentleman advocated certain improvements.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, that, as far as his experience went, the Board of Works were not open to the charge of inefficiency, but deserved great credit for the manner in which they acquitted themselves during the crisis of 1870, when a tremendous strain was thrown upon them without any increase of staff. They had to deal with something like 10,000 applications for loans. He had taken out a loan, and at no stage of the transaction had he had any reason to complain of unnecessary delay. It should be remembered that the Board had an amount of experience and machinery such as was not possessed by any other body in Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not know a great deal about the Board of Works; but he knew something about the Ulster Canal, for which for many years the Treasury and the Board of Works had allowed £1,200 a-year. A Committee which inquired into the matter some years ago, recommended that the grant should be discontinued and the land sold for grazing purposes; but the Board of Works and the Treasury insisted on throwing away £1,200 a-year, which might be much better employed in some other way. Then £200,000 had been spent on the Ballynamore and Ballycollin Canal by the Board of Works, and not a single penny had been got out of it. These were two cases of the mismanagement of the Board, and he maintained that the Land Commission was the proper tribunal to deal with land questions. The Commissioners would be well acquainted with all matters connected with land; they would have surveyors and engineers all over the country, and could easily get reports from those officers. The Government had better not give away money wholesale, but should use the machinery they were about to create instead of a body which had been held to be inoperative.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked whether, in view of the additional labour to be thrown on the Board of Works, the Government contemplated any reform or re-constitution of that body?

MR. GLADSTONE: No; our intention is that the Establishment shall remain, but will be made adequate to its duties as occasion may require.

MR. O'DONNELL thought reform was needless, as the whole thing would be swept away in a few years.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 89; Noes 25: Majority 64.—(Div. List, No. 300.)

MR. GLADSTONE: There are several Amendments on the Paper which, if passed, will have the effect of preventing advances being made to public Companies for the reclamation of waste lands, and restricting them to tenants or occupiers. If hon. Gentlemen will allow these Amendments to remain over for the present, I will make a proposal of a more extended nature in a new section to be introduced after sub-section 1, when we reach that point.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was a very important Amendment to which the right hon. Gentleman had not referred. It seemed to him preposterous that public Companies should be allowed to borrow money.

THE CHAIRMAN: The only Amendment which seems to be different from that of which the right hon. Gentleman has given Notice is that to which the hon. Member for Cavan alludes, and I do not know whether that is to be proposed. If it is not, then I will call upon Mr. Corbet.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (on behalf of Mr. CORBET) proposed, in page 17, line 17, to leave out the word "companies," and insert "tenants or occupiers." The statement, he said, of the Prime Minister tended very much in the direction the hon. Member desired; but he would like to omit the second part of the Amendment, and simply propose to leave out the word "companies."

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that if the hon. Gentleman leaves out "companies," without filling in anything, it will form nonsense; and he must be prepared with words to complete the sense.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he would propose to omit "companies," and insert "persons hereinafter mentioned." The evidence of Professor Baldwin, and everyone else who had spoken on the subject, showed that money lent to capital for reclamation had always ended in disaster, and that the only occasions when money had been spent on reclamation had been when the money had been given to labour. Nothing would open the door to abuse as giving the money to Companies, or more tend to separate, instead of unite, labour and ownership.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 17, to leave out the word "companies," in order to insert "persons hereinafter mentioned."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That the word "companies" stand part of the Clause."

MR. GIVAN said, he could not see that any good could be done by continuing the discussion after the statement of the Prime Minister, although he thought this was the proper point at which to consider this question. Under the circumstances, he would appeal to the hon. Member to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, it was a difficult thing to say on what terms Companies should be allowed to borrow, and that was not touched by the Amendment; but it was another question whether Companies should or should not be allowed to take up reclamation. The reclamation of land by any body was in itself a public gain; and if Companies chose to enter on the enterprise of reclamation they would in a great many cases effect good. There were several Amendments later on for imposing conditions on Companies as to how they should deal with land, so that they might not be in the position of having reclaimed the land to a great extent with funds provided from the public purse, and be able to then turn the land to their own aggrandizement. He hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was all very well to say that good results would follow from reclamation by Companies; but these Companies would be floated in London very much by swindlers, and the result would be thoroughly disastrous to all the persons concerned, and no benefit to the public. It would keep the land from the people who ought to improve it—namely, the bona fide occupiers; and the Companies would try to plunder all the parties interested in the land.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: I am very surprised at the extreme jealousy hon. Gentlemen show with regard to the operation of this clause. The intention of the Government with respect to it is, I believe, exactly what hon. Members of this House would wish it to be. It is said that in Ireland there are millions of acres of land not now cultivated; moderate calculations say that there are at least 2,000,000 of acres. I have undertaken, when speaking on one or two occasions in public, to assume that there was only 1,000,000 acres that might be profitably cultivated. Now, who will cultivate this land? It is obvious that if the present proprietors have not done it up to now, they can hardly be expected to do it in future. Who is to do it? The tenants who surround any large district of uncultivated land might add somewhat to the farms which they hold; that would come in under the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister has proposed to insert in the clause. But there may be a case where there are 5,000 or 10,000 acres of land that somebody, for a certain sum of money, might obtain possession of. A Company could do it, probably. For my own share, I do not think I should like to invest in it. But if a Company undertook to do it, it would be able to do it with profit. Individuals certainly could not; and the clause provides that the Company must expend one-half the sum before they can come to the Treasury to borrow any portion of it. Suppose there were 10,000 acres, and it would cost £5 an acre. [An hon. MEMBER: More.] An hon. Gentleman says that is not enough. Suppose, then, reclamation would cost £10 an acre. That would be £100,000 to put in proper order that particular district of the country. Then, when one-half of that money had been raised and spent—£50,000—the Company could come to the Treasury and ask for another £50,000. Of course, the £50,000 that had been expended would go far towards making the security good for the £50,000 it was intended to borrow. When the whole was done, the question is—What should be done with it? No one, surely, is of opinion that the Company would keep 10,000 acres of land in Ireland, and cultivate it as a great farm? What the Company would do, as a matter of course, would be to endeavour to sell this great piece of land in farms of such size as would meet the wants of the Irish farmers; and I should suppose that the Treasury, if such a thing was not certain without their interference, would ask, before advancing money—"What do you intend to do with the 10,000 acres of land when the reclamation is complete?" And they would say, as a matter of course—"We intend to divide it into farms varying from 10 to 50 or 100 acres, and to sell it in such a way as would be most profitable to the Company; and when the thing is wound up we shall be paid." By this means, occupying owners will grow up. Now, that seems to be exactly what hon. Gentlemen opposite have always been clamouring for as regards this question of reclamation. Who is to do it? No private individual would do it. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was not likely to do it. Who will do it, if you have not capital in Ireland? You may have men more generous and more enthusiastic in matters of this kind than in England, and they may undertake to do the work; but it can only be done in some degree by individual tenants, whose farms adjoin the unreclaimed land, and by Companies which may be formed for the purpose. I do not suppose the Board of Works or the Commission would themselves take 10,000 acres, and go through the whole process of reclaiming it. If they did, it would be for the purpose of dividing it into farms, just as a Company would undertake to do. Therefore, it appears to me that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland who object to this are objecting to the very plan by which there is any probability that any considerable portion of waste land in Ireland will be reclaimed. The clause which the Prime Minister proposes to add to this sub-section is this—

"That the Treasury may authorize the Board of Works to make advances for like purposes"

—I suppose like purposes for which Companies would be probably formed—

"to an occupier of land when satisfied that the tenancy or other security which he may have to offer, is such as to secure re-payment of principal and interest within such a number of years as the Treasury may fix, or when the landlord joins the occupier in giving such security."

I do not think it is possible to add any words to the clause or to do anything more comprehensive, and, at the same time, more simple or likely to be more useful than that which the Government intend. Then, why should we have long discussions, hindering the progress of the measure, upon a matter upon which we are all agreed? I venture to say that hon. Gentlemen opposite might allow the clause to proceed, seeing that the Government is perfectly willing to do everything that can be done rationally, and with any hope of success, for the reclamation of waste land.

Mr. PARNELL said, the right hon. Gentlemen had proved their case. He had pointed out that there were two descriptions of waste land which could be reclaimed under the operation of this clause, and of the sub-section which the Prime Minister proposed to add later on; he had pointed out that there was the waste land lying adjacent to the present holdings, which the tenants could take in and reclaim under the provisions of the sections; and then the right hon. Gentleman had shown that they had large tracts of land which were not in the occupation of any tenants, and which the adjoining tenants could not readily take up. With regard to the large tracts of land, they objected to the clause not so much because Companies were likely to avail themselves of the power given them in the clause of borrowing money, but simply because they feared that Companies would not so avail themselves. The fact was, they regarded this clause, apart from the section which the right hon. Gentleman had just read, as entirely illusory. It had been proved over and over again that land could not be profitably reclaimed in Ireland by the action of public Companies, and the right hon. Gentleman asked them—"What, then, do you propose?" He proposed that some means should be found for the purpose of allowing the labour of the country, which existed in such abundance, to get upon the land standing in need of that labour; and they believed that in that way, and in that way only, could they make the waste and semi-waste land, which the right hon. Gentleman had estimated at 2,000,000 acres, available for the public benefit. They did not believe, firstly, that the Companies would take advantage, to any great extent, of this clause; and, secondly, they did not believe if the Companies did take advantage of it, that their operation would be beneficial or profitable, or such as was calculated to encourage other Companies to come forward and try the scheme. He had placed an Amendment on the Paper, which he did not see now. He presumed it would stand in the New Clauses. It was an Amendment to leave out Clause 25, and substitute for it the clause he had placed on the Paper. His clause, according to his opinion, suggested a simple way in which the kind of land they proposed to deal with by allowing public Companies to borrow money in respect of its reclamation, might be made available for the benefit of the country. It was true, it might necessitate the establishment of some body for the purpose of looking after the matter. He supposed permission might have been given to the Commission; but it appeared the Commission was not to have such power. Perhaps it was not too late to give the power to the Board of Works. If they did give the Board the power of purchasing reclaimable land, and of allotting it amongst small tenants or labourers, or surplus labouring population in Ireland, in the manner prescribed by Professor Baldwin, they would be working a very beneficial change as regarded this uncultivated land. A clause authorizing the Board of Works to advance money to public Companies must be entirely illusory and fail to satisfy the necessity of the case; in fact, the present clause would be valueless. He regarded the sub-section which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had just read, as the most valuable part of the clause, though its provisions were entirely apart from the end the clause had in view. As to whether the Amendment should be taken to a division, perhaps, under all the circumstances of the case—as the Prime Minister had offered them such a concession—they might refrain from taking a division, and go into the further question which had been raised by the sub-section which the Prime Minister intended to move.

MR. SHAW said, he hoped they would be able to get rid of this discussion without a division. The Amendment to be proposed by the Prime Minister had entirely altered the value of the clause. Perhaps public Companies might not be willing to undertake the reclamation of land in Ireland; but if the work would not pay public Companies, he did not see how it could pay Government, or any Board of Works, or any other machinery provided for the purpose. It was not certain that Companies would not set about the reclamation of waste land in Ireland. He was in the City the other day, and saw the prospectus of a public Company being floated for the express purpose of reclaiming land in Ireland. He refused to go into the office for fear he might be tempted to embark in the enterprise. One saw so much nonsense now-a-days in the public prints in the shape of public Companies that he was bound to be careful. He, however, did not despair of the reclamation of the waste land in Ireland. They ought to be satisfied with the present discussion, and proceed to the next point.

Mr. Parnell

MR. O'DONNELL said, if they had an energetic and prosperous tenantry and small proprietary in Ireland, he did not see why the tenants should not be able to form Companies for the reclamation of waste lands.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT congratulated the Government on at length taking in hand, in a practical way, this important question. The Prime Minister knew perfectly well that from 1814 to 1847, by a series of Reports of Royal Commissions and of Select Committees, and in various ways, the reclamation of waste land had been strongly urged upon Parliament and upon successive Governments. Lord Devon's Commission reported strongly in favour of reclamation, and Sir Richard Griffith, in letters which he (Sir Eardley Wilmot) held in his hand, urged upon the Government the importance of this subject. He had himself been a party to a Bill with similar objects, which was introduced into Parliament in 1875 by Mr. John George Macarthy, who had devoted much time and labour to the subject of reclamation. That Bill he held in his hand, and it proposed to give temporary aid to the proprietors of lands, and to encourage them to bring the waste land into cultivation. The present Bill proposed to make advances to public Companies for the same purpose; and, though he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright) that the shareholders in them could not anticipate large dividends from the enterprize, yet on the whole he regarded the clause as one calculated to advance the agricultural and general prosperity of Ireland.

Amendment negatived.

MR. GIVAN, in moving, in page 17, line 19, after "land," to insert "agricultural buildings," said, the Amendment was merely a verbal one, and his only object in moving it was that the tenant should not be precluded from getting money from the Board of Works for necessary agricultural buildings.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 19, after "land," insert "agricultural buildings."—(Mr. Givan.)

MR. PARNELL said, before this Amendment was put, he would like permission to insert in line 19, after "waste," "semi-waste." There was a great deal of land in a semi-waste condition, and he hardly considered the words of the clause in this matter sufficiently expressive.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 19, after "waste," insert "semi-waste."—(Mr. Parnell.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he thought the addition of the words quite unnecessary, because waste was merely a question of degree. The object of the hon. Gentleman was fully accomplished by the use of the word "waste."

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked if the Government thought it necessary to put into this clause anything concerning the reclamation of the foreshores?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would insert the word "foreshores" on Report.

MR. PARNELL asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GIVAN said, that before the Amendment was withdrawn he might move that after "waste," the word "unprofitable" should be employed.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) remarked that this was also covered by the present words of the clause.

Amendment (Mr. Parnell), by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not object to the introduction of the words "agricultural buildings."

MR. WARTON did not quite understand how the clause would read if the proposed words were inserted. What did the hon. Gentleman mean by agricultural buildings?

MR. GIVAN said, he meant by agricultural buildings, agricultural buildings.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, "the erection of agricultural buildings," was, perhaps, what was wanted.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL suggested that the difficulty might be got over if the Amendment were altered so as to read "or any other works including agricultural buildings."

MR. GIVAN contended that his Amendment was perfectly intelligible.

[Twenty-fourth Night.]

DR. LYONS regarded the introduction of the words as quite unnecessary.

MR. GLADSTONE said, the hon. Gentleman might, perhaps, waive the point, considering how comprehensive the words of the clause were.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he hoped the Government would agree to the Amendment, because "agricultural buildings" were not now specifically included. He had had some experience in the administration of Acts of Parliament, and he did not doubt that at some time when this Act came to be administered, it would be ruled that agricultural buildings were not included.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL thought the words now used were sufficient. Suppose they put in "agricultural buildings," what would they do with roads and other matters which were obviously agricultural matters?

MR. GIVAN said, that, according to his knowledge of the derivation of words, the word "agriculture" would not include buildings, and therefore he would respectfully suggest to the Prime Minister that he should adhere to his acceptance of the Amendment. The introduction of the words could do no harm, but would assuredly make things clear and save controversy hereafter.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD pointed out that the Companies now engaged in agricultural improvement were largely occupied in building. He was fully persuaded the clause would include buildings.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LITTON in moving, in page 17, line 19, after "land," to insert "reclamation of foreshores," said, this Amendment would meet the view of the hon. and learned Member for Meath (Mr. A. M. Sullivan). All who were acquainted with Ireland knew that there was a large quantity of foreshore, which was quite capable of being utilized.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 19, after "land," insert "reclamation of foreshores."—(Mr. Litton.)

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he was aware the question was not as simple as it might seem at a glance, for there would necessarily arise out of it some questions as to the Government right to foreshores. This Land Bill, or any other Land Bill, would only partially settle the Land Question unless they could, by the industry of the people and by measures such as this, add a county or two to Ireland. He believed they could add a county to Ireland by the reclamation of interior waste lands; and he had long thought they might add a considerable area to Ireland if they could get the consent of the Crown—reserving and protecting in all reasonable way the rights of the Crown—to the reclamation of the foreshores. There was a large field in Ireland for useful enterprise of this kind. At a time when a neighbouring State was laying out millions of money in reclaiming their foreshores, we might very properly try, by our independent enterprise and industry, to do something to imitate, on a small scale, the industry and enterprise of the Dutch Government. He knew the question was beset with certain difficulty; but he would ask the Prime Minister whether he could not, consistently with the preservation of the legitimate interests of the Crown, take some steps towards the reclamation of Ireland's foreshores?

MR. FINDLATER called attention to the successful embankment, drainage, and sale of the Crown shores which had been carried out in Holland, and noticed that the Crown had already obtained 6,477 acres by reclaiming the foreshores of the Humber at Sunk Island. This land produced £13,196 annually, or about 40s. and 8d. an acre. It was very desirable that a large quantity of the foreshore about Dublin Bay on its north and south shores should be reclaimed in the same manner as was already done with the portion embanked between the Dodder and Merrion. There were about 3,000 acres available. The work would be quite as successful as the enclosing of the foreshores of Lough Foyle and Lough Swilly had proved.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, the clause as it stood left it open to the Crown to carry out any schemes of reclamation it thought proper, and to make such conditions as would protect its own rights. He did not think the object of his hon. and learned Friend would be attained by the adoption of the Amendment, although he hoped the Amendment would be accepted, because it was a very useful one.

MR. GLADSTONE said, they would do well to include some words of this nature. He would suggest that the words introduced should be "or foreshores or waste lands."

THE CHAIRMAN: We have passed that now. The Amendment may be moved on Report.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he had risen just now to propose an Amendment of this character, but the Chairman had informed him that it could be more properly brought on at a later stage of the Bill. He heartily thanked the Prime Minister for assenting to the proposition.

MR. PARNELL said, that before they left this question of foreshores, he wished to express a hope that the Government would favourably consider the question of allowing them to be sold to public Companies on reasonable terms. In the estuary of the Shannon there was a large amount of waste land. Some land in the estuary of this river had been reclaimed, but there was still a large quantity which could be reclaimed with advantage. The public Companies would be able to do this; in fact, it was about the only work of reclamation that they could undertake. There was a Mr. Drinkwater now engaged in reclaiming the foreshores of the Fergus River, in the estuary of the Shannon, and he (Mr. Parnell) had been told that this gentleman had paid a large sum for the purpose of being allowed to enter on the work.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Amendment he had on the Paper was of extreme importance, and it was to enable the Board of Works to make advances for the construction of roads, railways, or tramways, required as feeders to main lines of railway communication. In the West of Ireland the principal railways were, in some instances, 50 and 60 miles away from the agricultural portion of the country, and the inhabitants were perfectly ready to make lines of very light railway in these districts if they could get facilities for doing it. It was impossible to express to the Committee the difficulty of obtaining advances of public money for this purpose. Railway Acts were extremely expensive and cumbersome, and, unless something in the nature of his proposal were done, the people who cultivated the land in the extreme West, where there were no railways, would continue to find it impossible to get their crops to market, and would be placed at a great disadvantage in competing with their more favourably situated countrymen. His proposal, if adopted, could do no harm, as the works he contemplated would all be subject to the approval of the Board of Works and the Treasury. It was only where these two bodies were satisfied that the works could be profitably executed that they would be allowed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, line 20, after "improvement," insert "including roads, railways, or tramways, required as feeders to main lines of railway communication."—(Mr. Mitchell Henry.)

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to take the Chairman's opinion on a point of Order. This was a Land Bill, and the hon. Member was seeking to insert a provision in it for empowering the construction of railways. Could such a proposal be entertained?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must confess that, with the hon. Member who has just spoken, I think this Amendment is altogether outside the scope of the measure. If it were a question of lending money to existing railways for the reclamation of land, we should know what we were about; but that is provided for by Acts now existing, and for which Railway Companies give their debentures. And if, on the other hand, it is a question of lending money for reclamation for purposes of agricultural improvement, we know where we are; but it is nothing of the kind. The proposal is indefinite as to whom we should have to deal with and as to what the works might be that, though I do not discourage the endeavour to deal with the matter; and, though I think that such a measure as the hon. Member proposes might be useful, I fail to see how it could come in here.

THE CHAIRMAN: Before the hon. Member moved the Amendment, I thought the proposal was in connection with the reclamation of land—that these railways and tramways were for the purpose of giving facilities for such reclamation. That, however, does not appear to be the case, and, in the large sense in which the hon. Member has moved the Amendment, no doubt it is outside the scope of the Bill.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he had no objection to the Amendment being taken in connection with reclamation. He was absolutely certain that unless something of the kind he proposed were done the West of Ireland would continue to be in the deplorable condition in which they now found it. He hoped it would be remembered that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had prevented, or, at all events, done all in his power to prevent, the greatest improvement that could be effected in the condition of the poorest people in the West of Ireland. Of course, now, with the Government and the Irish Representatives against him, it was no use pressing the Amendment. Her Majesty's Ministers, seemingly, did not entertain the intention of improving the people of the West of Ireland in the spirit in which alone that improvement could be effected. This Bill, as it now stood, would do very little for these unfortunate people. Their pauperism would continue—it would remain the scandal to England and to Europe that it now was. Parliament would do nothing to assist these miserable people out of their wretched condition. No private Companies would assist them. What private Company would come forward to reclaim land in the West of Ireland under existing circumstances? Why, none in the world. No attempt had yet been made; but, if his Amendment were accepted, the people in particular localities, a long way from railways, would, with the assistance of the landlords, only too gladly make light railways and tramways, and add the reclaimed land to the agricultural wealth of the country. He only asked that facilities should be given to them for obtaining advances of money to assist them in carrying out objects which the Prime Minister himself admitted to be highly advantageous. This Amendment was on the point of agricultural reclamation, and he was exceedingly sorry that the right hon. Gentleman could not accept his proposal.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he looked upon the Amendment as connected with reclamation. In Galway County—which he represented—for instance, one of the uses of a light railway, or tramway, would be to transport the limestone which would be necessary in carrying out reclamation. Without such a road or railway there could be no reclamation. The roads that at present existed were looked after tolerably efficiently; but it would be advisable to have such an Amendment as this in the Bill, because their main object ought to be to increase the general resources of the country, and, unless they had cheaper means of communication, they could not do that. There were hundreds of miles of country in the West of Ireland which, at present, were unsupplied with railway communication, although it was just the district which required it most.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, there was no doubt in the world that the narrow-gauge railways and tramways could do a great deal in Ireland; but the question was whether these works could be promoted in a Land Bill dealing entirely with the matter of agriculture? As hon. Members who had advocated railways of this description knew perfectly well, he had been their stout ally when they had brought forward their proposals.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER regretted that the hon. Member for County Galway had not received more support from the Irish Members. It certainly did not look well for the Irish Representatives to raise points of Order on proposals for carrying out improvements in Ireland. The Amendment might not be quite in Order, but he should like to see its object effected.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must say that it is not competent for this Amendment to be put, or for hon. Members to discuss it, when—according to what has just fallen from the hon. and gallant Member for County Galway (Major Nolan)—its object is to bring about the construction of hundreds of miles of railway. I only allowed the Amendment to be put on the understanding that it was to apply to railways on the estates where particular reclamations were being effected—to railways considered necessary for the purposes of reclamation. As the discussion is going upon the question of railway construction in the ordinary sense, the Amendment cannot be put.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I would call the attention of the Committee to the words of the Amendment. They are—"including roads, railways, or tramways, required as feeders to main lines of railway communication." It seems to me that the mere reading of the words shows they are out of Order.

MAJOR NOLAN said, in answer to what had fallen from the Chairman, he wished to disclaim any idea of suggesting that under this Bill they should make a railway 200 or 300 miles long.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he did not wonder at the Committee refusing to support the Amendment, seeing that the Irish Members themselves threw cold water on it.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he had not mentioned the word "railway," because he had wished to avoid going into a matter that was doubtful. His intention had been to call the attention of the hon. Member for Galway to the spirit in which the Prime Minister had received his proposal. The right hon. Gentleman had felt the force of the objection on the ground of Order; but he distinctly sympathized with the object which the hon. Member for Galway had in view. He (Mr. O'Connor Power) would suggest to the hon. and gallant Member, in view of the reception his Amendment had received—the opposition to it having been mainly on the ground of Order, and its principle having been approved of—that he should re-cast it, restricting it to reclamation works, and bring it up on Report, when he had no doubt it would receive the support of the English and Scotch, as well as the Irish Members.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to say, in answer to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Galway—

THE CHAIRMAN: There is no Question before the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR: I will put myself in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: I call upon Mr. Gladstone, who has an Amendment to propose.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise to move the words which I promised the Committee to propose to the effect that the Board of Works may make advances to occupiers of land when satisfied that the security is such as to secure the repayment of principal and interest, or even when the landlord joins the occupier in giving such security. There are two branches to this proposition, and the later one—when the landlord joins the occupier in giving the security—was a recommendation made by a Departmental Commission that examined into the case for the Board of Works. As to the other case, under the former law, when the interest of the tenant was not so far recognized by law as to become a regular marketable commodity, it was proper, probably, to confine the advances to tenants to cases where there was a definite term of a considerable number of years unexpired in the lease. Now the case is different. First of all, there is the definite interest of the tenant in the holding; and, secondly, there may be a statutory term; and, under these circumstances, in many cases the tenants will be in a condition to offer a really good security for the purpose of an advance. That, of course, will have to be examined, and, under these two heads, I think it is well to make a proposal of this kind. It would not have been desirable to introduce it into the first part of the clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, line 20, after "improvement," insert "The Treasury may authorise the Board of Works to make advances for the like purposes to an occupier of land when satisfied that a tenancy or other security which he may have to offer is such as to secure the repayment of principal and interest within such a number of years as the Treasury may think fit, or when the landlord joins the occupier in giving such security."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he did not rise to discuss the policy of the Amendment; but he wished to ask a question as to repayment, as he observed that the right hon. Gentleman had adopted different words in this Amendment to those in the 3rd sub-section. In the 3rd sub-section it was set forth that the money should be repaid in accordance with the provisions of a previous Act; but in the Amendment the money was to be repaid according to the discretion of the Treasury.

MR. GLADSTONE: The reason is this. If money in this way is to be advanced to an occupier of land, the only possible way in which you can do it is to leave the matter to the discretion of the Treasury. In the 3rd sub-section we are dealing with positive interests which, like those of the landlord, are permanent in their character. There is no difficulty in such a case to refer to the provisions of an Act which deal with loans made on the security of permanent interests. But in the case we are now dealing with it is obvious that the tenant's interests may be of a very limited and varying character, and that the advances may be small. I think the way we propose is the only way of doing the thing if it is to be done at all.

MR. CHARLES RUSSELL said, this was a very valuable Amendment, and went in the direction of one that he had himself put on the Paper; but it would be more effective, and was a great improvement on his proposal.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he agreed with the hon. and learned Member (Mr. C. Russell) that the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was a wise and acceptable one, and he hoped the Committee would adopt it. But there was one point on which, he thought, it fell short, and it was this. He was not sure whether he interpreted the Amendment rightly, but, if he did, no money could be advanced except to a person already in possession of some land. That scheme was admirable so far as it went; but it avoided one important part of the question of reclamation, because, as had been pointed out by various authorities, there was a large quantity of labour in Ireland which was quite capable of being applied to the reclamation of land—labour not from the farm, and not of people who were in the occupation of land. He had been trying to find in the Blue Book, Professor Baldwin's allusion to this before the Land Commission; but he had not succeeded. His recollection of the evidence, however, was sufficient to justify him in saying that Professor Baldwin pointed out several instances where labourers had had small pieces of unreclaimed land given to them either at no rent or a very small nominal rent, and, having managed to exist for the first year on borrowed money, or in some other way, had in time rendered the land valuable and capable of yielding them a subsistence.

MR. HEALY said, the hon. Member was in error. The persons he proposed to give employment to would have no interest in the reclamations that would be made.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that as far as he understood the Amendment, it seemed to him very reasonable; but, at the same time, he thought the Government should have put a proposal of this sort on the Paper. The Amendment, as also the clause to which it related, were very important, and the Committee should not have been kept in the dark with regard to it. He would appeal to the Government for the future to put their Amendments on the Paper at least a day before they intended to bring them forward.

MR. GLADSTONE: The greatest efforts have been made by the Government to put their Amendments on the Paper. When the hon. Member comes to have charge of a great and complicated measure to which there are no fewer than 1,500 Amendments—Amendments which are put down from day to day—he will appreciate the difficulty of the present position of Her Majesty's Government. It was not an easy matter to examine the many Amendments proposed, and to make those proposals which seem to us to be necessary with regard to them.

MR. GORST said, that, in justice to his hon. Friend (Mr. E. Stanhope), he would point out that this was an Amendment which could only be moved by Her Majesty's Government. It was an Amendment making a charge upon the public funds, and therefore was one which could only be moved by a Minister of the Crown. His hon. Friend surely was justified in complaining that an Amendment of this kind, which could only be moved by a Member of the Government, had not been duly put down on the Notice Paper.

MR. P. MARTIN said, that the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. C. Russell), which was somewhat similar to that of the Prime Minister's, had been on the Paper for a week. The Amendment now proposed simply used different and more effective words to give effect to the same object as that stated by the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk. The Committee could not be said to have had this Amendment in any way hurriedly presented for their consideration.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON wished to say a word in justification of what had fallen from his hon. Friend (Mr. E. Stanhope). The Committee were adopting a novel principle, because money was to be advanced on the tenants's interest in his holding, and that interest the Government had said, over and over again, they could not define. Under these circumstances, the Committee should have had Notice of such an important Amendment as this.

MR. DAWSON said, that if this Amendment was to be applied only to tenants in occupation of waste land, it would do very little good indeed. There was lots of waste lands, at present, in which no tenant had any interest. If the Government insisted upon this interest, they would be doing very little to put the waste lands into the possession of the Irish people.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER was not surprised that the suggestion of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) should have attracted some attention. He agreed with the hon. Member that unless some provision were made that would invite unemployed labourers to apply themselves to the reclamation of waste land, reclaimable lands would never be reclaimed, and the danger of periodical famine in Ireland would never be removed. There was an Amendment further on in the name of the hon. Member for Dublin, the object of which was to enable the Land Commission to buy lands for the purpose of tempting farmers in the crowded districts to cultivate them. That would cover the whole matter. No doubt, the hon. Member for Galway had done well in calling attention to this matter; but, if he had seen the Amendment lower down, he would have known that there was ample time to provide for the case he had in view.

MAJOR NOLAN said, the Board of Works ought to be enabled to lend sums of less than £100, otherwise the small tenants might not be able to derive benefit from the advances. Would the Government give the Board of Works power to advance small sums?

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, that under the Relief of Distress Act loans of £40 were granted. He would point out, in answer to the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), that the Companies who would engage in the work of reclamation would find it to their interest and advantage to employ labourers of the kind referred to, and, no doubt, they would do so.

MR. PELL wished to know what security they would have that the improvements would be carried out when the money was advanced? Was the money to be given in advance before the improvements were effected or after? He should be glad to know in what position the Treasury would stand in the case of a tenant who had borrowed money for the improvement of his tenancy, had subsequently broken the statutory conditions of his lease, and upon whose interest in his holding the landlord, under the Act, had the first lien for unpaid rent? In such a case, who would have the first claim, the landlord or the Treasury? He agreed with the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) as to the disadvantage they were under in not having this Amendment—which was by no means so simple as it looked—printed on the Paper. The Committee should have had an opportunity of seeing it in print, and of giving it the careful consideration it deserved. At the same time, there was some force in the statement of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister on this head.

MR. GLADSTONE: The question is a very reasonable one. I do not know that we have a right altogether to exclude improvements; but we must look not to them, but to the value of the securities. One guarantee that improvements will be effected is the interest the tenant has in his holding.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I cannot help thinking that that is taking rather a sanguine view of the matter. There will be a great temptation to men to undertake works that seem at first sight—until tested—very likely to yield profit. I understand that these tenants are not to be subject to the conditions that Companies are to be subject to, and that it will not be necessary, before they receive an advance, that they shall have expended some amount of money themselves. The money is to be advanced directly the Treasury are satisfied that the tenants have sufficient security to offer. We know what the outcry against the Board of Works has been; and if there is any hesitation on their part to advise the Treasury, or any hesitation on the part of the Treasury to accept the suggestions made to it, they will be called narrow-minded, and will be accused of preventing that which is in the interests of the people of Ireland. These words require very careful consideration before they are adopted by the Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE: I do not think the primary business of the Government, in these cases, is to look at the value of the improvements. We do not inquire whether the tenant's works are works that must necessarily answer. What we ask is whether the tenant can offer us a security of such a substantial character as to warrant our making the advance. That is the principle upon which all these offers to landlords and tenants have been made. Heretofore it has always been done on the very firm and solid interests of the landlord, or on the interests of the tenant that could be stated to Parliament, such as a given unexpired term of a lease. Evidently, the business to be done must be done on the credit of the Treasury. No one can see what the value of the tenant right will be, and I do not see my way to define it in an Act of Parliament. We must leave the Treasury to its own responsibilities as to any rule for making advances.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: But who will have priority of claim? Will the Treasury take priority over other advances—over other debts?

MR. GLADSTONE: I apprehend that that will certainly be so.

MR. W. H. SMITH: I think that, as a matter of practice, it is customary for the Board of Works to make itself satisfied that the works have been carried out before the instalments are paid over to the landowner. It is found to be a most necessary and useful rule, because, otherwise, money which is borrowed for one purpose, may be spent on another. Unless this condition is insisted on in connection with advances of all kinds, I am afraid that misappropriation will arise.

MR. GREGORY thought it was necessary that some solid security should be given to the Treasury.

MR. WARTON said, he must protest against the plan adopted by the Government of moving Amendments of a most important character on such very slight Notice. Before they considered an Amendment, two things were necessary. First, that they should get the actual words of it. Now, if Amendments were showered upon them in this way, it was a difficult thing to get possession of the words of a proposal. After this, it would be a necessary qualification for a Member of Parliament to be able to write short-hand, otherwise they would not be able to get on. If he had not been able to write very quickly, and if he had not heard the Amendment read out three times—first by the Chief Secretary, then by the Premier, and lastly by the Chairman—he should not have been able to gather, even in the imperfect manner in which he had gathered them, the phrases of the Amendment. And the next step, after getting the words of an Amendment, was to understand them. The very moment an hon. Member commenced to comprehend them, the hon. Member for Sussex (Mr. Gregory), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith), or some other hon. Member, rose and pointed out a difficulty. He did not suppose that all hon. Gentlemen present cared to understand the words. He did, however, and had watched every word of the measure with the intention of understanding it, if possible. There was a point upon which he was not clear, and upon which he should like to have some information. There was a section of the Bill which provided that there should be no advance, even to a Company, before part of the money had been expended. Supposing that the money had been expended, and supposing that, at the same time, a baronial guarantee had been given, what security would the Treasury get from the Company?

MR. GLADSTONE: We will look carefully into the conditions on which such advances are to be made to tenants, and it will be our duty to suggest words to meet the difficulty the hon. and learned Member anticipates.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Did I understand the right hon. Gentleman just now to say we are not to look to the value of the improvements, but to the value of the securities, so that the Government may be safe? The Prime Minister said, afterwards, that the Treasury were to have a prior claim over other creditors. I would ask, then, what is to become of the landlord, if his security is to be subsequent to the tenant's liability to the Government?

MR. GLADSTONE said, the existing Act would deal with such cases.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether they could not manage to persuade the Government to postpone this matter? He did not wish to meet the question in any hostile spirit. He had carefully examined the Amendment in the hands of the Chairman, and found there were two alternatives in it. One was that the Government might advance the money if the tenant produced sufficient security; and the other was that the Government might advance the money without any substantial guarantee at all if the landlord joined in the security. The result of that might be that the Government might advance money, though the landlord was directly opposed to the expenditure. That was an extraordinary position to put the landlord in. They had admitted in Ireland that which up to now they had never admitted, and what was not admitted in England—namely, that the tenant had an interest in the soil. This being so, surely the two persons who had an interest in the land should co-operate. If there was to be a Government advance for effecting permanent improvements, surely the two partners in the concern should concur in the arrangement, especially as it appeared that the Treasury, as a creditor, was to have priority of claim for payment. The tenant might have only a fleeting interest in the soil—he might be here to-day, and gone to-morrow. There was always a substantial security so far as the landlord was concerned, but this was not so in the case of the tenant; and yet they proposed to give him an advance, absolutely irrespective of the consent of his partner with a more permanent interest. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) was afraid the matter had not received from the Government that deep attention which the importance of the subject required. That the occupier, who might break his contract at any time, should have as great a right as the owner of the fee-simple, was a remarkable thing.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord has repeated his argument over at least 10 times. It is said that what we propose is novel in principle, and that there is no precedent by which to sustain it. The noble Lord must have entered the House immediately before he made his speech; otherwise, he would have been aware that the principle of making advances to occupiers is already recognized in our law, and that the questions with regard to the relative positions of the landlord and tenant, and the degree at which it is right to insure that the works are intended to be, or have been begun to be, executed, are dealt with in our law, and that the only change now made is with regard to new interests. New interest having been defined on behalf of the tenant, it seems reasonable to extend the principle already well established to those interests. I fully admit that we shall have to apply to this clause the same principles of justice as to the bona fides of the tenants that we have applied in other cases. I mean the principles applied in the case of the Act of 1847, passed in consequence of the Famine. It was provided in that measure that a tenant might become a borrower from the Government for improvements; but the lease was liable to forfeiture on breach of conditions.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he had not yet received an answer to his question.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. and gallant Member is mistaken in supposing that the limit of £100 would apply to this clause.

MR. PELL said, he thought the point to which the Prime Minister had addressed his observations was hardly clear yet. If the improvements contemplated in the Amendment were to be such as would add to the letting value of the land and improve the security, no one could have any objection. He should be pleased to see money advanced to the tenants for the purpose; but they could not disguise from themselves that the tenant might borrow to make improvements which would not add permanently to the value of the land. Money had never been advanced to the tenants of England to enable them to improve the letting value of their land; but where English tenants were in difficulties he should be glad to see it done. There should be some direction to authorities in the Amendment to the effect that where money was lent to a tenant for improvements, those improvements should be of a permanent character, and not such, for instance, as would run out by a severe course of cropping or careless treatment of the land. He trusted the latter part of the Amendment would be accepted by the Committee, for the landlord would be a most proper person to judge whether or not the improvements were desirable and proper. The very fact of his joining in the security would be a guard against the borrowing of money by a tenant for a visionary purpose.

MR. WARTON said, the Premier had given the noble Lord credit for repeating his argument over many times, and had proceeded to answer the argument advanced. He (Mr. Warton) was, no doubt, to be blamed for not having repeated his question several times, for, as a punishment, no reply had been vouchsafed him. What he wished to know was this. Why did the Premier propose to make advances to the occupier on terms so very different—so very much more favourable—to those allowed to a Company? Why should the Treasury advance money to a mere occupier, with no restriction whatever as to a single farthing having been spent?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, there need be no difficulty in the minds of hon. Members as to the character of the improvements. "Improvements," in Ireland, were well known to mean works which added to the letting value of the holding and were suitable to it.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I should like to ask the Government whether there is any precedent in which advances have been made by the State before any work at all has been done?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that the manner in which the thing was done at present was this. The State authorized advances to be made; this was carried out by the Board of Works, and a memorandum was required from the person borrowing, setting out the title to the holding, the work to be done, and the money value of the work. That was tested by an engineer of the Board of Works, who reported whether the memorandum was substantially correct, and if it was the advance was authorized by the Board. According to the present practice in Ireland, the advance was made in five parts. As soon as one-fifth of the work was completed, a report to that effect was made out by the person to whom the advance was to be made. The work so executed was examined by the engineer to the Board of Works, who reported whether the work was properly executed pursuant to the requirements and the memorandum. On receipt of that report, if favourable, one-fifth was advanced, and the same process was repeated in regard to each successive fifth.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Will the same system be adopted under this Bill?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Yes; the arrangement will be such as to suit the ordinary requirements of the Board of Works.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would move to amend the proposed Amendment by leaving out the word "or," and substituting "and." By this it would be necessary for the landlord to join the tenant in the security. He considered it monstrous to force on the landlord improvements that he might not want, and which, in fact, he might consider detrimental to the letting value of the estate. A tenant might, for his own purposes, wish to carry out improvements which would alter the character of that part of the landlord's estate, or wish to carry out a system of drainage which would not fit in with the drainage of the adjoining land. They said the landlord had a joint interest in the land; why, then, should he not have a joint interest in the improvements to carry out which money was to be advanced by the State?

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after the word "fit," to leave out "or," and insert "and."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. GLADSTONE: We propose that there shall be two conditions under which the tenant can obtain an advance for improvements. One is when the landlord joins the tenant in giving security, and the other is where the tenant himself gives a sufficient security. The one method is entirely agreeable to the present law, and only a new extension is given to it; the other is as to the grant made on the security of the landlord and tenant. The noble Lord's proposal is to give the landlord an absolute veto, and that we cannot accept.

MR. BRODRICK wished to know whether the improvements would include the erection of labourers' cottages?

MR. WARTON wished to know whether the words "such security" had any reference to what went before?

MR. GLADSTONE: In reply to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Brodrick), I may say that labourers' cottages are included.

Question put, and agreed to.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK said, he had an Amendment on the Paper, the object of which was to require an accurate record to be kept of the archæological remains likely to be injured by the improvements for which advances were to be made by the State. The great importance and interest attaching to the antiquities, which were so plentifully scattered over the soil of Ireland, was only now beginning to be realized in this part of the United Kingdom; and the present was a very fitting opportunity, and one which might not present itself again for some time, to endeavour to preserve some record of them. This proposal was not open to many of the objections which had been taken to other means of dealing with ancient monuments. It would in no way interfere with the rights of property, and it would not interfere with the scope of the Bill, but would merely provide for the preservation of those relics and antiquities which, if once destroyed, could never be replaced again. The proposal had received the sympathy of the Council of the Royal Irish Academy, a body that had done very good work in connection with the antiquities of that country. Whilst the Government were paying large sums for patches and shreds of antiquities and relics from other countries, they systematically neglected the evidences and remains of civilization which lay at their very feet, and which were as important as any ancient relics to which they had ever devoted their attention.

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, line 20, after the word "security," at the end of the foregoing Amendment, to insert the words "Provided, That, whenever advances are made by the Treasury for the purpose of reclaiming or improving waste or uncultivated land, on which archæological remains exist, likely to be injured by the operations, accurate plans, views, and descriptions of such remains shall be taken in triplicate, and one copy shall be deposited in the British Museum, one copy in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy, and one copy in the National Museum of Scottish Antiquities in Edinburgh; and that efficient means shall be taken to preserve and secure for the National Collections all relics of antiquity which may be discovered in the course of the operations."—(Mr. Cochran-Patrick.)

rience they had had in the past, there could be no doubt that when these works were carried out many of these ancient relics would be destroyed. Already a large number of them had perished, and in the future they should not allow such a thing to occur. The House, in an early period of the Session, passed by a considerable majority a Resolution in favour of preserving ancient monuments. He should have liked to ask whether Her Majesty's Government would be prepared to take any steps in accordance with that Resolution; but he had abstained from pressing the right hon. Gentleman, because he knew very well what difficulties the Government had to contend with in connection with other subjects in passing this Bill; yet this matter was one of great importance, and he felt bound to impress upon the Committee the desirability of preserving, at any rate, a record of any relics which might be destroyed.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN said, he thanked the hon. Gentleman most sincerely for having brought forward this Amendment; though, at the same time, he should like to point out to him an alteration of which it was susceptible. He would suggest to him that all he should ask the tenant to do would be to allow reasonable facilities to the officials of the Royal Irish Academy in making these drawings. If they threw on the tenant the duty of themselves preparing these views and sketches, they would run the risk of having some very in-artistic and untrustworthy productions sent up to Dublin. He not only sympathized, however, with the object of the Amendment, but he had prepared an Amendment to it, which he thought would render it more effective. He would propose that, after the word "operations," the following words should be inserted:—

"The persons proposing to carry out such reclamation or improvement shall allow reasonable facilities to any person authorized on their behalf by the Board of Works."

And he would suggest that most of the remaining words should be omitted; because, to whom could they intrust the duty of sending one copy to the British Museum, one copy to the Library of the Royal Irish Academy, and one to the Museum of Scottish Antiquities in Edinburgh? When they who were now in the House were all passed and gone there might be many persons sitting in their places who might regret very much that such a plan as that now proposed had not been carried out. He had had occasion to visit various parts of Ireland for the purpose of making sketches of Irish antiquities, and had had great reason to regret that there were not in existence such records as the hon. Member sought by his Amendment to have prepared.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, the only objection he had to this Amendment was that it seemed to assume that all these monuments in Ireland were to be destroyed. As Her Majesty's Government, however, would get a lien upon the land for which they advanced the money, they should be asked at once to take steps to insure that, at least, the small antiquities should be inclosed and preserved. Of course, the preservation of many large antiquities might interfere with the proper cultivation of the land; but as to small ones, no drawing could have the same archaeological value as the original relic. It was a very difficult thing, at any time, to get good and accurate drawings that would be of any value made of these things. He trusted Her Majesty's Government would take the whole question into their consideration, so as to deal with it in such a way as to preserve, at all events, those antiquities which it would not cost much money or labour to save, and to have accurate drawings made of the remainder.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he wished to remind the Committee that the question now before them was the progress of the Irish Land Bill. The Motion of the hon. Member had not reference to the preservation of ancient monuments, but to the preparation of views and drawings of them. Well, the national history of a country was not written in views and drawings. It was written in the monuments that existed, and he believed that Ireland possessed an advantage over every other part of the United Kingdom in the number and preservation of its great national monuments. Most of these national monuments of Ireland were ecclesiastical and were under the care of a Board, whose engineer inspected them from time to time, and preserved them from ruin. The monuments existing on uncultivated lands were Druidical remains, which consisted of large stones, and raths, usually called Danish raths, or cromlechs; and these were and would be best preserved by the national sentiment, as long as national feeling existed in Ireland. The people of Ireland would no more allow a rath to be invaded by the plough, or a stone to be taken from a cromlech, than they would allow the roof-tree to be taken from over their heads.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, there was evidently a strong feeling in the Committee on this subject; but, no doubt, hon. Members would be thoroughly satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman would say that he would be prepared later on to put words into the Bill for the purpose of preserving these ancient monuments.

MR. GLADSTONE: I recognize the excellent spirit in which my hon. Friend has made an appeal to me; but, at the same time, I really cannot accept the task he invites me to undertake. I am asked to frame a scheme for the general preservation of ancient monuments, and to introduce into this Bill such words as will be conformable to its other provisions. Well, it is not in my power to do anything of the kind. If the Committee chooses—if the Committee sees its way to framing a scheme of this kind—it is not for us to offer an obstinate opposition to it; but it is impossible for me to undertake an engagement in the face of the Committee, when I know that I have neither mental strength nor time to fulfil it.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, he should be extremely sorry to impose any additional tax upon either the time or strength of the Prime Minister; but, so far from it being the case that ancient Irish monuments were now well cared for, he had only that morning received from Miss Stokes, an Irish lady, whom most of them must have heard of, a list of the Irish antiquities which had been demolished within the last few years. From this list it would be seen how misinformed on this subject was the Solicitor General for Ireland. What was it that his hon. Friend asked for? It was not that any general scheme should be prepared for the preservation of the ancient monuments throughout the entire Kingdom; but that where, in consequence of the works carried out under this Bill, monuments were destroyed, full records for historic and scientific purposes should be kept of them. The Solicitor General for Ireland had said that the monuments that would be interfered with would be Druidical stones. But he would point out that very frequently when works had been undertaken on these waste lands, other antiquities had been discovered—such as ornaments of gold, bronze, and stone. It would be disgraceful to a country like ours if, in passing a Bill of this kind, they did not take some measures to preserve records of these interesting antiquities.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he could not see any great object in refusing to allow the words to be inserted. He did not attach any tremendous importance to the proposition; but, at the same time, the matter was one of some archæological interest, and he hoped the Committee would allow the Amendment to be carried. There was a strong feeling on the part of some of his archæological Friends that this was one of the most innocent forms of Amendment that could be made to the Bill; and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would accept it, which he might certainly do with the assurance that it could not do any great harm.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he only wished to say one word. His hon. Friend said he had proposed this Amendment in the interests of ancient monuments; but he (Mr. W. E. Forster) really thought that if it were carried it would really be against those interests, because it would create an idea that wherever these monuments existed they need only take photographs or drawings of them, and then the monuments themselves might be destroyed. There was not, however, as he hoped, any general feeling in favour of the demolition of ancient monuments; and with regard to those things that were found in the shape of coins and so forth, they, as his hon. Friend was aware, were paid for by a regular scale, and would not be affected by the Amendment. If the Amendment were carried, there might be those who would say—“We will take drawings of these things and then destroy them as fast as possible.

MR. DAWSON thought it absurd to suggest that the Irish people would destroy all their ancient monuments because photographs or sketches were made of them. He believed that there were a number of very ancient monuments which had been left to the care of the Irish people, and that might still be trusted to that care. The people would not destroy those monuments; and all he asked was that, instead of passing Amendments enabling sketches to be taken of these relics, a provision should be enforced under which, at the present moment, the preservation of ancient monuments in Ireland was carried out.

MR. O'DONNELL said, Her Majesty's Government did not seem to have shown much consideration for ancient monuments in Ireland, for only a short time ago the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster) had despatched a whole battery of artillery against one of the most ancient Irish monuments. He hoped the Committee would be inclined to adopt the Amendment; but, at the same time, they should remember that the progress of the Land Bill was concerned in the matter, and they might as well go to a division on the Amendment, solacing themselves for a certain defeat with the knowledge that it might not be very long before they might be in the presence of a Government having more consideration for Irish national feeling. Nothing more dignified nor more ancient that belonged to the era of a caucus could ever hope to command the consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had been very complimentary to his (Mr. T. D. Sullivan's) countrymen in the remarks he had just addressed to the Committee. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) liked to hear compliments to his countrymen when he thought they were deserved; but on this point he knew, as other Irishmen knew, that it was a fact that numbers of ancient monuments were being dilapidated and had been deteriorated within their time, and probably would continue to be dilapidated, unless attention were called to them and something done to insure their preservation. In most civilized countries some care was taken for the preservation of relics of this kind; and what was now proposed was that in the dispersion of any of the Irish national monuments, if such a thing should become necessary in the process of reclamation, something should be done, by which, at least, a reliable record of them should be preserved to the country. He should be very sorry to do anything to delay the progress of the Bill, but he did think that this was a fair proposal; and he hoped the Government would say that as the works of reclamation about to be undertaken under the Bill would, to some extent, be destructive of some of the ancient monuments of Ireland, there ought to be some sort of record of those relics preserved for the benefit of the country. He knew of cases that had occurred within his own knowledge in which the remains of ancient abbeys had been dilapidated, and sometimes taken away. The peasantry had removed the stones from these ancient edifices in order to build houses, and in some cases to build pig-styes. They could not shut their eyes to the fact that the remains of these ancient buildings had been torn down by the peasantry. It was perfectly true that there were in Ireland many of these objects with which a superstitious feeling was connected. If it were a national feeling, so much the better; but, as he had already said, there were numerous cases in which great harm had been done, and was still being done, and would continue to be done—harm which this Bill would accelerate unless some provision were made such as was suggested by this Amendment. He did not wish to occupy the time of the Committee unnecessarily, nor did he wish to involve the Prime Minister in any great or elaborate scheme for the preservation of ancient monuments; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give his mind—and he had a great mind—to this matter, feeling assured that if he were to do so he could easily devise a sentence or two by which, in a very few words, he might carry out the spirit of the proposal expressed in the Amendment then before the Committee.

MR. HEALY said, the chief ancient monument they would require to take care of in Ireland under this Bill would be the one set up to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant on his departure from the control of Irish affairs.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK said, his Amendment by no means meant to convey any imputation on the Irish peasantry; on the contrary, it was a well-known fact that the ancient monuments of the country had been cherished and preserved by the Irish people. If he had the smallest encouragement from the Treasury Bench in supposing that before the intended works of reclamation took place some means should be guaranteed by the Government by which a durable record of the monuments that would be destroyed should be secured he would ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Committee ought to be aware that there was a Department of the Board of Works which was specially charged with the duty of looking after the ancient monuments of Ireland; so that if the Amendment were withdrawn, it did not follow that proper care would not be taken of those monuments. The Board of Works would have the superintendence of the improvements that were to be undertaken with the public money to be advanced by that Department, and if that Department discharged its duties, all that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cochran-Patrick) asked for by his Amendment would be done.

MR. LEAMY said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had told the Committee that the Board of Works were already charged with the duty of looking after the ancient monuments of Ireland. He (Mr. Leamy) was informed that the Board of Works had whitewashed Cormick's chapel.

MR. GLADSTONE: I may say that I have myself examined the church of Glendalough, which is under the care of the Board of Works; and it is not only my own opinion, but that of everyone who has had the opportunity of going there, that there never was anything more admirably done, with more careful skill and unremitting diligence, than the reclamation of those monuments.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the authority of the Prime Minister might be high authority; but a far higher and more trustworthy authority had been referred to, and according to that authority it was undoubtedly the fact that objects of archaeological interest had been destroyed in Ireland during a comparatively brief period. Did this, he asked, accord with the high character the Prime Minister had given of the Board of Works?

MR. T. COLLINS said, the only authority the Board of Works in Ireland possessed with regard to these ancient monuments was that which was intrusted to them under the Irish Church Act; they had no control over the monuments in general.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he did not impugn in the least degree the care the Board of Works had exercised in respect to architectural monuments. He believed that their care and attention in respect to those monuments that were under their supervision had been complete; but with respect to the agricultural improvements that would take place under the Bill, it might be that some of the ancient relics such as mounds and burrows would have to be removed, and it was only a reasonable proposition that someone should have charge of those monuments, who should see that before they were removed some record of them should be taken for preservation.

Question put.

MR. LITTON rose to move an Amendment standing in his name.

MR. BIGGAR asked what had been done with the Amendments that stood before that of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Litton)?

THE CHAIRMAN: All the Amendments, except those which I called, were on matters previously decided, and could not be put; and as to those that were called, hon. Members in whose names they were put down did not answer until I came to that of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Litton).

MR. BIGGAR said, perhaps as he had not heard his Amendment called, the Chairman would allow him to move it, as it took precedence of that of the hon. and learned Gentleman. His Amendment was, in page 17, line 26, to leave out all the words from the word "with" to "guaranteed" in line 28, inclusive. The Government had shown that they were exceedingly careful, and very properly so, with regard to money which was guaranteed by the Public Treasury; but they did not seem to exercise the same care with regard to other parties, and were willing to empower the advance of money to be expended on certain improvements properly in cases where a guarantee from a barony was given. But he held that the guarantee of a barony could not come into operation for the improvement of private property and for the benefit of private individuals. These baronial guarantees would be simply guarantees on behalf of some half-dozen of perfectly irresponsible private parties. It was an absurd proposition that private persons should be guaranteed in this sort of way. It was all very well for a person to put his name to a carefully-prepared document and become responsible for another, but that some half-dozen people should mortgage the property of all the rest living in their own barony simply for their own benefit was, as it seemed to him, a proposition that could not be defended.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 26, leave out from "with," to "guaranteed," in line 28, inclusive.—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. TOTTENHAM thought that one expression he had heard fall from the Prime Minister was peculiarly applicable to this Amendment—namely, that anything introduced into the Bill ought to be in accordance with the provisions of the scheme it embodied. He (Mr. Tottenham) maintained that the words proposed by the Amendment to be left out were entirely superfluous for the purposes of the Bill. It seemed to him that the clause as it stood was an extension of the principle which had always been held in great disfavour by Parliament, and one which, in the year 1874, a Standing Order of the House was specially framed and passed for the purpose of checking. That Standing Order was No. 67, and, without reading the whole of it, he would inform the Committee that it provided—

"That if a copy of the Bill should be approved by a majority of the members of the Grand Jury, Presentment Sessions, and the Board of Guardians respectively, it should be deposited at the Private Bill Office."

That Standing Order was specially framed to prevent any measure being slipped or passed through without the knowledge and assent and against the opinion of the ratepayers of the county, who, it was intended, should have every opportunity of thoroughly sifting and discussing it. That provision was specially passed for the purpose of insuring that this should be the case. If it were necessary to restrict the mode in which these things were done for public purposes, how much more was it necessary to do so when it was proposed, as by the present clause, to give powers which solely and entirely related to what generally would be regarded as private purposes? The Relief of Distress Amendment Act of 1880 swept away all these safeguards that were enacted by the Standing Order of 1874; and by Section 14 of that Act it was provided that the Lord Lieutenant might from time to time, if in the exercise of his powers he might deem it necessary, convene extraordinary sessions for any barony, and might, by instructions to the justices, authorize them, by presentment, to charge the barony with a guarantee for the repayment of any sum advanced under the provisions of the Act. This power was, under the Act referred to, given to the Presentment Sessions alone, and that Act swept away the provisions of the Standing Order of 1874. The Presentment Sessions, by their own Act, were enabled to charge the barony with the sum applied for without notice or advertisement, or without any appeal from their decision. This was, however, for public purposes, and merely referred to the Standing Order of 1874, as to applications for railway purposes; but it was now proposed, under the present Bill, to apply this power for the purpose of reclamation of land for agricultural purposes, which in no sense of the term could be called public purposes, but were essentially purposes of a private nature intended for the profit and emolument of private individuals, whether the land belonged to a single individual or to a Company, for which there was provision in the Act. In the case of drainage, the improvements effected might possibly accommodate and benefit a certain number of occupiers within the area of what was called the catchment basin that was proposed to be drained; but beyond and outside this the ratepayers had no interest in the expenditure. It could not advantage the general public, and he could see no justification for legislation which proposed to put it in the power of any individual to make application, after a fortnight's notice, for an advance of public money for the purpose of making improvements that would have the effect of enhancing the value of his own property at the expense of the ratepayers, who would receive no benefit whatever. He was altogether in favour of guarantees having for their object matters of public utility, such as the construction of railways, canals, and so forth, from which an indirect benefit could be derived by the general public; but he could not see any sound policy, and he could not understand the justice of a proposal which contemplated the throwing on ratepayers of a charge in return for which they would not and could not, as in the present instance, receive any benefit whatever. Therefore, although he was, unfortunately, not in the House when his name had been called by the Chairman, or he would have moved the Amendment he had on the Paper, he would give his support to the Amendment before the Committee.

MAJOR NOLAN was sorry to find that railways were not included in the proposal; and though he saw that the clause was framed in such a manner that hon. Members might take exception to it, he nevertheless thought it would be a great advantage to have some local body empowered to give a guarantee; and, even if the baronial sessions were deemed in some respects objectionable, he thought they would be found to be on the side of economy.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA hoped the Government would be disposed to accept the Amendment.

MR. PARNELL said, he was very sorry the Government had mixed up the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act of 1880 with the present Land Bill. The Relief of Distress Act, which conferred for the first time on the Lord Lieutenant and an Extraordinary Presentment Sessions the power now proposed to be given to the baronies, was passed for the purpose of meeting an exceptional emergency; and it was certainly found that, as far as the emergency went, that provision had proved an entire failure. But still it was passed to meet an emergency, and the Amendment Act of 1880, which had been spoken of by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) was also passed, to a certain extent, to meet an emergency. The extension of the provisions of the Relief of Disress Act by the Act of 1880, was only an experiment, and it was carried on as an experiment; but its operation was chiefly confined to works of a public character. It was, in fact, confined to Railway Companies, Harbour Boards, and so forth; and the suggestion made in this clause—namely, that baronial guarantees should be given at Extraordinary Presentment Sessions, hastily convened by the Lord Lieutenant under the exceptional provisions of the Relief of Distress Act of last year, for the purpose of levying heavy charges on the ratepayers of the Irish counties, was quite a new departure. He did not mean to say that no Irish county should be allowed to charge its securities for public purposes on the ratepayers or county cesspayers; but he thought that before they gave the additional facilities now proposed to authorities who were only nominated and not elected, and therefore not representative, they ought to pause and reflect on what they would thus be doing. As far as he could see, the only temptation a public Company could have to go over to Ireland and embark in these projected schemes for the reclamation of waste lands would be that which was afforded by the proposed baronial guarantee, with the knowledge that it would be possible for that Company, if the undertaking proved a failure, to charge on the defenceless ratepayers of the county the loss that might have been sustained. He certainly hoped the Prime Minister would hesitate before accepting the principle contained in the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act—a principle opposed to all modern ideas of taxation with representation and so forth, and which, if adopted, would undoubtedly lead to a great deal of jobbery. There was in the clause as it stood no guarantee that the property of the ratepayers would be respected in the slightest degree. It had been well pointed out by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Leitrim that all the old checks which Parliament had by its Standing Orders deliberately placed on these sort of guarantees—namely, the necessary consent of the Boards of Guardians and Grand Jurors, were at one stroke swept away by the Act of 1880 for the Amendment of the Relief of Distress Act, so that there remained nothing between the taxpayers and any amount of jobbery that might take place under this clause. With regard to what had been said by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Galway (Major Nolan), he knew that this was a question about which they had an old dispute; but he would remind the hon. and gallant Gentleman that when Parliament was passing the amended Act, it had carefully scheduled the Railway Companies, while they were now asked to open an unlimited field for jobbery without scheduling any Companies whatever. And he would also remind the Committee that the guarantees were to be confined to the next four years, and would, in all probability, be granted before the County Government Bill, which he hoped the Government would bring forward at some time or other, was likely to be passed.

MR. GLADSTONE: This is one of those cases in which we have to lament the absence of really representative Local Government Boards. Perhaps, at the time this Bill was framed, we may have cherished the hope that it might have been in our power to propose a scheme of that kind with a prospect of carrying it in the present year. Any hope of that kind, however, has now vanished into thin air; and, therefore, I am bound to say that this provision of the Bill is no longer defensible. Consequently, I will accede to the Amendment.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER wished to express his great regret that the Prime Minister had accepted this Amendment. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) pointed out that the Bill scheduled certain districts in reference to railway purposes, and in conjunction with baronial guarantees. During the discussion of the Bill he had been constantly receiving letters from his constituents in the County of Mayo, asking him to get as many railways as possible scheduled. He might mention one name that was well known to many hon. Members—Dr. McCormick, the Bishop of Achonry. That right rev. Prelate was in the House that night listening to the present discussion, and he had not changed one iota of the opinion he had originally formed, that it would have been better for Ireland if a larger number of railways had been scheduled and had been in a position to enter upon works of construction. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would be in a position next year to bring in a Bill to empower County Boards to spend money for these purposes; and he would also ask why they should hesitate to lend money to bodies which were not wholly representative? He was in favour of encouraging everybody in Ireland to do all that was possible in favour of developing the resources of the country; and the localities should have facilities for applying to Parliament, from time to time, for aid in doing that which they were willing to do for themselves if they only had statutory powers. He warned the Prime Minister that if he made concessions of this kind he would be entailing on himself an accumulation of labour hereafter in the direction of some such provision as that which it was proposed to omit from the Bill. The opposition of his hon. Friends to the proposition of the hon. Member for the County of Galway would not be endorsed by the Irish people, and he regretted to see them persist in obstructing the industrial development of Ireland.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he concurred in the views expressed by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power). The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) took the same course last year in objecting to these powers being given to Presentment Sessions, and the result was that some Railway Companies were not scheduled, and several most useful works were left out. He was of opinion that the carrying out of a scheme of arterial drainage would benefit the country generally, and he might remind the Committee that the baronial sessions never erred on the score of extravagance. It had always been a most parsimonious body, and anyone who took the trouble to investigate their transactions during the last few years would find that the last thing they could be fairly accused of was extravagance. He, therefore, very much regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should have given way to the opposition of hon. Gentlemen who professed exclusively to represent Irish interests. The proposal was one which was calculated to benefit Ireland generally, and he was very much surprised at the course which had been taken.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, the hon. and gallant Member who had just spoken on behalf of the County of Cork

Mr. O'Connor Power

(Colonel Colthurst) assailed the position which had been taken in this discussion by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). He thought nothing could be more unfair. He (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) had himself spoken before the hon. Member for the City of Cork took part in the debate; and he was perfectly convinced that all the observations which had since been made as to the importance of retaining these words were mere "bunkum." Nobody would suffer by the omission of the words, and he was in favour of their omission, because he believed that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who had taken such pains in regard to the Bill, could not retain words so ineffective and so utterly unwarranted.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he was very reluctant to detain the Committee; but he thought the observations of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down required one word of comment. So far from the resolutions of the baronies being looked upon with indifference or as a dead letter, only a few days ago he had received a letter from his constituents asking him to leave his duties in Parliament in order to take part on the Grand Jury at Castlebar, the capital of his county, in supporting a proposal of this kind. He appealed to the hon. Member for Youghal (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) whether that was not a sufficient justification for the protest he had made.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. LITTON moved, in line 26, after the word "section," to insert—

"Provided that such advance to any company shall be made subject to such conditions as the Board of Works shall impose for the sale or letting of the reclaimed, improved, or drained lands, so as to promote the creation of occupying proprietors."

He had made one or two alterations in the Amendment as it appeared on the Paper. He had left out the words "upon the Commissioners" after the word "impose," and he had substituted "Board of Works" for "Land Commission," and "occupying proprietors" for "yeoman proprietors."

Amendment proposed,

In page 17, line 26, after the word "section," insert "provided that such advance to any company shall be made subject to such conditions as the Board of Works shall impose for the sale or letting of the reclaimed, improved, or drained lands, so as to promote the creation of occupying proprietors."—(Mr. Litton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GLADSTONE: I must point out to my hon. and learned Friend the position in which the matter stands. It is not as if we were in circumstances where we had a great rush of Companies wanting to occupy the ground for the purpose of reclaiming land in Ireland, so that, with full knowledge on our part, we could impose conditions on them. The great doubt in my mind is whether the Companies will be forthcoming. We hope they will; but it makes it no slight matter to interpose any obstacle in their way. Can we expect that any Company will undertake any portion of this work subject to the absolute discretion of the Land Commission as to the mode in which it is to deal with the land in the reclamation of which it has invested its capital. The insertion of this provision would, I think, render it hopeless to get Companies to undertake the work, nor do I think the Proviso at all necessary. If the Companies come, and if they reclaim the land and provide a new field for capital and industry in the work of agriculture, they would do an immense amount of good in whatever way they let or sell the land. Another reason which induces me to believe that it is unnecessary is that I think Companies of this kind are essentially commercial undertakings quite unlike the case of the Companies in the North of Ireland, which have no commercial elements. If they come into existence they will come into existence with commercial aims, and it would be their desire to convert their capital into improved land in order that they may turn it over in fresh enterprise.

MR. LITTON said, that, under the circumstances, he would not persist in the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. TOTTENHAM, Amendment made, in page 18, by omitting sub-section 4.

MR. D. GRANT moved, at the end of the clause, to insert—

"That it shall be within the powers of the Land Commission to purchase, for the purposes of reclamation, such estates as may seem to them suited for the purpose, such lands to be reclaimed by the officers and agents of the Land Commission, and, when reclaimed, to be re-let with power of purchase by the tenant."

There seemed to be a fear on the part of the Prime Minister that the Companies would not be forthcoming.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member proposes in the Amendment that "such lands are to be reclaimed by the officers and agents of the Land Commission," and when reclaimed to be re-let. That proposal is irregular, as it would involve the expenditure of money.

MR. D. GRANT said, he had consulted the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Ways and Means before he moved the Amendment, and understood that it would be in Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member certainly showed me his Amendment, and asked me if the words giving power to the Land Commission to purchase were in Order. I did not observe at the time that it was to be a compulsory power.

MR. D. GRANT said, he did not propose that the power should be a compulsory one.

THE CHAIRMAN: The point is not that it is a compulsory power, but it gives power to the Land Commission to spend money.

MR. D. GRANT asked if he was to understand that the Amendment was irregular?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; I cannot put it.

DR. LYONS moved, in page 18, at the end of the clause, to add—

"(5.) The Land Commission may from time to time purchase such waste, semi-waste, or uncultivated lands, as to them shall seem fit, apportion them in such lots as they deem suitable, and may let or sell such lots to persons of approved character, and competency, and may advance to such tenants or purchasers such sums per acre as may in the opinion of the said Commissioners be adequate and proper, either in bulk sum or by annual instalments for the due reclamation of such waste lands. All sums so advanced to be secured upon the lands in such manner as the Commissioners shall determine, and to be made repayable, as hereafter set forth in regard to other advances under this Act."

The object of the Amendment was to empower the Commissioners from time to time to purchase such waste lands as they might think fit, and let or sell them on terms to be agreed upon and in conformity with the general provisions of the Act. In placing such a power in the hands of the Land Commission, he had in view a further object—that of enabling the Commission to carry out what he believed would be found, on reference to a subsequent clause, a most important, necessary, and desirable provision—namely, to enable them to offer allotments to such persons as they might induce to go from over-crowded localities in which there was a congested population. It had been stated that the Bill as yet contained no provision for dealing with the localities in which, as was recognized on all hands, there was a congested mass of the population, and this Amendment did provide such a scheme.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I must point out to the hon. Member that he is proposing that the Land Commission shall advance money for the purpose of purchasing reclaimed land. The Board of Works, under various statutes, has that power; but the Land Commission has no such power, and it can only be given through the Board of Works.

DR. LYONS said, he had been about to mention that, in consequence of the alterations in previous clauses, it might possibly be held as an objection to the Amendment that it proposed to give the power to the Land Commission. He would, therefore, after the intimation of the Chair, propose, with the permission of the Committee, to substitute the Board of Works for the Land Commission. So far as he knew, no power that was exactly of this kind existed in the hands of the Board of Works at the present moment; and he desired, through the operation of the Land Commission, instigating the Board of Works, or through the Board of Works itself, to give the power to provide allotments on which persons would be induced to settle from the congested parts of the country. He believed this to be one of the most important, as well as one of the most necessary, operations to be carried out under the Bill, if they desired a real practical amendment in the condition of things in certain localities which need not be specified, but which, on all hands, were admitted to be over-stocked with population. Unless something of an effective kind was done to remove this population, he believed they would only go on, generation after generation, becoming year by year worse and worse. He had two subsequent Amendments on the Paper; but he only alluded to them now for the purpose of illustration and not of discussion. Their object was to enable the Board of Works to purchase out these tenements throughout the country, and by the present clause to provide localities into which the surplus population of the congested districts might be induced to transfer themselves when liberated from localities they now occupied. It might interest the Committee to know that the subject of the waste lands of Ireland had occupied the attention of the Government of this country even from a date prior to the existence, in its present shape at all events, of the House of Commons. The House came into existence in 1265; but so early as June 11, 1250, King Henry III. had issued a mandate to Luke, Archbishop of Dublin, Maurice Fitzgerald, Peter de Birmingham, and others, to impart their counsel, under seals to the King, whether it was more expedient to settle and cultivate hospitari et excolere the King's waste lands in Ireland or to let them to the men of Ireland. It was not easy to ascertain what action was taken on this mandate; but in the following year, July 25, 1251, a mandate was found to have been issued to the Justiciary of Ireland to provide Thurston de Pierrepont with 10 librates of foreign waste lands there which he caused to be inhabited; he to render to the King such service as the Justiciary should think proper. These citations, with others which he (Dr. Lyons) did not think it necessary to trouble the Committee further at present, showed that at even this early date the importance of the subject of the waste lands of Ireland had been fully recognized. In more recent periods inquiry had been repeatedly directed to the matter. The two Amendments which stood in his name upon the Paper, in reference to a subsequent clause of the Bill, provided that tenants of small holdings under 10 acres might sell their holdings to the Land Commission or the Board of Works, and authorized advances to be made to assist them in migrating elsewhere. The object of that provision was to enable the Land Commission or the Board of Works to offer to the occupiers in the over-crowded populations inducements to give up their holdings and seek elsewhere in Ireland a position in which they could better maintain themselves. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, at end of clause, add—“(5) The Land Commission may from time to time purchase such waste, semi-waste, or uncultivated lands as to them shall seem fit, apportion them in such lots as they deem suitable, and may let or sell such lots to persons of approved character, and competency, and the Board of Works may advance to such tenants or purchasers such sums per acre as may in the opinion of the said Board of Works be adequate and proper, either in bulk sum or by annual instalments for the due reclamation of such waste lands. All sums so advanced to be secured upon the lands in such manner as the Board of Works shall determine, and to be made repayable, as hereafter set forth in regard to other advances under this Act.”—(Dr. Lyons.)

MR. O'CONNOR POWER hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would give a favourable consideration to the Amendment. He thought enough had been said about the difficulty of inducing Companies to come forward, and the views of the Government themselves were not such as to lead to a sanguine anticipation that very much would be done in that direction. The Committee had been told of various reasons which private Companies might have for not embarking in a work of this kind. They might not have sufficient security, and anyone who had any idea of the prospective agriculture of the country would be aware that it would require considerable inducement to induce men to enter into agriculture at all. The American competition was so keen that unless the conditions were very favourable they were not likely to prosecute the work of agriculture with success. Unless they set themselves face to face with this difficulty, that they would either see Ireland turned into waste, and the labour of the Irish people directed into other channels, or they would see the only agents by whom they could hope to realize the prosperity of any country sent away to build up an empire over the sea. From all the Prime Minister had said, he was sure the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied with the provisions already made for the promotion of agriculture in Ireland; and he therefore trusted that the right hon.

Gentleman would accept the Amendment now proposed by the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons). The objection which he had pointed out to this clause on the second reading of the Bill was an objection founded on the working of the “Bright Clauses” of the Land Bill in combination with the working of the Church Temporalities Commission. The Church Temporalities Commission had succeeded in establishing 6,000 peasant proprietors—and why? Because it was the business of someone to see in that case that negotiations were entered into for the purchase of estates in the interests of the tenants. But the “Bright Clauses” of the Land Act of 1870 had remained a dead letter, because it was nobody's business to undertake similar negotiations; and under the present Bill, as it stood, it would be nobody's business to go out into the waste lands and see that they were brought into a state of cultivation, and that people were induced to go upon them. He thought the most cruel thing the Government could do would be to raise expectations on the part of the people which they were not prepared to fulfil. Therefore, if they proposed that there should be any reclamation of waste lands at all, let them set about it in a business-like fashion, and fix upon some persons with practical skill who should look after the matter. If that could be done in India without involving a heavy expenditure, he saw no reason why it should not be done here, and why they should not adopt the Amendment for the purpose of interesting the people of Ireland in the development of the resources of the country. He was glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was now in his place, because he believed the right hon. Gentleman had said that the effect of the clause would be to provide a practical remedy for the evils of a congested population in Mayo and other parts of the country. Hitherto, from the county of Mayo they had been in the habit of exporting to the work of the English harvest something like 15,000 or 20,000 labourers every year. That was at a time when the agricultural interests were prosperous in England. But what were the facts now? If the agricultural resources of Mayo were properly developed, as they might be under a provision of this nature, they could find profitable employment for every one of the labourers in that county. They had in that county at least 400,000 acres of land that might be profitably cultivated, not according to the system of hired labour in England, but according to the Irish system of cultivation, where the tenant's little boy or girl, on the way home from school, could bring in the cows, and feed the ducks. Upon every reason of State policy he recommended that some provision of this kind should be introduced into the Bill, and he earnestly solicited the favourable consideration of the Prime Minister to it. If there happened to be any technical defect in it, which he confessed he was himself unable to see, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not throw it overboard with a wave of his hand, but that he would look upon it as a matter which, from time to time, had been pressed upon successive Governments, and which was never more worthy of serious attention than at the present moment.

MR. GLADSTONE: It is with concern and even melancholy I observe that the greater the extension we can give to the scope of the Bill the greater become the demands which are made upon us. We have given to-night a large extension to the Bill in a matter which is of advantage to the tenant. In regard to the purchasing part of the Bill, I have thought that we were undertaking an extremely bold operation indeed. I certainly think we are undertaking an extremely bold operation in saying that we will go out into Ireland and, without fixing any positive limit to the operation, buy land for the purpose of re-selling it to the tenants if the tenants are willing to take it. There are, however, limits to the embarrassments of proprietorship in which it is undesirable that we should involve ourselves, and the extent of the operations we propose to undertake are limited by the Bill. What has taken place to-night? Hon. Members who have spoken seem to think there are very little hopes, or none at all, that Companies will undertake the reclamation of waste land. [Mr. O'CONNOR POWER: I did not say that.] But the hon. Member appeared to think that therein lay the strongest argument in support of the proposal that the reclamation should be undertaken by the Government—that is to say, that the Government should undertake an industrial operation which ought to depend on the profits it will realize, and in respect of which the opinion entertained is so unfavourable that, practically, there is only the slenderest hope that the expectation of profit will induce private persons to come and do it, although private persons would carry the work into effect with the utmost economy, and, therefore, with the largest possible profit. Hon. Members think, therefore, that this is an occasion to say it is right that that which private persons will not undertake shall be undertaken by the Government, whose operations in such a matter never can be economical. I am very sure that the provision which it is proposed to add to the Bill would be an enormous extension of the scope of the measure, and an extension which, if we were to adopt it, would render it extremely difficult to put a limit to the operation. A case of the purchase of estates is a natural operation, in the willingness and ability of the tenants to become proprietors; but in this case, as long as there were any waste lands existing in Ireland, a resistless pressure would be brought to bear upon the Land Commission, and it would be almost impossible for the Commission to know why they should purchase in one district and why not in another. On the one hand, it would be an indefinite operation, or, on the other, there would be incessant discontent and murmuring. Is it, then, really a rational undertaking on the part of a Government to invest the proceeds of the taxes of the people in an endeavour to reclaim waste lands? Are we justified in taking action for such a purpose? You have just cast out of the Bill a provision which, in the mildest form, offered a voluntary opening for the voluntary action of the local authorities of Ireland. The great majority of the House was opposed to that provision; and having, in that way, recognized the incapacity of local bodies, with full knowledge of the facts, to deal with the question of reclamation, you now say that the taxes of the people levied by the Government are to be expended through the Land Commission in assuming these functions. What is to be done? The Land Commission is to buy these districts of waste land; and, having bought them, is to find people to settle upon them. Where is it to find them? Is it to send out agents? It is admitted that they are not to be found on the spot. The hon. Member for Mayo says they are not to be found in Mayo for the waste lands there.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: I said exactly the contrary.

MR. GLADSTONE: I understood the hon. Member to say there are none to be found in the local market.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Plenty.

MR. GLADSTONE: I gathered that they were to be brought upon the land; but that they were not already upon the land, and had no interests there. But they are to be made acquainted with what is going on; and the land is to be mapped out for them. And then, having no interest in the land, because a tenant's interest in a waste is worthless, the Board of Works is to make them such advances as they think proper for the reclamation of these waste lands. Having undertaken a rash and unprecedented purchase, you are to give effect to such purchase by making advances upon a basis of nullity, because nullity is the basis which would be afforded to you by the tenant's interest in waste land, because they will have acquired no interest, and nothing ostensible that they can carry into the market; and yet you require that the public is to provide for them the means of reclaiming the land. Is that a fair and a legitimate use for us to make of the resources placed at our disposal as stewards of the funds we extract from the labour of the people of this country? I think not. I cannot see my way to embark in these functions. I know not what the view of the Committee may be; but I feel deeply the responsibility we have already undertaken. I cannot use too strong language in the statement of those responsibilities. It has required motives of the utmost urgency to induce me to touch with my little finger such subjects. We have gone great lengths; but this further advance is an enormous stride, far outside anything we have hitherto contemplated; and I confess that I have not the resolution to attempt it.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he fully admitted that this was an important substitute for that which he believed to be the right way of dealing with the subject. But, on making a few remarks upon what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman this question—Were there no such things as public works in India? What was the reason that the State was induced to undertake public works in India? They undertook public works in India because there existed a starving population, and there was nobody else to do the work. That was precisely why he had always advocated the undertaking in a reasonable manner of public works of reclamation in the West of Ireland. It did not at all follow that the formidable picture which the right hon. Gentleman drew of the liabilities which would fall on this country was a true picture. No one would suppose for a moment that all the waste land in Ireland could be purchased. All that was proposed was this—that as it was notorious that in one particular part of Ireland there was an immense congestion of the starving population—seeing that vast quantities of unreclaimed land existed that were perfectly capable of being converted into excellent agricultural land, all that was asked was that the Government should purchase some portions of these waste lands, and should undertake the work of reclaiming them, either directly themselves, or by contract with others, or by giving facilities to some portions of that starving population, who would continue to starve, in spite of their Land Bill, if they did not do this. What he had often proposed to the right hon. Gentleman—and he believed that he had very much wearied his right hon. Friend in private—was that he should devote a reasonable sum of money to the improvement of the condition of Conemara. He believed a considerably less sum than £200,000 would do all that was necessary in the way of purchasing land; and such land, when purchased, could be reclaimed by the State in the way in which he had personally been able to reclaim a small tract, both with profit and advantage. When the land was reclaimed by the labour of the starving population, it could be let out to them in suitable farms of 20, 30, or 40 acres, at a rent which should represent, not merely the capital sum, but also the interest of the money expended in reclamation. He could show by document, which nobody had ever attempted to confute, that the land could be let at 10s. an acre, and that in the course of a very short time it would be worth 20s.

an acre; so that the people placed upon it would not only be able to pay their rent, but repay, by the simple operation of a sinking fund, the advances which had been made them. He heard an hon. Gentleman behind him ask what the Government had to do with it. He would tell the hon. Gentleman what the Government had to do with it. At this moment, in consequence of the condition to which Ireland had been reduced, they had one-half of their entire Army in that country, and they were unable to enter into any European combination because they had to intimidate a starving population. There would be no difficulty in entering into small public works in the West of Ireland, which would give employment to the starving population, and which, when properly carried on, might easily provide a sure source of livelihood for the people, and prove a gain to this country. The Government would be able to withdraw their Coercion Acts and their soldiers and enormous army of police; and he told the House solemnly that the cause of discontent in Ireland was misery and starvation. The people would not put up with the diet they could gather on the seashore, and with habitations in which Members of that House would not keep their hounds. These things had been demonstrated over and over again, and evidence of the most extraordinary character came from every quarter. It had been shown by every newspaper correspondent, and every philanthropist who had visited Ireland during the last crisis, and by abundant evidence before the two Land Commissions; and although he felt grateful to the Prime Minister for what he had done for the rest of Ireland, he was convinced that unless the Government dealt with the West of Ireland the Land Bill would not be worth the paper it was printed on.

MR. FAY thought a great deal of time had been lost by turning on side issues, and the question now being discussed was a side issue. It would be a far better subject for a Bill on its own account; but a great many subjects had been introduced which merely added obligations and difficulties without advancing the Bill in its proper onward course. He thought the Irish Members should be ashamed of much that had been said that evening, especially the vulgar abuse of the Chief Secretary; and, as an Irishman, he protested against it, for he had that day felt more shame than he ever experienced before. The Amendment, he thought, was entirely outside the scope of the broad principles of the Land Bill, and his recollection of Professor Baldwin's suggestion was not in that direction at all. That suggestion was that if any advances were made for reclamation, they should be made for the employment of imported farmers or labourers, who should receive Government wages, bring the land into reclamation, and ultimately be allowed to purchase the farms. Such a suggestion could be carried out more ably by a Company than by a private body, and he believed that Companies would spring up under the influence of the Bill. Land Banks would, he expected, spring up in all directions; but the present Amendment would render the Bill a Parliamentary abortion, and he should, therefore, support the Government.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR observed, that the Prime Minister appeared to have two minds as well as two Offices. As Prime Minister he was desirous of being generous; as Chancellor of the Exchequer he put a tight grasp on the money bags. The right hon. Gentleman reminded him of the Chancellor in "The Merchant of Venice," who said first—"Oh, my daughter!" and then "Oh, my ducats!" That was just the Prime Minister's attitude with regard to the Irish Land Bill. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of this suggestion as being of a model character; but the few Irish Members who took part in the long and dreary discussion on the second reading of the Bill urged the necessity of making some such provision. In that discussion he had said that the scheme, with regard to reclamation, had the vital defect of making no such provision. What was the meaning that underlay the action of the Government on this question? The right hon. Gentleman did not avow what the real meaning was; but he (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) would explain it. The Government did not want migration, but emigration, and they would not have the slightest objection to advancing money to drive the people to Canada or other parts of the British Empire. Migration was only to act as the step-sister of emigration, and the Government only wanted to get rid of what they considered disturbance in Ireland by sending the disturbers out of the country. The Irish Members, however, wanted to keep their people at home, to improve their land and not the land of Manitoba, New South Wales, and other countries. There was plenty of land to be found, although the Prime Minister had said it would be necessary to make a voyage of discovery to find it. There were many acres of land in Mayo which were a monument of disgrace to British rule. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Fay) objected to the Amendment; but if that hon. Member had been present during the consideration of the 1st clause of the Bill, he would have known that "a person of good character" was one of the provisos which the ingenious mind of the draftsman had introduced into that clause. What security did the Chancellor of the Exchequer ask for the money that was to be advanced? Did anybody suppose that 28 acres of land or 40 acres of land, if they were given to the agricultural labourer, who was willing to come from Ireland to England or Scotland to get the means of paying his rent, would not in two years' time be put into a condition which would be ample security for the small advance? If the Prime Minister had read the evidence of Professor Baldwin, he would have seen several cases in which land had been given at no rent, or at a nominal rent, to agricultural labourers, and which in the course of a few years had been made fertile and fruitful, and the tenants had in the end been willing to pay as much as 10s. and 15s. an acre rent. He perfectly understood why the Government would not accept the Amendment. They wanted to get rid of the people of Ireland, and to exile the population of Mayo and other portions of Ireland which they considered were disturbed; but he would advise the hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) to proceed further in this matter until he got a satisfactory answer from the Government. Upon this question the whole of the Irish Members were united, and they would help the hon. Member with such persistence and firm adherence to the Amendment as might seem well to them.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he thought the scheme which the hon. Member for the County of Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had brought under notice was a very practical one, and would, no doubt, work out well. But the hon. Gentleman spoke with great authority on such a subject, and what he had said was well worthy of consideration. That was not the scheme which the Committee were discussing on the Motion of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin. The proposal before the Committee simply was that the Government should become land-jobbers for uncultivated or waste lands. They were not to cultivate the land; but they were to buy it, and then let it to anybody who could be got to take it. That, he thought, was a very hopeless way of dealing with a great question; and upon that ground, while he should be quite prepared to give every consideration to the scheme of the hon. Member for Galway, he could not support the Amendment.

MR. DAWSON said, that, according to the Report of the Devon Commission, there were at present 326,000 occupiers of land whose holdings varied from seven to one acre, and which were quite inadequate for supporting a family. It was computed that by a consolidation of all holdings up to eight acres 500,000 labourers, equivalent to 2,500,000 of population, could be provided for, and, by the reclamation of waste lands, £20,000,000 would be added to the value of the products of the country. When they were talking about periodical panics, was it not right that they should be struck by a proposal which would not only remove the lamentable state of things in Ireland, but add to the wealth of the nation? A great deal had been heard from the Prime Minister about the English taxpayer; but Ireland did not want English gold; they wanted to nerve and strengthen the right arm of the Irish labourer with a sense of security, so that he should not be beholden to England. He was sure the Prime Minister, whose objects and whose intentions in the Bill were manifest, would not lose this golden opportunity of settling this vexed question; and he asked him to allow the Irish labourers to get the little modicum of capital necessary to work the land. It would be ample security to pay the State and to pay for the men's families.

MR. PARNELL said, the question of removing the congested population was one of the six most important points in connection with the whole Bill. The suggestion made by the noble Lord upon the Front Opposition Bench was an important one; and if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) could be modified in such a way as to earn the support of the noble Lord, he was sure his hon. Friend would be willing to modify it in that direction, provided the objects of his own Amendment were not sacrificed. But the discussion had commenced at a late hour, and a great deal might be said in favour of the proposal more than had been yet said; and, as the question was deserving of the greatest consideration from the Government, and was one in reference to which they might come to some compromise in the direction indicated by the hon. Member for Galway and by the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), he hoped the Government would allow the question to be further considered to-morrow, especially as there were several Amendments, including one by himself, which, of course, would be put out of the way by a hasty disposal of the Amendment at present before the Committee. The postponement of the matter until to-morrow might enable the Government to agree to some compromise; and he, therefore, would move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Parnell.)

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press his Motion, for this was the 24th day of this Bill, and the whole business had been postponed to enable Irish measures to pass. This clause was begun on Friday, and now the hon. Gentleman said he would not allow the Bill to proceed.

MR. DALY said, that he was as anxious as the Prime Minister that the Bill should pass; but if the House legislated for a country, let them not in any foolish haste hurry over a matter of such importance as this. It would be impossible to give a satisfactory decision upon this clause without a debate of three or four hours; and was it fair to ask the Committee to enter upon such a debate after 1 o'clock in the morning? An opportunity for reflection would be of great advantage, for the Government might see their way to agreeing, in some measure, to the proposal of the noble Lord (Lord John Manners). He believed that if the Prime Minister and his Colleagues would give a couple of hours' serious thought to the question of how they could advance the views of the hon. Member for Dublin without prejudice to the taxpayers they would be able to make some concession. The Government were prepared to spend money in promoting the emigration of Irish people to British Colonies; but every man, woman, and child deported from Ireland represented a customer less for England's manufacturers. If they used the money of the British taxpayers as proposed by the Amendment, they would recoup themselves by keeping their customers in Ireland at home. From another point of view, it would be better to adopt the proposal, for it would pay better to get rid of the soldiery and police in Ireland; to imprint on the Irish people the impression that they were treated as the English people were; and if Irishmen were allowed to settle on these holdings, they would become the most law-abiding people to be found in any country. Not more than a few hours' debate would be required further, and he appealed to the Prime Minister to agree to the postponement suggested.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Before we decide, I think it would be very convenient for the Committee to know what the intentions of the Government are with regard to the other clause which forms part of the Bill. This part of the Bill has reference to reclamation of land and emigration, and there can be no doubt that there is a very great connection between those two clauses. A rumour has spread—I am not able to say whether it is well founded or not—that it is not intended to proceed with Clause 26; and I should like to know what the intentions of the Government are.

MR. PARNELL wished to suggest that the Emigration Clause should be postponed till the end of the Bill. The question of emigration would tend to very considerable discussion; but that would be very much facilitated by the result of the deliberations of the Committee on the questions of arrears and labourers, for, of course, the principal arrears were those of small tenants, who would be the most likely to take advantage of the Emigration Clause.

Mr. Parnell

MR. ONSLOW said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider his decision as to reporting Progress. The subject upon which they were engaged was one in which all the Irish Members took much interest, and it could not be disposed of that night.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had not hitherto interposed in the discussion, and had every desire to facilitate the progress of the Bill; but he now rose for the purpose of requesting the Prime Minister to consider not only the postponing of this Emigration Clause, but the advisability of letting it fall out of the Bill altogether. He strongly advised the right hon. Gentleman to the latter course. He was perfectly certain that its discussion would occupy a very long time indeed, and, if passed at all, it would be a most unsatisfactory clause in the Bill, and be the promotion of no service to the Irish people whatever. If there was one part of the Bill that ought to be thrown out, it was this Emigration Clause.

MR. CHAPLIN hoped the Prime Minister would not think of following the advice just given; and, with all respect, he thought it was not in the power of the right hon. Gentleman to do so. When this discussion first commenced in Committee, he (Mr. Chaplin) moved that the first part of the Bill should be postponed, that the Committee might consider at once the most important part of the Bill contained in the remedial clauses. The right hon. Gentleman refused to accede to that, and he gave the Committee most distinctly to understand that the Government regarded the Bill as a whole, and drew no distinction between the parts, as being of more or less importance.

MR. GLADSTONE said, with regard to the Motion for reporting Progress, he would not press resistance to the Motion, seeing where the hands of the clock had reached (5 minutes past 1). With respect to what had just fallen from the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), he did not think he had quite accurately described the statement made in the earlier stage of the Committee. Most undoubtedly he stated that, in comparing that portion of the Bill which related to landlord and tenant with that which related to the purchase and sale of estates, that these were portions in which the Government drew no distinction, in point of importance, that they regarded the Bill as a whole, and intended to pass it as a whole. He spoke of the main leading portions of it. He did not see the very great connection between the questions of reclamation of land and emigration, and never thought of placing either of these last in the same rank as those parts of the Bill relating to landlord and tenant and the purchase of estates, though they were important parts of the Bill, and proposals he believed highly beneficial, and he hoped the Government had not shown any disposition towards persistent opposition to Amendments proposed, nor, on the other hand, had shown levity in departing from anything material. With regard to emigration, there had been no change whatever. What rumours might have been circulated within the last few days he did not know; but he stated, with regard to this clause dealing with emigration, in his opening speech, with moderation, undoubtedly with no inflated expectations, that it was the intention of the Government to let this clause come on and to hear the opinion of the Committee; and he said, on this and on the question of reclamation, that, setting aside the obligation the Government must have to keep in mind the interests of the taxpayer that any general view of a majority of the Irish Members would constitute a great element in the Government judgment of the case. That was all he had to say in relation to it; and he could not, therefore, meet the desire of his hon. Friend the Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald). The hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) had stated that he thought the Emigration Clause might, with advantage, be postponed, and the reasons for that he had, no doubt, stated in good faith regarding other important matters to be disposed of. He did not know whether it would be most convenient; but he hoped that if they met the hon. Member on this question they might part with the 25th clause to-night. That, he trusted, he might expect, and that, he thought, was a fair proposal.

MR. PARNELL thought the right hon. Gentleman had rather misinterpreted his intention in moving to report Progress. There were many Irish Members who had not spoken on the question of reclamation, or rather of migration, a subject of very great interest, especially in connection with the Western counties, and there was the wish among these Members to have the opportunity of putting their views before the Committee to-morrow, but not at any great length; and if Progress was reported there was no intention of carrying the discussion to an unreasonable length. Really he did not think such a condition should be attached as would preclude the claims of those who had something to say on the Migration Clause.

MR. R. POWER said, that he had an Amendment to leave out Clause 26, and would now only say that his conduct in future would be greatly guided by the action of the Government in relation to that clause. He thought it would be wiser for the Government, and better for the progress of the Bill, if the Committee went on in the ordinary manner, taking the clauses and Amendments as they stood, and not postponing them. For his own part, if the Government insisted on inserting Clause 26, that would materially alter his position towards the Bill. If the clause were inserted it would do away with any little benefit the Bill might contain. He would very much like to know what was the position of the Government towards the Emigration Clause. If they meant to retain it, it would be the duty of some of the Irish Members to take up a certain position towards the Bill; but if they meant to leave it out he, for one, would be most happy to do anything to support the Government in passing the Bill.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he understood the Prime Minister to accede to the Motion to report Progress, and the moment the right hon. Gentleman made the announcement there was an exodus from all quarters of the House, and a very large number of Members had left under the impression that there was no contention of the point. The Motion was made on strong and intelligible grounds. The Committee were debating a most important point in connection with the clause; but it had only been reached an hour before. The question of administration by the Board of Works had occupied hours, of which nobody complained; but when they reached a more important part of the clause they were told that an hour was enough to dispose of it. Now, that was not sufficient. The feelings of the Irish people of all shades of parties had not yet found a voice, and he trusted that Progress would be now reported, that they might have some opportunity of fully stating their views.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, the Prime Minister had said there was no great connection between the two clauses; but they were connected, and he would say so on these grounds. As he understood it, the great difficulty in Ireland was the earth hunger arising from the inadequacy of the supply to meet the demand. These two clauses dealt with two different sides of this problem—the clause upon which the Committee were engaged was to increase the supply of land by reclamation or otherwise, whilst the clause to follow was one to relieve the demand in certain cases by providing other means for acceptance by those who cannot find a living on the soil. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), who spoke with great knowledge of the subject and practical acquaintance with that part of the county where the difficulty more greatly existed, told the Committee what had been said by Reports of Commissions and otherwise, that in the West of Ireland the population was greater than could be maintained on the soil such as it was, and he recommended reclamation on a large scale, and through Government assistance. On the other hand, others said that it was impossible for the people to live on a soil incapable of supporting them, and they must be emigrated elsewhere. Hon. Members must then take the two clauses together; if they took emigration then they had less difficulty with the other case, and if they provided a sufficient system of reclamation and migration, possibly emigration would be less necessary; but they must deal with the two together. He must say he thought the Government would give the Committee a good deal of cause to complain if they withdrew, or even postponed, unnecessarily, the important clause relating to emigration. He could see no reason for its postponement, except as a preliminary to its withdrawal, and if that was intended the Committee should be made aware of the intention. The clause came in its natural place in connection with the Reclamation Clause, and the Committee had a right to ask that it should be proceeded with in its proper order.

Mr. Parnell

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he agreed that the Emigration Clause and the Migration Clause went together. That the subject had not been discussed was no fault of his, and he had hoped that the Government would take it up, and thought he had good reason for the hope. But what had happened was this—the Chairman ruled his Amendment, which would have brought the subject forward in a prominent manner, out of Order. That judgment he had no right to question, and the matter, therefore, was only raised indirectly. It was, nevertheless, of the utmost magnitude, and it was quite impossible to exaggerate the importance of it. After every famine in Ireland, they had proposals for public works. Sir Robert Peel proposed them, Lord Russell, and so did Lord George Bentinck, as the Committee well knew. But after the proposals there came a good season, a good harvest or two, and the whole subject was dropped, and now things remain in a chaotic state, and we present this disgraceful spectacle to Europe, of a large portion of Her Majesty's Dominions in Ireland on which the people live more shockingly than in any part of Europe. Now the opportunity offered of dealing with this state of things, and the Government were going deliberately to shirk the question. If they did this, what would happen hereafter? In three or four years bad harvests would again come round, and the whole case would come again before Parliament with aggravated force. Let the Government remember that whatever there was of complaint on the part of many tenants, complaints that might seem to them unreasonable, they derived their force from the undoubted misery of the population in the West of Ireland. He only asked the right hon. Gentleman to make an experiment, and let him consider it between now and to-morrow. An advance of £500,000 to the Board of Works, to be expended under the direction of the Treasury, would do an immense amount towards carrying out the views he had advocated. Half a million of money! Why, the Government did not hesitate to give £750,000 to Irish landlords last year, against the remonstrances of the Irish people; and they gave it out of Irish money. In the name of all that was wise, all that was just, let not the Government throw away this grand opportunity of refuting the charge that they would do nothing but get these unfortunate people out of the country by emigration. Emigration and migration were both necessary. He was not an opponent of emigration; but as to accepting it as the sole remedy for the distress he should be ashamed to do so. He trusted that before to-morrow the Prime Minister would consider whether he could not make the experiment suggested. It was a mere question of a small amount of money, it was not necessary to provide a very large scheme; but if the Board of Works advanced money for so many purposes, why in the world should they not, with the authority of the Treasury, do so for this purpose, when the amount asked for was so small in quantity?

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was an unusual practice of which the hon. Gentleman had just given an example, and there had been several during the evening, to give a kind of instruction to the Government, and to desire that, whereas they had evidently paid no attention whatever down to the present to some subject that an hon. Member might think very important, and to subjects, in many cases, of extreme importance, that they would, between the current date and the next, or another day, give their mind to the subject. Such modes of denunciation or instruction were not complimentary, and seemed to assume some dereliction of duty on the part of the Government with regard to some particular portion of a subject. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) said the Government were going to shirk the subject and not touch it; whereas, what the Government wished the House of Commons to say, but hon. Members would not permit it to say, was, that if any person in this great commercial country was willing to prosecute this easy commercial enterprise—as the hon. Member pointed it out—then the State would offer half of the capital required, and not limit it to the £500,000 the hon. Member proposed should be advanced. This was what the hon. Member thought it fair to describe as entirely shirking the subject, and refusing to touch it! This was not an equitable mode of procedure. The hon. Member knew quite well what were the views of former statesmen in former Parliaments, and he knew how greatly in advance of these they were travelling on this occasion, and how they were straining their capacity and responsibility as Representatives of the people at large—he was not surprised that the hon. Member should think the interests of reclamation would be best promoted by his own plan—but he was very sorry that the hon. Member should think it fair and just to describe the efforts the Government were making as shirking the question.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he would accept the rebuke of the Prime Minister with shame and humiliation if he deserved it. But he did not deserve it. The right hon. Gentleman said that Parliament had done this or failed to do that; and what he proposed was to trust to commercial enterprize to do that which all experience had shown commercial enterprize would not and could not do. He had lived in the midst of the district; the right hon. Gentleman had never been there. He knew the sympathy in the House was general and real on this subject. But when the right hon. Gentleman visited Ireland, he saw those portions of Ireland that exhibited the greatest degree of prosperity to be found in the Island; but neither he nor any great statesman, except the Chief Secretary for Ireland, visited the district for which he was speaking. Let the Chief Secretary now open his heart and his mind, and say what he thought, for he must know that unless something more was done than was proposed by the Government the condition of the West of Ireland would remain as it was—a disgrace to this country. He would accept the rebukes of the Prime Minister when he deserved them. His motives were not factious, nor to interrupt the Bill, and certainly not to cast reflection on the right hon. Gentleman; but he spoke with confidence in the interests of Ireland and of this country, and would again say that unless the Government reconsidered the matter this country would rue it.

MR. O'DONNELL hoped the Prime Minister would return to his first decision, and accept the Motion for reporting Progress, without the futility of forcing a division.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow at Two of the clock.

Mr. Gladstone

REGULATION OF THE FORCES BILL.—[BILL 193.]

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Secretary Childers.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he should like to know what was in the Bill. The House had been so hard pressed with other matters that he had not had time to read it.

MR. CHILDERS said, he would be happy to give any explanation that might be wished; but, in point of fact, the Bill, except one clause, was a collection of extremely small Amendments which had accumulated during the last two years. The only clause of importance was the 5th, which related to the Reserves, and which enabled a second Reserve to be formed for four years of men who had completed their 12 years' engagement. The remainder of the Bill would not require much discussion.

MR. ONSLOW said, that the Bill appeared to deal with matters of detail, and it had not been circulated very long.

MR. CHILDERS: More than a week.

MR. ONSLOW said, there was one point on which he wished to ask a question. It was to be found in the Schedule, and was for the removal of doubts in confirming sentences of courts martial in the East Indies. He did not know that this matter had been discussed before. What was the intention in repealing the Act 7 & 8 Vict. for Removing Doubts, &c. of Court Martial Sentences in the East Indies?

MR. CHILDERS said, this was a very small point, and the particular provision in the Schedule would be better explained in Committee. The repealed Acts were for the most part obsolete, including the one referred to by the hon. Member.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT hoped that the next stage would be fixed for a time that would allow of discussion.

MR. CHILDERS said, that would be done.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—[BILL 1.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles W. Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, of course it was quite necessary that at this period of the Session the Bill should be withdrawn; but he would like, if possible, to extract a pledge from the Government that the Bill would not be allowed to drop, but would be brought forward as early as possible next Session. The Bill was intended to remove what was a great scandal on our electoral system, and, so far, would receive a good deal of support; but there were parts of the Bill—he would not enter into them then—which he hoped the Attorney General would carefully consider during the Recess, for they would really constitute traps for the honest candidate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the question should have been put to the Prime Minister; but, so far as he was aware, it was the intention of the Government to introduce the Bill next Session at an early date, with the hope of passing it.

Motion agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

BANKRUPTCY BILL.—[BILL 137.]

(Mr. Chamberlain, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General, Mr. Ashley.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Second Reading be deferred till Monday next."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

MR. GORST hoped that by Monday the Government would make an announcement whether the Bill was to be proceeded with or not. There was scarcely a hope that the Government could pass it this Session; but it would be a great relief to those Members interested to have the Government determination announced.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, not only so, but it would be a relief to the whole commercial world, as was evident from the constant inquiries being made.

Motion agreed to.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS [ADVANCES, REMISSIONS, AND AMENDMENT OF ACTS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise further advances out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom, or out of moneys in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners, held on account of Savings Banks, of any sum or sums of money not exceeding £4,000,000 in the whole, to enable the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and not exceeding £1,000,000 in the whole, to enable the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland to make advances in promotion of Public Works.

(2.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the remission of interest, amounting to £8,454 19s. 2d., due in respect of a Loan made by Public Works Loan Commissioners to the Tralee Harbour and Canal Commission.

(3.) Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the remission of a claim by the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland on certain proprietors in the Monivea Drainage District, in the county of Galway, for the repayment of a sum of £155 expended by the said Commissioners not on works of repair and maintenance, but on new works, and therefore not chargeable on the said proprietors.

(4.) Resolved, That it is expedient to transfer a Loan of £6,000, made by the Public Works Loan Commissioners to the Wicklow Harbour Commissioners, with arrears of interest thereon, from the Public Works Loan Commissioners to the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland, on payment by the last named Commissioners to the first named Commissioners of the amount of the said Loan and arrears; and to authorise the conversion of the Loan and arrears of interest so transferred into a terminable annuity, and also the postponement of such annuity to a new Loan if made by the Commissioners of Public Works.

(5.) Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Public Works Loans Acts, 1875 and 1878, "The Relief of Distress (Ireland) Act, 1880," "The Mulkear Drainage District Act, 1880," and the Act for the promotion and extension of Public Works in Ireland, 1831, and the Acts amending the same.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND) [REMISSION OF LOANS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to remit certain advances made out of the Consolidated Fund, under the Tithe Composition (Ireland) Act and the Tithe Relief (Ireland) Acts, amounting respectively to £227,726 16s. 1d. and to £900,000.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

CUSTOMS (OFFICERS) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. JOHN HOLMS, Bill to provide for the employment of certain Officers and Clerks by the Commissioners of Customs, ordered to be brought in by Mr. JOHN HOLMS and Lord FREDERICK CAVENDISH.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 210.]

House adjourned at a quarter before Two o'clock.

SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE

BILL.—(No. 147.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord Chancellor.)

LORD DENMAN mentioned some facts as to the patronage and salary of the Lord Chief Justice of England, and the pensions of retired Lord Chancellors August 16, 1832.

EARL CAIRNS said, he was anxious to call attention to some clauses in the Bill which appeared to him to be of great importance, with reference to the administration of justice and the judicature of the country. There were many clauses to which he had no objection—they were desirable, and some absolutely necessary. There was the proposal that the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division should become an ex officio member of the Court of Appeal; that was following the precedent of the other Divisions. At the time the Judicature Act passed this could not have been done with the Probate Division, for at that time there was only one Judge. Then the Bill proposed, in regard to the Master of the Rolls, that he should cease to be a Primary Judge of the Chancery Division, and henceforward be a Judge of the Appellate Court; and if the Master of the Rolls was willing to make that alteration in his position, he could only say that he was sorry that the Division was about to lose him as a Primary Judge, for which he had unusual qualifications. At the same time, he was certain that the Master of the Rolls would do equally good service in the Court of Appeal. He quite agreed that if they confined his labours to the Court of Appeal, it was impossible to do otherwise than to secure to him the precedence he had at present, his remuneration in point of salary, and all his rights with regard to patronage. He should like to ask his noble and learned Friend what was to be done with the Chambers and Chamber Clerks of the present Master of the Rolls? Were they to be transferred to Mr. Justice Kay? There were other clauses in the Bill of a miscellaneous description, but he should not dwell on them. He now came to a part of the Bill which, it appeared to him, required the serious consideration of their Lordships. He referred to that part of the Bill which related to the future constitution of the Appellate Court, which had been regarded as the key-stone of the system. There was not one case came before their Lordships for every 20 that was decided finally by the Court of Appeal. It had been their object for several years past to strengthen in every way, and to give solidity to this Court of Appeal. They had tried to do this under various statutes—the Acts of 1873, 1875, 1876, and 1877. All those Acts more or less altered the arrangements from time to time, as experience suggested, with regard to the Court of Appeal. One object they had in view was to give to the Court of Appeal, in the first place, as great dignity as could be given by securing the services of the most eminent men that could be obtained for it. Another object was to insure that the Judges of the Court of Appeal should be, as far as possible, of equal rank and dignity, and possess equal advantages in reference to their judicial office. But would not that object be frustrated by the provisions of the proposed Bill, which would enact that in future any person who might be made Master of the Rolls should never act as a Primary Judge, but should at once become a member of the Court of Appeal, and possess all the advantages hitherto enjoyed by Masters of the Rolls with reference to the questions of precedence, salary, and patronage? By this Bill a person quite inexperienced as a Judge might join the Appellate Court as Master of the Rolls, and ipso facto he would have precedence of tried Judges, like the late Lord Justice Knight Bruce, or Lord Blackburn, or Lord Justices Bramwell and Brett. The result of this arrangement would be that the Appellate Court would lose the respect of the public and the Profession. He might be told that a man could be made Lord Chancellor, and enjoy the precedence attached to that Office without ever having been a Judge before. That was true; but this state of things had never been considered advantageous, and was only accepted because it could not be avoided. If it was desirable that Masters of the Rolls should for the future become members of the Appellate Court and not be Primary Judges, he would raise no objection. What he insisted on was that the opportunity should be taken to do away with the artificial precedence of the Master of the Rolls, who should have in the Appellate Court no more than the precedence derived from the order of his appointment. Why, he asked, should future Masters of the Rolls have a higher salary than that allotted to other members of the Appellate Court? By giving this higher salary to the Master of the Rolls they would create unnecessarily an invidious distinction between one member of the Court and the other members. Then, again, with regard to patronage. The Bill proposed that future Masters of the Rolls should have all the patronage enjoyed by the Master of the Rolls at the present time. There would, therefore, be one Judge sitting in the Court of Appeal whose rights of patronage would be far more extensive than those of the other Judges in the same Court. To that provision he strongly objected. He hoped his noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor would see the advisability of introducing Masters of the Rolls into the Appellate Court with precedence according to the dates of their appointments only, and upon an equal footing with the other members of the Court. He also disapproved the provision according to which three Judges of First Instance would be selected out of the number of Primary Judges once in every year for the purpose of sitting in the Court of Appeal. It was a proposition of a very grave character, and one which would be very injurious to the Court of Appeal. They had now nearly reached the end of the Session, and therefore but little time was left for discussing the measure. The public and the Bar would have no opportunity of understanding its provisions, and the Judges who were now on Circuit would not have time to devote themselves to the study of the Bill, so as to be in a position to express their opinion upon it. He thought the best thing to do would be to relieve the measure of the two provisions to which he had specially drawn attention. He referred to the clause regulating the position of future Masters of the Rolls in the Appellate Court, and to the provision for the annual selection of three Puisne Judges who should sit in the Court of Appeal. These provisions ought to stand over till another Session, when they could be considered by the public at large. They should not rashly mar the work which had been done under the Acts passed during the last eight years. As things were, the Judges were occupied up to the hilt. No doubt arrears were less than they had been; but that was owing to the state of business in the country. Speaking generally, he thought it was impossible that the Primary Judges should have much time to sit in the Court of Appeal. Besides, the time when the Court of Appeal wanted most help was during the Circuits. But that was just the time when not a single Primary Judge could be had. He believed it was a delusion to suppose that any Primary Judges would have leisure to sit in the Court of Appeal. He had another objection, and that was the varying constitution of the Courts which necessarily followed. One day the Court would be constituted of certain Judges, all of whom would be unable to sit together again. And a Primary Judge would say, when a fresh cause was called in the middle of the day—"I have to sit in the Court of Appeal to-morrow, and therefore cannot take this case if it is likely to occupy any length of time." The system proposed, therefore, was a most wasteful one. Another objection he entertained most strongly was that it was assumed that all the Primary Judges were fit to sit in the Court of Appeal. The best men were required for that Court. The proper way of getting the best men was to choose from time to time the most distinguished Primary Judges and promote them to the Court of Appeal. But if all the Primary Judges were to be treated as eligible for the Court of Appeal, the popular respect for that Court would be lowered. What would be the position of the three Judges? They would go at once to the bottom of the list of Appeal Judges. They would lend no additional respect to the Court; on the contrary, a division would be established between one class of Judges of that Court and another. What he said was not mere theory. The plan had been tried and found wanting. In 1875 it was enacted that the Crown might select from the Common Law Judges Judges to sit in the Court of Appeal. The result was that when such selections were made considerable dissatisfaction was expressed in the country. The public thought it was not the kind of Court of Appeal which they had been led to expect. In consequence of that dissatisfaction three additional permanent Judges of the Appeal Court were appointed under the Act of 1876, so as to raise its strength to six Judges. Then, how were these three Judges to be selected under the Bill? Why, in a way in which Judges never were selected before. There was no analogy between the present case and that of the Election Judges. In the latter case there was an obvious reason why the appointment should not be by the Crown. Besides, the Election Judges were chosen to do what was the ordinary work of Judges of First Instance; whereas under the Bill it was a higher class of work to which certain Judges were to be called. How would the Judges select? In all probability by rota. They would naturally decline to do anything so invidious as to choose certain of their body by preference to sit in the Appeal Court.

Earl Cairns

Thus, in turn, from year to year, all the Judges would sit in the Appeal Court without reference to their standing or experience or other special qualification. The Court would thus be furnished without reference to merit. But suppose the election was not by rota—and he observed that his noble and learned Friend had provided for meetings of the Judges and a casting vote. Let their Lordships imagine what it would be to have a contested election of Judges. Was the voting to be by ballot? It might be necessary to apply the provisions of the Ballot Act to the election of Judges of the Court of Appeal. Then, what were called the Common Law Judges might think themselves particularly eligible, and the Chancery Judges might hold a different opinion. Thus, there would be a contest between one side of Westminster Hall and another. He thought, therefore, that the Bill would introduce a great change from which little benefit would accrue, which would lower the character of the Court of Appeal, and the machinery for which could only be put in motion by a mode of selection among themselves of the Primary Judges, which was, in the highest degree, objectionable. He hoped that the noble and learned Lord would reconsider the two provisions to which he had referred, and would postpone dealing with them until another Session. Another point to which he desired to draw attention was this. He was responsible for proposing to Parliament that the Judges of the Court of Appeal should go Circuit, and at the time that proposal was made it was not an injudicious one, because no one could tell what the extent of the duties which those Judges would have to discharge would be. The proposal having been adopted, the Judges of the Court of Appeal had gone Circuit, and they had done so at the greatest possible inconvenience to the public, inasmuch as during Circuit time either one or both of the Divisions of the Court of Appeal were closed. In dealing with this point, their Lordships must remember that Courts in banco had been almost abolished, and that the weight of the ordinary banco business of the Courts fell upon the Court of Appeal. It was impossible that the weight of the objection to there being arrears in the Court of Appeal could be overrated. And, therefore, he thought the subject of the expediency of sending the Judges of the Court of Appeal on Circuit should be reconsidered. Turning to the subject of the salaries of the Judges of that Court, they had been fixed at £5,000 per annum, as against the £6,000 which was paid to the Lords Justices. He had always objected to the salaries of those Judges being placed on so low a scale, as it was remarkable how much greater inducement the additional £1,000 a-year was to men of eminence and learning to accept the post of Judges. Seeing that the Offices of Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and of the Chief Baron of the Exchequer had been abolished, and a considerable saving had thereby been effected, it was not unreasonable that the salaries of the Judges of the Court of Appeal should be increased, and thus that some prizes should still be opened for distinguished members of the Bar. In his opinion, a most beneficial result would accrue from strengthening the Court of Appeal by relieving the Judges of that Court from the obligation of going Circuit and by increasing their salary. He thought that the clause having reference to the Assizes might be misunderstood, and that it might be supposed that the Government was about to take power to group counties together for purposes of all the Assizes in the same way as they did for the purposes of the Winter Assizes. If that were the real meaning of the clause, he thought that it was objectionable, as it would result in considerable inconvenience to the parties and others obliged to attend the Assize Court. He trusted that the noble and learned Lord upon the Woolsack would afford the House some explanation on this point.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR sincerely hoped that none of their Lordships would object to the clause in the Bill relating to Winter Assizes. Until recently there were only two Assizes in the year; but there were now four for criminal purposes, and two (in some places more) for other purposes. While that arrangement undoubtedly accomplished the very desirable object of not keeping prisoners too long awaiting trial, it had been found to interfere seriously with the business of the Courts in London. It was, therefore, proposed to extend the powers now given to the Crown to reduce, as occasion might require, the number of places for holding the Winter Assizes in the months of November, December, and January, to all Assizes, and all times of the year, which would lessen the waste of judicial power for Assize purposes; and, as fewer Judges would be required to go Circuit, there would be less interference with the business of the Courts in London. With regard to the Chambers of the Master of the Rolls, he was not aware that there was any controversy raised as to the Judge to whom those Chambers should be assigned. It might, or it might not, be found convenient that the junior Judge should take them; but that question must be decided with a view to the convenience of business only, when it became a practical one. With regard to the criticisms of his noble and learned Friend on the proposal as to future Masters of the Rolls, he thought that they really were such as when examined would not be found to have much weight in them. He did not see any reason why the official precedence of future Masters of the Rolls should be more objectionable in the Court of Appeal than the precedence which the Master of the Rolls for the time being already had there, or than the precedence heretofore existing in the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Court of Exchequer, before the abolition of those distinctions. He had never heard, when those who had attained such eminent positions at the Bar and in the Public Service as to be fit, in the judgment of the Crown and the public, to be appointed to the highest judicial posts, that there was any jealousy or dissatisfaction caused by the fact that they were advanced to a position of superiority of rank. With regard to the question of retaining the greater prizes of the Profession, he thought they should neither sacrifice the public interest for the mere purpose of retaining those prizes, nor should they wish to diminish the number of them when they could be maintained consistently with the public interest. Having for sufficient reasons parted with two of those prizes, it was desirable that the office of Master of the Rolls should remain as it had been heretofore, unless some clear and strong public reason could be assigned to the contrary, and he was convinced that no such reason could be assigned in that case. It was an ancient historical office, and the other Judges had never felt, as far as he was aware, the least dissatisfaction at the Master of the Rolls, being also the principal Keeper of the Public Records, having a higher salary and rank than other Judges. It was desirable to retain with the office of the Master of the Rolls the principal custody of the public records; and the last two Masters of the Rolls, as well as the present occupant of that office, had discharged their duties in connection with the public records in a manner which all admitted to be very highly beneficial to the public. Formerly there was much separate patronage belonging to the Master of the Rolls; but now there was nothing, or next to nothing, of that kind. He was afraid that they could not conveniently put off till another Session the proposal to which the noble and learned Earl had referred, because, even before another Session, exigencies might possibly arise which would have to be provided for. On the whole, he held that there was not only no valid objection to retaining the future holders of the office of Master of the Rolls in the same position in which the Bill would place the present Master of the Rolls, but that the great preponderance of argument was in favour of that course. His noble and learned Friend had raised several objections to the selection of three Judges to sit as the Court of Appeal. He (the Lord Chancellor) had pointed out that it was necessary to strengthen the Court of Appeal in order to avoid arrears, and that the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Chief Justice had on several occasions given material assistance as ex officio Judges to the Court of Appeal; and he thought such an arrangement as he now proposed would strengthen the Court, and make it more popular, because there had, no doubt, been some little feeling from the first with respect to the fusion of Equity and Common Law, and the occasional presence of working Judges of the Queen's Bench and other Divisions of the High Court on the Bench of the Court of Appeal had a very good effect. He reminded the House that it was contemplated by the Judicature Act that three of the ordinary working Judges should be annually appointed members of the Court of Appeal. He could not, therefore, see the force of the objection to the selection of three ordinary Judges of First Instance as members of the Court; and he had explained the reason of the postponement of that part of the recommendation of the Judicature Commissioners, it not being then necessary to bring it into operation. The worst result that could ensue from the adoption of the principle of selection was that all the Judges might occasionally sit in rotation, which he admitted to be possible, but which, after all, might not be any serious evil. At the same time, he could not say, that this was a subject on which it was necessary for Parliament to decide during the present Session; because there were still under the Act of 1875 means of providing, on the same principle, for emergencies. He would, therefore, not press upon their Lordships, during the present Session, the clause for the selection of the three Judges by the general body of Judges who were to sit in the Court of Appeal. As to the patronage under the Bill, it was his intention to propose an Amendment in Committee, by which it would be conferred, not on the Lord Chancellor, but on the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Chief Justice, and the senior Puisne Judge of the Queen's Bench Division.

THE EARL OF POWIS objected to give a general power of abolishing the ordinary Assizes. It would almost exclusively be applied to Wales. It would destroy the character of the county as a local body. It would cause local inconvenience by taking prosecutors and witnesses, at increased expense, to strange places with which they had no connection, and would be contrary to the principle of bringing justice within reach of any man's door.

EARL CAIRNS said, he hoped that before they went into Committee on the Bill they would receive information as to what patronage would be affected by it. A certain amount of patronage was formerly vested in the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer. Those offices were now abolished, and their Lordships ought to know exactly what that patronage was.

After a few remarks from Lord ABERDARE,

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 99.)(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

REPORT.

Amendment reported (according to order).

Further Amendments made.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH moved to omit sub-sections A and B of Clause 4. The object of the Amendment, he explained, was to bring Clause 4 into consistency with other parts of the Bill. At present Schedule A fixed the maximum scale of fees for certain prosecutions. Clause 4, on the other hand, fixed the amount beyond which the defendant should not be cast in expenses. If their Lordships would take the trouble to add up this table of fees, it would be found that under the lowest possible scale the expenses must exceed the maximum amount which was allowed by these two sub-sections. He did not anticipate that the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill would deny that it was so, even in cases where the defendant pleaded guilty. And that was the case even allowing nothing whatever for the travelling expenses of the persons who might be brought to attend as witnesses, and they might have to come from some distance. In a great many cases under these Acts the defendant did not plead guilty; and when witnesses were to be brought, perhaps, some miles, and stay some hours in the town where the trial took place, the prosecutor would be fined in a sum of expenses which could not be less than 10s., and might amount to several pounds. The unfortunate prosecutor would thus often be fined more than the defendant. He could scarcely conceive a more anomalous and more absurd thing than such a state of matters. He had the deepest sympathy with defendants who, when convicted of some trivial offence, and fined a very small sum, were yet cast £2 or £3 of expenses. But surely a better remedy could be found for that than fining the prosecutor.

Moved to leave out sub-sections (a) and (b).—(The Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE said, it was perfectly true that there still remained in the Bill a considerable difference between the costs as laid down in the Schedule and the maximum amount which was permitted by the Bill to attach to the person convicted. But there was another side of the case to which the noble Lord had not referred. It was only in prosecutions under certain Acts of Parliaments that the persons convicted were cast in any costs at all. In criminal prosecutions under the Common Law of Scotland the person convicted was not cast in costs. This Bill was intended to remedy a very great hardship. A man might at present be fined 2s. 6d. or 5s., and because the prosecutor had been at great expense in establishing the case against him—perhaps £3 or £4—the defendant would be cast in the whole amount of the costs awarded. This was the kind of case which the Bill was intended to remedy. The Government declined to accept the Amendment because it struck at the root of the Bill. If sub-sections A and B of Clause 4 were left out, a man who committed an offence and was fined 2s. 6d. might still be cast in costs to the extent of £2. In civil actions it was the custom that the plaintiff should be re-imbursed his costs by the defendant, if he won his case; but that was not a principle which ought to enter into the Criminal Law. If the noble Lord insisted on the hardship to the prosecutor of his paying part of the costs of a criminal prosecution, still he would submit that the hardship which this Bill was intended to remedy was greater still.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, that as the Bill stood it was most inconsistent. Defendants would be fined for offences in certain cases, and yet they would not have to pay more than a small amount of costs. There would, if the Bill were passed, be a most anomalous state of things in Scotland, and no wonder that his noble Friend objected to these sub-sections. He should vote for the Amendment.

On question? their Lordships divided:—Contents 13; Not-Contents 9; Majority 4.

QUESTIONS.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARRESTS IN CO. LIMERICK—THE QUINLANS.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, with reference to the arrest of the three brothers Quinlan, aged sixteen, nineteen, and twenty, under the Coercion Act, the youngest of whom has since been released, he has made inquiries or received any report from the prison doctor at Limerick with reference to the failing health of the second youth (Patrick); and if it is still intended to keep the boy in prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have received the following Report from the surgeon of Limerick gaol in reference to this person:—

"I have most carefully examined the prisoner Patrick Quinlan. He has a slight cold, but there is nothing materially wrong. His pulse is normal, his temperature is 72 deg., and his weight is the same as it was when he came."

CENTRAL ASIA — THE RUSSIAN ADVANCE.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact, as stated by the Correspondent of the "Daily News," who is now a prisoner at Merv, that the Russians have not only occupied and annexed the whole of the Tekke Turcoman Country, including Askabad, but have also occupied Kuchan, in Persian Khorassan, a most important strategical position on the road to Meshed and Herat?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg has reported that he understood, from a conversation with the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, that Askabad was the southernmost point of the Tekke Oasis, which is stated to be the Transcaspian territory recently annexed to Russia. We have heard that General Skobelev had some months ago demanded from the people of Kuchan payment for property stolen from Russian subjects, and that a Russian Agent was to be appointed there to make annual purchases of grain; but we have no knowledge of its being occupied or annexed by Russia.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked if the hon. Baronet would take steps to obtain information on this subject? He believed Her Majesty's Government had Agents at Askabad and Meshed, and he could not see why they should be in a state of such profound ignorance. ["Order!"]

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We have received very full Reports through

Mr. Thomson from our Agent at Meshed, and my answer was founded on them.

CEYLON — CONSTITUTIONAL REFORMS.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of the Colonial Office has been recently directed to the necessity for constitutional reforms in Ceylon, especially to the desire for a more genuine representation of the people in the Legislative Council, and to the religious grievance involved in the existing system of ecclesiastical subsidies?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There has been no recent correspondence on the subject; but the constitution of the Legislative Council of Ceylon has been at various times under consideration, and it has not been thought desirable to alter the system under which unofficial Members are at present appointed to the Legislative Council. In selecting gentlemen to be recommended for such appointments, the Governor pays special attention to the views and wishes of the classes (planters and natives) to be represented. The decision has been taken to discontinue the ecclesiastical grants. Papers on the subject will shortly be presented.

BULGARIA (POLITICAL AFFAIRS).

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been called to a telegraphic Despatch from the Special Correspondent of the "Daily News," dated "Giurgevo, July 9," which appeared in that journal on the 11th instant, in which it is stated that the recent elections to the Constitutional Assembly have been stamped with illegality, and containing very severe strictures on the mode in which those elections were conducted, and also imputing to Prince Alexander of Battenberg the intimidation of the electors by military force and other means; whether he has had his attention called to a Despatch that appeared in the "Times" on Saturday last, in which it was stated that the Representatives of all the Foreign Powers would attend the Prince on his opening the so-called Constituent Assembly on 13th July; and, whether in view of the unconstitutional and arbitrary manner in which the elections to this Assembly are stated to have been conducted, Mr. Lascelles, Her Majesty's Representative in Bulgaria, has been, or, if he has not, will be, instructed to abstain from officially appearing at the opening of the so-called Constituent Assembly?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I observed the correspondence to which my hon. Friend called my attention; but we have received no official confirmation of the fact to which he refers. No instructions have been sent to Mr. Lascelles as to his attendance at the opening of the Constituent Assembly.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE MAGISTRACY—MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has seen a statement in the "Newcastle Chronicle" of the 7th instant (signed by Messrs. Birkett, Patterson, and Bryson, three English gentlemen), to the effect that Mr. Clifford Lloyd, resident magistrate at Kilmallock, had brought before him, at his private residence at Kilmallock, an old woman named Mrs. Colman, who was charged with trying to prevent people from buying milk from a milk woman named Reardan; if he (Mr. Lloyd) tried this case at his own residence, and sentenced this poor old woman to six months' imprisonment, without affording her time to prepare her defence, or without her husband or any of her relatives being aware that she was to be tried; whether this statement or the denial of Mr. Lloyd is the correct account of what occurred; and, whether, under the circumstances, he will allow the Law to take its course in the case of this woman, who is nearly seventy years old?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had not seen the newspaper report; but he had received a Report from the resident magistrate, who, in his opinion, acted quite properly. There was, it appeared, a respectable farmer in the vicinity, who, because he did not obey a Land League decree ordering him to pay a fine or give up a piece of land he had held for some years, had been frequently "Boycotted." His house had been attacked during the night, and attempts made to burn it, so that it was necessary for a policeman to be quartered in the house. He had, accordingly, to dispose surreptitiously of his milk, butter, and cheese, and the complainant was attacked for selling his milk. Two women, one of them Mrs. Colman, attacked her, collected a crowd, and accused her of selling the "Boycotted" man's milk, and threatened to drive her away. She swore on information that she was in fear of her life, and the resident magistrate considered if he had not taken this action her life would not have been safe. He (Mr. Clifford Lloyd) issued a warrant for the arrest of the two women. The woman in question was arrested and brought before the magistrate, admitted her offence, and was ordered to find two securities of £10 each to keep the peace for six months, or, in default, to suffer six months' imprisonment. Her husband endeavoured to find the bail, at first unsuccessfully, and the woman was locked up; but next day, on the bail being found, she was released.

MR. O'SULLIVAN: Would the right hon. Gentleman state whether this case was disposed of by Mr. Clifford Lloyd at his private residence; and whether he has previously denied, in answer to a Question from me, that he ever tried prisoners at his private residence, although I stated at the time that I saw them being brought in there myself?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have stated that he tried the case at his office?

MR. PARNELL: Is not this office in his private residence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not know whether it is or not, and I do not think it makes any difference.

MR. CALLAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether this Mr. Clifford Lloyd is the same as the person about whom the Messrs. Whitworth, of Drogheda, communicated with the Chief Secretary, and as to whom the hon. Member for Drogheda, in his place in this House, stated within the last month that he was a "firebrand"?

MR. O'SULLIVAN: Does not the right hon. Gentleman think it harsh that an old woman of 70 years of age should be sent to prison for six months for such a trivial offence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: She was bound over to keep the peace for six months, and in default was committed to prison and kept there, not for six months, but for one night, and next day, on security being offered, she was released. With regard to her age, I am told that she has the appearance of a woman of 50.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—CRIME AND OUTRAGE—THE COUNTY OF WATERFORD.

MR. J. COWEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to the following facts:—That, in the Return of Agrarian Outrages in Ireland for the month of June, only seven are returned as having been committed in the county of Waterford, and of these four are for sending threatening letters; that at the quarter sessions recently held in Waterford there was only one case, and that a case of three lads accused of stealing a few potatoes; that at the last winter assises for the four counties of Waterford, Wexford, Tipperary, and Kilkenny, containing a population of nearly half a million, there were only thirty-nine cases for trial, eight of which resulted in acquittals, and thirty in convictions; and, if he was aware of the limited extent of agrarian crime, and the small amount of ordinary crime, when he sanctioned the suspension of the constitutional liberties of the inhabitants of the county of Waterford?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he found that the Return of the agrarian outrages in Ireland for the month of June showed that only seven outrages had been committed in the county of Waterford, and of these four were for sending threatening letters. He did not know what happened at the quarter sessions recently held in Waterford. It might be true that there was only one case, and that against three lads for stealing a few potatoes. But, as he had stated before, it was not so much on the statement of the actual offences committed as on the reports they received of the condition of the county that the Government had to act. They had made the most careful inquiry into the circumstances, and had come to the conclusion—which they believed was perfectly justified—that, having the power with which they had been intrusted by Parliament, it was their duty to prescribe the county of Waterford.

MR. HEALY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had power to suspect whole counties and districts, as well as individuals?

MR. J. COWEN asked where the Chief Secretary got his information, if not from the Returns of Crime submitted to Parliament, and on which alone Parliament could form its judgment? What was the basis on which he acted when the Returns of Crime showed that in the four counties of Waterford, Wexford, Tipperary, and Kilkenny there had only been 30 cases in six months?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member is doubtless aware that we have a very heavy responsibility upon us, to see that the powers given to us are used as effectively as possible for the preservation of law and order. We have responsible persons who give us information, and we have made the most careful inquiry of those persons before taking the steps we have taken. The House intrusted us with the discretion; and, as I have already stated more than once, if the House thinks fit to take from us that discretion, they should bring forward a Resolution depriving us of it.

MR. LEAMY: Has the Chief Secretary arrested a single person in the city of Waterford?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member had better give me Notice of the Question; but it does not at all follow that we should be obliged to make arrests because we prescribe.

MR. R. POWER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman really did not know whether or not anyone had been arrested in Waterford?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not think Members will be surprised, considering the number of Questions asked, and the manner in which any sort of mistake that I might make would be treated by this House, that in a matter of detail I prefer having Notice.

MR. J. COWEN said, that the right hon. Gentleman did not give the information asked for, but always closed his answers by saying if hon. Members would submit a Resolution, he would be prepared to meet it. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Newcastle is not entitled to go into an argument.

MR. J. COWEN said, that what he wanted to know was whether the Government would afford facilities for discussing the grounds upon which 200 persons had been arrested?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member must be well enough aware of the proceedings of the House to know that, as regards the order of Business, and whether a day will be given by the Government, I am not the person to ask, but the Prime Minister.

MR. HEALY: Give us a day, then.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—THE VOLUNTEER REVIEW AT WINDSOR—THE METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. CARINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true that one thousand two hundred men of the Metropolitan Police were sent to the review held at Windsor on Saturday last; what was the total cost incurred; whether any portion of the expenses was defrayed by the ratepayers of the Metropolis; and, by whose order they were sent?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I am a little surprised at my hon. Friend's Question. He ought to have known that, under the Metropolitan Police Act, the men are sworn in to serve at the Royal Palaces and within 10 miles of them. The Metropolitan Police always act at great State ceremonies, and also upon great national occasions when Her Majesty is present, and no occasion deserves that name better than that of the Volunteer Review at Windsor on Saturday last. The order to go was given upon my responsibility, upon the application of the Office of Woods and Forests and of the Ranger. The number of men employed was 706. The military authorities have always declared that they very much prefer the Metropolitan Police to the troops for keeping the ground on these occasions. The cost of the employment of the police was between £200 and £300. That cost is defrayed, as it always is on occasions of this character, out of the Police Fund, half of which is contributed by the ratepayers and half comes from the Imperial Exchequer. I do not know whether my hon. Friend is a ratepayer of London. I am; and, on behalf of the ratepayers of London, I am prepared to say that this contribution on their part of £100, to be divided among some 4,000,000 of people, for the success of the experiment of Saturday last, is one which they will readily bear. I think they will be glad to contribute to the success of the Review, where all who took part in it so well performed their duty.

MR. GORST asked whether the ratepayers had any choice left in the matter, or whether their money was spent at the will of the right hon. Gentleman?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: If the hon. and learned Member thinks that the ratepayers of London are ill-used, and he will bring forward a Motion on the subject, it will be considered.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 135.]

(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [TWENTY-FIFTH NIGHT.]

[Progress 11th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART V.

ACQUISITION OF LAND BY TENANTS, RECLAMATION OF LAND, AND EMIGRATION.

Reclamation of Land and Emigration.

Clause 25 (Reclamation of land).

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, at end of clause, add—“(5) The Land Commission may from time to time purchase such waste, semi-waste, or uncultivated lands as to them shall seem fit, apportion them in such lots as they deem suitable, and may let or sell such lots to persons of approved character, and competency, and the Board of Works may advance to such tenants or purchasers such sums per acre as may in the opinion of the said Board of Works be adequate and proper, either in bulk sum or by annual instalments for the due reclamation of such waste lands. All sums so advanced to be secured upon the lands in such manner as the Board of Works shall determine, and to be made repayable, as hereafter set forth in regard to other advances under this Act.”—(Dr. Lyons.)

Question again proposed, “That those words be there added.”

MR. DALY said, he hoped they would now find the way clear for the acceptance of this Amendment, especially as the Board of Works would not be required by it to go any farther than they might think fit. He put it to the Government to say whether it was a judicious thing in the face of the diminution of the population of Ireland, and of the decay and diminution of wealth and industry, to refuse to entertain a proposal which, in any case, would entail very little loss upon the State. They should bear in mind that there were many men and women whose wages ran to 1s. 4d., 1s. 5d., and 1s. 6d. a-day, who formed the residuum of the population, and who filled the workhouses and the hospitals.

If their sons and daughters were allowed to remain in the country on holdings of their own, it would, undoubtedly, be their duty to provide for their fathers and mothers, and prevent their being a burden to the State. The French had done in Algeria pretty nearly the same thing as was now proposed; and he knew, of his own knowledge, that there were very large bonuses offered to induce people to migrate to Algeria and to settle there. What was wanted in Ireland was that the Land Commission should, with the aid of the State, assume possession of such waste lands as they could get, and advance certain sums of money to persons who possessed the labour necessary to cultivate those lands beneficially. It ought to be a paramount idea to increase the natural wealth of the country. If the experiment failed, it would not fail for the Government, it would only fail for the people; but their labour would remain in the land; and that land, originally purchased by the Government, would be so much the better. In listening to some of the speeches which had been made upon this proposal, he had felt that the assumption made by some hon. Gentlemen that the Land Commission would put the State to an enormous amount of expense was altogether unwarranted. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had suggested that the experiment might be made with £500,000; but, certainly, a long time must elapse before the Commission, which he assumed would be composed of reasonable and prudent men, would advance so much as that. If the experiment were made and proved successful, it would be the beginning of an operation which would extend, and which would be of the greatest possible benefit to Ireland. It should be borne in mind that, not from a humanitarian, but from a purely selfish point of view, it was to the interest of this country that Ireland should be prosperous and comfortable; and its prosperity would have the greatest effect on the home trade of England. Ireland was so unfortunately situated, that she must depend for her supplies on the manufacturing industries of England. Hitherto, there had been many years of discontent and disaffection in Ireland, and the Government had been obliged to keep up an expensive armed Force to maintain order; but a little of the money spent in the direction suggested by this Amendment would do away, in a great measure, with the necessity for maintaining that large standing army in Ireland. Irishmen had seen large sums of money voted away during the last two years for the maintenance of the English flag in Afghanistan and in South Africa—Afghanistan alone, he believed, had cost £17,400,000 during that period. England admitted that Ireland had a great many grievances to complain of, and acknowledged that many of those grievances, and much of the poverty under which Ireland laboured, were due not to any Irish fault. It was not much to ask, then, that the natural wealth of the country should be allowed to remain in Ireland, and that this experiment should be begun, not extravagantly, but after carefully weighing all the circumstances, in the hope of establishing a new era. Ireland had the labour and the land, the Government possessed the money, so that all the necessary elements were at hand; and he was certain that if the Government carried out the proposal they would not be in any way injured, and they would have the approval of all who had the interests and welfare of Ireland at heart. Hon. Members knew what immense sums of money had been laid out in India to keep the Hindostanee from starvation; and the railway system of India, apart from its commercial value, had been instituted by the Government mainly for the purpose of taking supplies to districts which required them. Irishmen had been for 700 years under English rule, and subject to privations all that time. They had a right to ask that England should do for them what she had done for the Hindostanee. The waste lands of Ireland were increasing every day, and the strong arms and healthy men of the country were leaving her ports because they were not able to subsist. There was no industry in Ireland for unskilled labour other than that connected with the land; and if the Government would only take possession of the waste lands, and grant them under favourable conditions to the peasantry, he believed the experiment would have every chance of success. Her Majesty's subjects in Ireland had quite as good a right to generous treatment as had her subjects in India.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, he had taken no part whatever in the discussion of this Bill hitherto, because he had been anxious to see it pass into law, and to leave discussion to those who best understood the question from an Irish point of view. But this was another attempt to place the Irish hand in the pocket of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in an unreasonable way, and, as representing a large industrial population, he felt bound to say a few words upon the proposal. In almost every difficulty under which Irishmen laboured they asked for Government assistance. An Irishman in Ireland seemed to be wanting in every kind of self-reliance; but the moment he got out of Ireland he became a man full of self-reliance and confidence. [MR. HEALY: How is it?] The proposal now made, if carried out, must be conducted either at a loss or at a profit. If at a loss, the Irish people would say—"The English Government must help us to pay for it." If at a profit, they would keep it to themselves. If the land was capable of being reclaimed at a profit, why should not the Irish people do it for themselves, with the aid of that English and Scotch capital which would flow into Ireland as soon as its present condition of unsettlement was ended? But he himself did not see how these reclamations were to be brought about. He had had some experience of reclamation in the North, and he knew that the land now under farming was under-stocked. It would be a much better plan to stock that land which was now under-stocked both in England and Ireland than to attempt the reclamation of wastes. There were hundreds of thousands of acres of land which had gone out of cultivation and been laid down in grass in England and Scotland within the last few years, and there were many farms under-stocked. If the Government wished to do a patriotic thing at the expense of the Treasury they had better stock these farms than begin with the reclamation of waste lands. If they were to speculate in land at all and to become land-jobbers they had better speculate in cultivated lands, and cultivate them better, and thus find employment. He had no confidence whatever in the reclamation of waste lands, for he had tried it over and over again himself, and had spent upwards of £20 an acre on land that would not let afterwards for £1 an acre. And the mere cost of reclamation was not all, for buildings had to be put up; and as soon as the people gathered together in one spot they had to have places of worship built for them, and schools, all of which added very materially to the cost. He had very little confidence in the Government doing such things as arterial drainage—such things were much better done by private enterprise. Government-built buildings, too, were generally much less adapted to the requirements of a district than privately-built buildings, and the people who worked for the Government knew as a rule that they had the Government purse to draw upon, and they seldom worked like people who worked for private enterprise. Then, again, the moment the Government went into the market to buy land, that very fact would immediately raise the price of land all over Ireland, and private persons who would otherwise buy and improve land would thus be heavily handicapped. Then, how was the money to be redeemed? An interest of 3 or 3½ per cent would not be paid for out of the rent when churches and schools had been built, and the Government must remember that they had the redemption of the money to look to, and the speculators in enclosure had to consider also that repairs and taxes would have to be provided for. He believed that a kind of Roving Commission, sent out by the State to buy land here and there, in order to place the tenantry upon it, would be an act most false to all the principles of political economy. Then, who were to select the tenantry “of approved character and competency?” Were the Commissioners to have the selection? He had a strong objection to Government-appointed tenants, and a still stronger objection to the proposal, inasmuch as it would increase at least for a while, and probably a long while, the lands held in mortmain, which had proved such a terrible incubus in dealing with the Land Question. While he should be glad to see the experiment of a peasant proprietary tried in Ireland, he certainly would have a strong objection to its being tried on the lines laid down by the present Amendment.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he had not been surprised to hear the speech that had just been delivered; in fact, he had been looking for some speech of that kind all through the debate—a speech delivered from what he might call the high - and - dry, old - fashioned political economist's point of view. They had now had it put before them in all its narrowness and rigour; but he thought it had come rather too late in this instance. It was rather too late in the day to begin talking of the principles of that school of political economy, when there was not a single line or clause of the Bill that did not go right in the teeth of those principles, and its very introduction was a confession that there was a condition of things now in Ireland which was not to be got rid of by an adhesion to the antiquated doctrines of a narrow sect. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of putting the Irish hand into the English pocket; but he seemed to forget that the English hand had been a good deal in the Irish pocket. Whenever a foreign war had been undertaken by English statesmen to maintain England's prestige—and Ireland, it should be remembered, did not gain, even in prestige, from such wars—Ireland was taxed beyond her fair proportion. The hon. Gentleman had asked why what was now proposed could not be done by private energy and capital; but the answer was that Ireland was now reduced to such a miserably poor condition that the practical benefit of the working of this Bill must be very slow. Profit for private enterprise could be much more quickly found in other fields, and mere speculators would not look to work of this kind as an investment for their money. The work must be begun by the State, or it could not be done at all. He had been much interested in the speech delivered last night by the hon. Member for Galway County (Mr. Mitchell Henry)—a speech of much ability, force, and earnestness. He was reading only this very day a report of a remarkable debate which took place in this House a little more than two years ago; it was a debate on the Motion of the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who called for an extension of the principle of the “Bright Clauses.” There was a remarkable speech made in that debate by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), and in the course of that speech the right hon. Gentleman admitted again and again that the “Bright Clauses” had failed of their object because there was wanting some special machinery, some direct agency, to put them into operation. Now, that was exactly what the Government so far had failed to supply by their clause in the present Bill. They offered to advance a certain amount to promote certain works; but the very thing wanted, and the lack of which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster declared two years ago was the defect of the "Bright Clauses," they did not give—they did not supply that direct agency by which the work might be carried out, and by which the end sought to be reached would alone be directly attained. In the course of that speech the right hon. Gentleman went back to the days of the discussions of the Land Bill of 1870, and he showed what was the pressure and difficulty by which that Act was carried. He told the House of Commons that while that Bill was being discussed the condition of Ireland was one of most serious difficulty, that a state of terrorism existed all over the country, that there were distress and disaffection everywhere, and the right hon. Gentleman added the remarkable statement that if the Bill had not been passed there would have been a general, a universal strike against the payment of any rent whatever to the landlords of Ireland. Hon. Members who thought that the Land League was the parent of all the recent difficulties in Ireland would do well to remember the words of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, spoken before the Land League was in existence, and describing the condition of Ireland nine years farther back. The right hon. Gentleman asked how could such a strike be met? Would it be possible, the right hon. Gentleman inquired, to collect by force the rents of 600,000 occupiers? He declared that the defects in that Land Act had rendered it unsuitable and unavailing as a thorough and radical cure for the difficulties under which Ireland laboured. Were they to benefit anything by the instruction given them in the discussion to which he had referred? They had heard a good deal to-day and on other days about the interests of that much-to-be-pitied personage, the British taxpayer. He had no great pity in this matter for the British taxpayer. He did not mean to speak harsh words of all the British taxpayers, of whom he happened to be one himself—he spoke of the British taxpayer living in this country—but if the British taxpayer was required to pay just now a little more than he liked, he was being served very right. The British taxpayer was responsible for all the bad government of Ireland. To please the British taxpayer every good measure to Ireland had been denied and every bad measure passed. This had been so for the last century and more; it was so in the days before the Union, and it was so still. It was to please the British taxpayer that Burke was unseated at Bristol, and that Fox was driven into retirement. It was to please the British taxpayer that coercion was lately introduced into Ireland; to please the British taxpayer stories of outrages had been manufactured wholesale in Ireland as Brummagem idols were manufactured for African savages; it was to please the British taxpayer—

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is going considerably beyond the Amendment.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he was only answering the objections made over and over again to what was advanced by his hon. Friends and himself; and he merely wanted to show that that respectable personage, the British taxpayer, was the one who ought to pay the expenses of a work of this kind, because, to please him, Ireland had ever been misgoverned.

MR. E. COLLINS said, that nothing would prove of greater benefit to Ireland than a proper system for reclamation of land and the employment of the poor, and now unemployed, people. He sympathized with the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite; but it was the depth of that sympathy that induced him to believe that his hon. Friends did not approach the matter in the most practical manner. The object they all had in view was not to make a display in this House or before the country. He was perfectly conscious that every one of his hon. Friends who sat on the opposite Benches felt as earnestly in the matter of the effective and proper employment of the people as any individual in the Kingdom; but, as a practical man, he would like to examine the subject shortly. Now, what was proposed? It was proposed that the State, through the Land Commission or the Commissioners of Public Works, should take up one of the most difficult processes, and certainly the most laborious and most risky of all industrial enterprizes, that men could engage in. To carry out the work a staff would be required; there would be managers, and engineers, and other officials; and, in his opinion, a most ruinous and demoralizing system of patronage would be introduced into the country. If the great object in view was to be effected, the direct management of the matter must not be under the State. The end in view must be accomplished by intermediaries of the most effective and practical character. It must be by local communities, whether they might be Boards of Guardians or Local Boards of one kind or the other; or it must be through Companies or Associations of capitalists; but certainly not by direct dealings with individual occupiers. At all events, for the State to deal with the matter directly was so impracticable and unreasonable that he could not support the idea for one moment; and he would like to see his hon. Friends who were so deeply interested in the subject applying themselves to a more practicable form of dealing with the question. He did not speak as a novice on a subject of this kind, for he had devoted a good deal of time and attention in another country to witnessing the organization of a system of land tenure by peasant proprietors and the improvement of the condition of the peasantry. He would like to say, for the information of some of his Friends, that in Russia the State did not deal with individuals; the State did not dispose of land to individuals, but to communities or communes. They handed over the land to communes of, perhaps, 200 to 2,000 persons. These communes had an entirely independent local system of administration. They acquired the land from the State; they apportioned it amongst their numbers, collected rents, and stimulated industry; and in the event of any man being thriftless, or inattentive to his duties, they removed him. Every three years they supervised the whole management; but in no case that he was acquainted with did the State deal directly with individuals. In conclusion, he must point out that the question under consideration was not one of loss or gain to the Treasury, but how they could best restore the people who during the last few years had gone through such great misery to a condition of contentment and tranquillity.

Mr. E. Collins

MR. O'CONNOR POWER regretted exceedingly that his hon. Friend who had just addressed the Committee should have deferred until this stage stating his objection to any Commission being empowered to buy land and to sell it to individuals. The hon. Gentleman voted for the 20th clause of this Bill; and what did that tell them? It told them that any estate might be purchased by the Land Commission for the purpose of re-selling to the tenants. The hon. Gentleman had simply joined the hon. Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease) in raising artificial objections to a plain business-like proposal. The hon. Member spoke of his experience in Russia, and objected to their proposal as being of an impracticable character. He asked the hon. Gentleman, who was an Irish patriot and an Irish Representative, how did he justify his silence? Where was his proposal? They would like him to favour them with some net result of his great foreign experience, instead of sitting still while questions of great interest were being discussed, and only contributing his objection to the feeble wisdom of his Colleagues. They had had a speech from the hon. Member for South Durham, which they must regard as important. Next in rank to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he had spoken as a defender of the British taxpayer. The hon. Member said the poverty of Ireland was to be accounted for by want of self-reliance and enterprize on the part of the people. He said that Ireland made no progress; but the Imperial Government was not responsible. [Mr. J. W. PEASE: No!] He (Mr. O'Connor Power) felt too deeply upon this question to have listened to the hon. Gentleman with any want of attention. He followed him as closely as he possibly could, and he distinctly referred to the want of self-reliance on the part of the Irish people. Then the hon. Gentleman, with that fairness and candour for which he was remarkable, admitted that as soon as an Irishman crossed the Channel—as soon as he came over in the steamer, and arrived in Durham, Northumberland, or Lancashire—his character was immediately transformed; he became, instead of a lazy, thriftless, uneconomic labourer, an industrious, thrifty, and hard-working fellow. Surely, the atmosphere of England must be so dry, and crisp, and stimulating to the poor Irishman that the moment he set foot on English soil, he become transformed from a lazy blackguard into a marvel of industry and self-reliance. Now, what were the facts? The facts were that the man was working in one country with a security of prospective reward for his labour; while in the other country he was deprived of every element of security, and he was surrounded by men of capital who had no sympathy with him or the country to which he belonged. Whenever a proposal like the present was made, the Irish people were lectured for their want of self-reliance. Now, when he was speaking to his constituents in Mayo he happened to give short lectures himself on the very same subject, and simply because whatever truth there was in an accusation of this kind could be most advantageously ventilated when they were dealing face to face with the people themselves. He had never been amongst those who taught the Irish people to be constantly looking to the Imperial Parliament for the means of stimulating Irish prosperity; but there were two sides to the question, and the side which affected the British taxpayer and the responsibility of the English Government towards Ireland was the side which it was his duty, as an Irish Representative, to present to the consideration of hon. Gentlemen. The hon. Member for South Durham said—"Why enter upon the cultivation of waste land? There is a good deal of land which is not yet waste which ought to be stocked." He did not know what meaning the hon. Gentleman attached to the term "stocked;" but if he meant stocked with cattle, all he (Mr. O'Connor Power) could say was that such an argument had nothing to do with the subject in hand, for why were they so anxious that these lands should be entered upon and allotted? Simply to remedy the most crying evil with which Ireland had been afflicted for the last half-century, the evil arising from small and miserable farms, upon which it was impossible for the people, if they were required to pay no rent, to wring out a comfortable subsistence. The hon. Gentlemen, too, was under a misapprehension as to the real purport of this Amendment. He seemed to think that the proposal of the hon. Member for the City of Dublin was that the Commission should not only purchase these waste lands, but, having purchased them, should enter upon their reclamation; that they should try to reclaim them by a system of hired labour. But that was not the proposition at all. The only thing that they wanted the Commission to do was to initiate and complete the purchase of these lands. The land could be bought for a few shillings an acre, and advantageously allotted. They were constantly asked—"Why, if it be economically advisable to enter upon the cultivation of these waste lands, do not individuals buy them?" Take, for instance, the case of the Irish fisheries. They did not hear of the establishment of any English or Irish Companies for the development of the Irish fisheries. Did it not, therefore, follow that the Irish fishermen, if fairly encouraged in their industry, could enter upon larger transactions with great profit? They had the Report of the Canadian Committee, which told them of the enormous advantages which had resulted from the very slight contributions which were made to help the fishermen in their industry. ["Question!"] He thought the illustration was quite to the point. What did it prove in an economic and commercial sense? It proved that they could cultivate land in Ireland not by a system of hired labour and large farms, but by helping men to live on the land and by the land. Ireland's demand on the Exchequer was not the demand of a beggar. He believed that not a single penny that would be advanced by the Treasury under this Amendment would be lost to the State. In course of time it would be paid back again. The industry of the new proprietors would be profitable, and, in course of 30 or 35 years, he was sure they would be able to pay all their liabilities. The Government, he was bound to say, seemed to have paid attention to suggestions coming from the Irish Members on this Bill in almost every particular except this, the reclamation of waste lands. He did not say that Her Majesty's Government had not made considerable advances in the direction of Irish opinion; but what he wished to say was, that if they did not go any further than they had already gone, they would leave Ireland as she had been during the last half-century—a prey to periodic famine. No amount of re-arrangement of the relations between landlord and tenant could get rid of facts and figures in Irish society which were constantly being brought forward, and which they were only too willing to study when Ireland was on the verge of famine and in a state of semi-starvation. When Ireland was in this condition, any Government might come down in a panic and induce the House of Commons to enter upon a large expenditure; but expenditure at such times was mostly entered upon too late. In face of a national calamity not infrequently the Government were reckless in their expenditure; but, in this case, they did not ask for recklessness. What they wanted was that the Government should not bask in the sunshine of one favourable season, and that they should not, because they had passed the Relief of Distress Act a year or two ago, and now were bringing in this Land Reform, think that they had nothing to fear from a recurrence of Irish famine or semi-famine. What he contended was that they would have the same difficulties to encounter. What were these difficulties? Irishmen were sometimes accused of dipping in the colours of their imagination in addressing the House. He could only, on this occasion, deplore the want of a power of imagination, and his utter inability to appeal to a pictorial rhetoric which only would be adequate to describe the perfect misery in which tens of thousands of the people of Ireland were living at the present moment, and which might involve them in starvation again as soon as they were subject to a succession of two bad harvests. What took place in the discussion on this Bill last year? It was his duty to call the attention of the House to the condition of the crowded districts in Mayo, Galway, and other parts of the West of Ireland. He read the reports that had been sent to the various Relief Committees—the Mansion House Committee, the Duchess of Marlborough's Committee, and the organization of the Land League in Dublin—and what was the impression the House of Commons gathered from those reports? The impression was to be gathered from the unanimous Resolution adopted and sanctioned by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, which Resolution declared that—serious and immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government.”

Now, he would put this question to Her Majesty's Government—What had they done since that Resolution was inscribed on the Records of the House? They had had quotations from the Report of the Registrar General which was issued not long ago. In that Report they were told that there were 94,000 one-roomed cottages in the West of Ireland in which families of five or six persons slept and lived together during those portions of the day when they were not occupied on their farms—in which they lived and slept with all the hens, and ducks, and geese, and dogs, and asses, and other animals which they were able to maintain amongst them. That was the wretched and miserable condition of these people. The Registrar General described also the condition of their farms—how small they were, and how miserable were their dwellings. It was utterly impossible that the House of Commons should look calmly on the revelations made from time to time, and to say there was nothing to be done, and that the matter would have to be left to regulate itself by the ordinary rules of supply and demand. It was said—“If these dwellings are too crowded, why don't the people go out and get lodgings somewhere else?” But surely they had abandoned all that kind of reasoning. They stuck at the gnat, having swallowed the camel already in a previous clause of the Bill. They now refused to sanction that which, he believed, would do more to lull the wave of Irish complaint, so oppressive to Englishmen and so humiliating to the Irish Representatives, than anything else—they refused to do that which would be more productive of good than any clause in this Bill. He would say to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer that Ireland had a claim on the British taxpayer in this matter; and he would tell them why. The right hon. Gentleman could not be ignorant of the fact that to past Governments in this country was attributable the destruction of every Irish industry. To past Governments in this country was attributable the maintenance of that land system which two of the greatest efforts of the right hon. Gentleman's magnificent career had been devoted to remedying. How had these crowded districts been brought about in Ireland? They had been brought about by the process of eviction from the better lands; the poorer people had been evicted from the rich land, and had been chased up the mountain sides, and there, when they had scratched the hills and managed to secure a scanty living, they were chased further up, until, as was to be seen in parts of Mayo, they were to be found, like the eagle, nestling amongst the rocks and caves on the mountain tops. But even there they showed their industry, which, at all events, enabled them to live. Even if the Treasury were to suffer a loss in entering upon these transactions, he would not hesitate to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, because he would say that England and the Governments in this country had, in time past, stricken down by the iron hand of the law the rising industries in Ireland, and had done nothing since out of their bounty to repair the ruin they had wrought. On these grounds—on the ground of historical justice, if on no other—he appealed to the Government to grant a permissive power to this Commission to purchase and reclaim these waste lands, and so to repair to some extent the injustice which, in times past, they had done to the tenants of Ireland.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has addressed the Committee with his accustomed ability; and I am bound to say he addresses it with great advantage, because no later than last night he gave evidence of the intensity of his desire that the Government should retain in the Bill some lines which they were required reluctantly to surrender in reference to the local communities of Ireland in their relation to the lands in the baronies. These lines were struck out in consequence of considerations put forward by the Irish Representatives. But the Irish Representatives to whom I refer are now urging upon us—and they expect to carry their view by persistence—the adoption of a plan which it has been our duty, on the part of the Government, to declare in plain terms we could not adopt, and which has not yet received the support of one single Member amongst the 550 who are the Representatives of Scotland and England. Now, at this period of the debate, I think it is my duty to clear the ground as far as I can, inasmuch as the inclination and intention of the Government, though they cannot bind the Committee, yet are an element for its consideration. And with regard to its intention, it is my absolute duty to say that I am surprised that hon. Gentlemen should go on in their speeches saying again and again that these things deserve the consideration of the Government, and should go on making appeals to us long after we have declared in the plainest words that we are bound to refuse to accede to any such applications. Now, I would say this—that I have very grave doubts whether, if the Government were to abandon their present intention, they would be able to induce those Members of Parliament who represent English and Scotch constituencies to allow the State, through the Land Commission, or through the Board of Works, or both, to be purchasers of unreclaimed lands in Ireland for the purpose of bringing them into cultivation under the responsibility of the Government and entirely at the cost of the State. I do not believe myself that it is within the power of the Government to do this, though the House has done much on the solicitation of the Government. This House, I say, has acceded to much to which it was reluctant to accede; and many hon. Members from Ireland seem to take no account of that. The hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy), how does he take account of it? He expressed no acknowledgment, no gratitude to the House—[Mr. HEALY: Not a bit.] He expressed no acknowledgment, no gratitude to the 550 Representatives of England and Scotland for the provisions they have adopted in this Bill—the extraordinary measures they have adopted in this Bill out of consideration for the circumstances of Ireland. The only use that is made of them is the use made by the hon. Member for Longford, who says these measures have destroyed all reasons for having regard to economical principles; and he denounces all reference to principles of political economy and the old-fashioned doctrines of the narrow school. Departure from all ordinary considerations is the doctrine of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member actually went this length—exceeding, I should say, what hitherto I have heard any Member from Ireland put forth in the course of this Session—that for a century or more the Government of this country has denied every good measure to Ireland, while every bad measure has been passed.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY: What I said was that every good measure which had been denied had been denied in deference to the opinions of the British taxpayer. I did not say that every good measure had been denied, whilst every bad measure had been passed.

MR. GLADSTONE: I cannot abandon altogether my own recollection. I took down the words of the hon. Member at the time, and I stand on those words, whilst admitting that the hon. Gentleman's recollection may be perfectly good, at all events, as to what he intended to say. Let me see what sort of topics have been used in these appeals to the Government. One hon. Member says—"You spend enormous sums in wars. You (the English Parliament) have spent £17,000,000 on the Afghan War; and, that being the case, can there be any objection to spending a little more in reclaiming the waste lands of Ireland?" Well, I would ask, did the Members for Ireland endeavour to prevent the spending of that £17,000,000? ["Yes!"] Well, then, look at the Division Lists, and I will undertake to say you will not find a single one in which the majority of that portion of Members, who especially call themselves the Irish Members, took part in checking, or in endeavouring to check, that military expenditure. And, then, Sir, this is all laid on the English Parliament. They say—"You have always been misgoverning; you have always been doing this and that evil to Ireland." Yes; but, after all, let us recollect that Ireland is represented in this House in a much larger proportion to its numbers than is Scotland. [Mr. PARNELL dissented.] The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) shakes his head, and implies that 63 Members for 3,500,000 people are a larger proportion than 103 Members for 5,250,000. Such is the arithmetical doctrine of the hon. Member for the City of Cork. I must say it is quite time that those who sit here in such numbers and in such power—in numbers beyond the proportion to which the population of Ireland entitles them—should cease from this habit of speaking as if they were petitioners at the Bar, and had no votes to give along with us, the Representatives of the other portions of the Kingdom, in governing the deliberations of this House. Works for the reclamation of land, they say, have been executed in England. Truly, but have these works been executed at the expense of the British Exchequer? I should like to see what response a Minister who proposed to expend public money upon the execution of public works in England would meet with at the hands of the Irish Representatives. Well, the hon. Member who last sat down most fairly grappled, as he thought—and no man is more capable, in general, I think, of judging of the efficiency of his own argument—with what he felt to be the formidable objection of my hon. Friend the Member for South Durham (Mr. J. W. Pease). My hon. Friend had the courage to say to hon. Members opposite that he was surprised that they had not formed themselves into Companies for the purpose of carrying out profitable works in Ireland, and he pointed out to them that they would be sure, looking at the extent of their credit with the people, of more support than anyone else. The hon. Member said he could give a complete answer to this, and his answer was that there were no Companies formed for the promotion of Irish fisheries, although no one could say that Irish fisheries did not produce a profit. Well, but who has heard of any Companies being formed for the promotion of English or Scotch fisheries? The illustration was the most unfortunate that could have been made, for all experience seems to prove that fisheries are a description of enterprize which must be carried on by individuals, or, at least, by persons on co-operative principles. Now, what is the proposal before us? It is that the State has to come into the field and is to acquire uncultivated or waste lands; it is to acquire them by purchasing them from the landlord and by buying off the tenants' rights of pasture, which very generally extend over these waste lands. That double operation the public agent is to conduct in the first place. The State is then to find occupiers, among whom it is to divide the land in certain lots of 20, 30, or 40 acres, be it what it may, and these occupiers have, and can have, no security to give on lots which are still waste, or the means requisite for cultivating the holdings; and this plan is described by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and who usually speaks with moderation in these matters, as "a plain, business-like proposition."

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Allow me to mention that the security of the land is there. The Commission can repossess themselves of the land if they like.

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; a very agreeable thing to do—to repossess themselves of this waste land, the tenants decamping with the advances which have been made to them in order to enable them to bring it into cultivation, and the Commission having before them the hopeful and pleasant prospect of re-commencing the same operations. So much for the "plain, business-like proposal" of the hon. Gentleman, whose interruption, I think, was scarcely necessary. Let us look at this question as a matter of business. In my opinion, there is the greatest force in the objection taken by the hon. Member for South Durham, that to throw more lands into mortmain by casting them into the hands of the Government is an operation to which it would be difficult indeed to reconcile a British Parliament. But that is not all. As to the nature of these operations, we have authorized loans to the landlords, and we have authorized loans to the tenants, and now we authorize these advances for purposes which, I believe, are absolutely so comprehensive as to be universal. But this does not content—nothing will content—hon. Members from Ireland, except that the State itself shall become the undertaker of enterprizes which nobody else in the world would undertake. Now, of all enterprizes connected with agricultural improvement, there are none so difficult and slippery and hazardous as the reclamation of land. There is no question more contested, there is none upon which it is more easy to produce a multitude of opinions equally confident on both sides; and the question is, whether there is or is not in Ireland any large quantity of land which is capable of profitable reclamation? Be that as it may, what I wish to say is this—that, according to universal experience, the reclamation of land can only be carried on with success, and is hardly ever attempted except, in the first place, by private enterprize, and, in the second place, in minute detail. How is it that the people have crept up the hillsides of this country? Why, it has been by small efforts, made by the landlords or the tenants—by proceeding in detail.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to interrupt him. We do not propose—

MR. GLADSTONE: I have described the scheme of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER: No. We do not propose that the Land Commission should do it at all.

MR. GLADSTONE: I did not say that. The Land Commission is not invited to do it. The Land Commission is only invited to take upon itself the whole cost and responsibility of its being done. The Land Commission is not to have the slight chance of success which, perhaps, it might possess if it used its own instruments, but it is to undertake the whole cost and responsibility—to purchase out the landlord, to divide the land, to procure the people to occupy it, and supply them with the money necessary for effecting the object. I think the hon. Gentleman's interruption was unnecessary. This, of all agricultural problems, is the very worst to put into the hands of the State; it is the most doubtful, the most slippery, and the most hopeless to be undertaken by anybody, except by those who watch every detail under the influence of the motives that secure success in industry—namely, the desire and the earnest intention of the profitable application of every resource. I want to know whether it is a very easy thing, even for private persons, to make this land reclamation—to take large tracks of unreclaimed land, and parcel them out in lots, and to find the people and put them upon the holdings, and, having done that, to supply them with money for the purpose of effecting the reclamation? The last considerable attempt at reclamation that I have heard of—in fact, the only one that I have heard of of late—is going on now in the hands of a landlord in the North of Scotland. It is universally acknowledged to be most creditable to the person who has it in hand; but I am sorry to say that every account that reaches me is to the effect that, in a pecuniary sense, the operation has been a mistake. Successful reclamations of land has never been made by the State—hardly in any case, indeed, has the State attempted it—but, speaking generally, the successful reclamations are not even those made by the landlords. They are made by the tenants, in a great degree, on their own responsibility, by the application of labour at times when their energies are not otherwise profitably at work. The successful reclamations are made in the same way that cottage gardens are made profitable, by the economization of the labour of the various members of the family when not employed in other ways, by the application to the land of the most thrifty principles of good cultivation. It is now proposed that it should be undertaken wholesale by the worst of all agents—namely, the State, and by the very worst of all methods—namely, that of finding all the money and committing the execution of the plans to persons who, after all, can have but a very imperfect acquaintance with the subject. Under these circumstances, hon. Gentlemen will not be surprised when I repeat what I have said as to what we believe to be the limited power of the Government for the purpose of carrying out such a plan as this, and when I say that the declarations of the Government on the subject are final and absolute.

DR. LYONS said, he appealed to his hon. Friends, after the very full discussion which had now taken place, that they should permit the Amendment to go to a division. The Prime Minister—and he said it with all respect—had not approached the consideration of the subject from the most friendly point of view, and he did not seem to think the matter was capable of being put before the Committee in any other aspect than that in which he had considered it. After the protracted debate which had now taken place on the subject, it appeared to him that no good practical result would follow from continuing the discussion at the expense of the other important portions of the Bill which were to follow. He had not heard a single argument from any hon. or right hon. Gentleman to in the slightest degree weaken his faith in this proposal; and he ventured confidently to predict that this was a proposal which, if it were rejected now, would be very often heard of again in the course of the next two or three years in the shape of amending Bills to the measure now before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman had made some reference to an accumulation of land in mortmain; but he would point out that this argument had no application whatever, because it was not contemplated in this scheme that the Land Commission should be for any lengthened period in possession of the land. The Commission would merely be transferers of the land, when purchased, to those individuals who were to carry out the reclamation. And, with regard to the necessity for agents going round the country inviting persons to come and occupy plots that were parcelled out, there was such a recognized demand on the part of people in crowded districts for fresh fields to go to within the limits of Ireland that he did not believe it would be necessary to use agents, but that a mere advertisement, stating that such-and-such lands were to be let would be sufficient to call forth innumerable demands for allotments from all parts of the country. The right hon. Gentleman had not alluded to an experiment in the matter of reclamation which was made some years ago by the Government, and yet that experiment fortified this proposal very materially. This experiment was an extensive system of reclamation which took place in the county of Cork on lands at King William's Town. The Government, at a time of great depression, undertook the reclamation of a large tract of land. Allotments subsequently were sold, and the purchasers of these lands had since utilized them, and, in many instances, had re-sold them out at enormous profit. As he had no doubt that this subject would arise again before long, and as they had had a very full discussion of the question, he would ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to allow the Amendment to go to a division.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that, as one of the 550 English and Scotch Members who had taken no very active part in this particular discussion, he should be grateful if the Committee would allow him to say a few words. In the first place, he was not altogether in favour of the Amendment as it stood. At the present time, he should not be disposed to support any Amendment which involved the compulsory acquisition of land from the landlord; and he should, therefore, propose to amend the Amendment by inserting the words "with the consent of the owner." Further than this, he would propose that it should be stated that the land should not be sub-divided into allotments of less than 30 acres each. Having said this, he must say that he heard with great surprise the speech from the Prime Minister, or that part of his elaborate argument which was against the reclamation of land altogether. When he heard the right hon. Gentleman expressing these views, he could not help asking himself why was this clause inserted in the Bill at all. The Government gave powers for the reclamation of land; therefore, he considered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman hardly in accordance with the terms of his own Bill, nor did he think the right hon. Gentleman altogether understood the scheme proposed. As he (Mr. Chaplin) understood it, the object of the Amendment was that money should be advanced to private individuals for the purpose of reclaiming this land. The reclamation was not to be carried out by the State. The right hon. Gentleman said it could only be carried out successfully by private enterprise and by careful attention to minute details; but that, it seemed to him, was really the intention of this proposal. Private people would carry out the enterprise, but they would be assisted by money from the Treasury, and he therefore could not see any great weight in the objection taken to the Amendment by the right hon. Gentleman, more especially when he remembered what they had already done in this Bill. There was one objection which he should have thought would have had some weight on that (the Conservative) side of the House—namely, that there would be no security for the money invested; but, if so, what became of the arguments as to the value of the tenant's right and occupancy which was to be security for all sorts of advances? In Heaven's name what was to be the security for the landlord's rent? It was said that the scheme could not possibly pay, and that the Government could not be responsible for advancing the money of the State. But why was this objection raised for the first time now? They had now to advance large sums of money from the State for the purpose of buying estates, in order that they might be re-sold to the tenant, and it was doubtful whether that daring proposal would be a success. He was ready to give a fair trial to the scheme of the Proprietary Clauses of the Bill, not because he thought they would pay, but because he attached great social and political importance to the scheme. What were these holdings? He would read one or two statements from the Report of the Special Commissioner of Agriculture. The Commissioner spoke of a table which, he said, showed that they had 100,000 holdings, not one of which exceeded 30 acres; that they had 300,000, not one of which exceeded 15 acres; and 130,000, not one of which exceeded 5 acres; and these were the holdings which they were about to advance the money of the State to enable the tenants to purchase, and that in the face of evidence given before the Commission, that even if these holdings were rent free no one could possibly secure a decent living on them. If they were prepared to make such an advance on security which they had had in evidence was insufficient, why should they be alarmed by the proposal of the hon. Gentleman opposite? This proposal which dealt with reclamation and emigration was free, at all events, from one objection that attached to the Proprietary Clauses of the Bill. Thus they were going to make the tenants owners of their holdings, whether they were little or great, or whether it were possible for them to obtain a livelihood on them or not. They had the matter under their own control, and in acquiring the land and dividing it they could cut it up in such portions as they thought fit, and in such portions as would enable the people to obtain a decent livelihood upon it. And what were the arguments in favour of this proposal? After all, they must remember that the great difficulty they had to deal with in Ireland was this, that in certain parts of the country—and it was impossible for Irish Members to deny it—people were crowded together, and as long as they continued in their present state no one could expect any real or permanent improvement in their condition. An hon. Member said on the previous night that the discussion of this question was a mere interference with the onward and proper progress of the measure, and that this Amendment was entirely beyond the scope of the Bill; but surely that must depend upon what the hon. Member's opinion of the scope of the Bill was. What was the scope of the Bill? As he understood it, the Bill was intended to mitigate, in some degree, the miseries of the people of Ireland. What did they consist of? Every authority was agreed who had ever spoken on the subject, that in the West of Ireland the state of things he had described was such as to render any real improvement in the country impossible as long as the people remained as they were. ["Divide!"] He was sorry to trespass on the time of the Committee, but he had always regarded this as one of the most important questions in connection with the Bill. Would the Committee allow him to refer them to the evidence not only of the majority Report of the Duke of Richmond's Commission, but also of the minority Report? Both of these Reports were agreed, after a large amount of evidence which had been taken, as to what lay at the root of all this trouble in Ireland. The majority attributed the miseries of Ireland to excessive competitions for rent. The Commissioners said, apart from the land, there were few if any other means of subsistence for the population, and that serious abuse had been the result. Other causes of the distress were said to be unreasonable desire for tenant right, arbitrary increase of rent, overcrowding in certain districts, and minute sub-division of farms. There was nothing in the present Bill to remove or mitigate in the slightest degree that which they had before them as the main cause for the distress in Ireland. ["Question!"] If the distress in Ireland was not the question, he should like to know what was. With regard to the minority Report of the Commission, they stated that amongst the causes capable of removal or mitigation by legislation the most important was the extreme smallness of many of the agricultural holdings, and the overcrowding of the population where the land was poor, and where occupiers often depended for a livelihood on occupation in Great Britain during a portion of the year. But what did the Report say as to the remedy? It offered a great many other remedies, he admitted, but it said the Commissioners believed that an effort should be made to relieve by State intervention the over-populated districts. This was the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman's own Friends; but notwithstanding all the evidence they had had on this point, the Prime Minister thought fit in his discretion to get up and tell the Committee at an early stage in the discussion that his decision was final and absolute. Whether it was final and absolute or not, he (Mr. Chaplin) hoped before the Bill left the House that the Government would be induced to entertain a different opinion. He very much regretted the attitude the Government had taken upon this matter, more especially because they were resolved to do nothing with regard to migration. If they had not included in their Bill anything with regard to providing other means of employment for the people of Ireland, they had only one resource before them for remedying the condition of the people. Every particle of evidence he had heard on the subject was agreed on this—that the starting point of all in remedying the condition of the people of Ireland should be that of removing them from these crowded districts where it was impossible that they could live in comfort or decency. If they did not adopt measures for migration, they must resort to emigration; and he should be sorry to see emigration treated as the sole resort in this state of things. The least they could have expected from the Government was that they would have adopted such measures in this Bill as would have given to these poor people the choice between migration and emigration. If they had done this, they would have done something that he thought they had failed to do up to the present time—namely, something to permanently alleviate distress in Ireland.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would not delay the Committee very long; but he thought he had some right to speak on this matter, inasmuch as he had the double qualification which had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman. In the first place, he wished to make the local bodies responsible for some of this money which was to be advanced; and he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that on the previous night he asked a question upon this point. There were a large majority of the Irish Party in favour of making the local authorities responsible for part of the money, and he was one of that majority. The other qualification he possessed was this—that he was one of those Members who had voted against the expenditure on the Afghan War. No one had voted more consistently against that expenditure than he had done. Well, hon. Members had been told that they ought to be very grateful for this Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: I said nothing of the kind.

MAJOR NOLAN: Well, the Prime Minister complained of our ingratitude.

MR. GLADSTONE: I simply said, as a matter of fact, with reference to what the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had said, that he had never used one syllable of gratitude and acknowledgment to the framers of the Bill.

MAJOR NOLAN said, he would like to ask what the Irish Members had to be grateful for? He was grateful to the right hon. Gentleman himself, because he had done so much, individually, in pressing the Bill on the House of Commons, and on a large portion of the Liberal Party. But they were asked more than this—to be thankful to the House of Commons. Why should they be grateful to the House of Commons—it must either be for their time or for their money? Well, he acknowledged that it had given a great deal of its time; but they could not be thankful to it for that, because they would, unfortunately, prefer to discuss the question in a Parliament of their own in Dublin. Even if the British House of Commons gave half its time to Ireland—and that, of course, would be out of proportion to the relative importance of the country—it would not be too much. As to their being thankful for any money, it had yet to be made out that money would be given to Ireland under this measure. In one portion of the Bill the money referred to was to be paid out of the Irish Church Fund, which was an entirely Irish fund. The money referred to in another part of the Bill was to be borrowed at 3½ per cent, and he had been reminded that money in a similar way had been lent to Birmingham at 3½ per cent. Therefore, he thought the right hon. Gentleman had taken every care of the Exchequer, and he did not see what the Irish Members had to be grateful for. Their great case was that the contributions of Ireland towards the Imperial Exchequer amounted to £8,000,000 a-year, while only £5,000,000 were spent in Ireland. There was, therefore, a surplus of £3,000,000 a-year; and he did not think there was any room for an extravagant display of gratitude if they asked for a small portion of that surplus. He would not enter into an argument with the Prime Minister as to whether or not land could be reclaimed, but would merely say this—that he had gone into the interior of Connemara with Professor Baldwin, and in the course of his journey he found that whilst five or six miles from the sea there was no population at all, or none to speak of, when they got within a quarter of a mile of the coast it was congested. Professor Baldwin had pointed out several districts which could be profitably reclaimed, but who was to do it? The tenants could not. They could not expect the landlord to reclaim small patches; indeed, they could not ask him to send a few tenants into the middle of his fishing or shooting district in order to reclaim a piece of land. No doubt, it would pay him to send 1,000 families there; but, in order to do that, he would have to expend a great deal of money, and he would require very substantial assistance. Then, again, the tenants themselves would have to be shown how to reclaim land, and that also would require that assistance should be given by the State. It seemed to him that the Amendment was very fairly drawn, and he would give it his most hearty support. He really thought the Bill would fail to satisfy many large and poor districts in Ireland, unless something were done for the reclamation of the land. He had only mentioned one district in Connemara, but he was sure there were 20 such in Ireland.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, that, as he had had a good deal of personal experience in the matter of reclamation, having himself reclaimed between 200 and 300 acres, and having a number of tenants on his property who had reclaimed mountain land, and had done very well on it, he hoped the Committee would forgive him, and not think he was trespassing unduly on its patience, if he gave them the result of his observations. The land he himself had reclaimed was in a mountainous district, and was not selected by any means because it promised a favourable result. It had been selected because it was a place where employment was greatly needed. When the operations were commenced he was assured that the work would never pay; but, at any rate, reclamation had been effected. Two hundred acres had been sub-soiled and 50 acres of the land had been placed under crop. The soil was light and porous, and it had been so stony that the country people had given it the name of "the mother of stones." The stones were got out of it, and oats, turnips, and potatoes were sown. At the present moment these crops were most promising, particularly the potato crop. Though he had not been able himself to go over and see it, yet he had been assured that it was one of the finest potato crops in that part of the country. The value of the land had been raised from 2s. to 10s. or 12s. an acre. The food-producing power of the country had been increased; employment for something like 200 men and their families had been provided; these people had been kept off the rates for 18 months; and though the financial result to himself might not be very brilliant, still he should not lose by the experiment. He would put it to the Committee whether this work had not been worth doing? They must not look merely at financial results, but consider the gain to the nation by increasing the food-producing power of the country and its capacity to support an increased population. On a part of his property the tenants had within living memory made reclamations from the wild mountainside, and they were now doing well on their farms. They were not only producing plenty of food for themselves and their families, but, by their surplus production, they had been enabled to put by money enough to give good dowries to their daughters; and in several instances which had come under his observation they had saved enough money to enable them to buy new farms in more favourably situated lowland districts. He hoped the Committee would excuse him for having delayed them with these observations; but he thought that, as he had had some personal experience in the matter, he might be allowed to take part in the debate. His experience was that the landlord might reclaim waste land without loss, but that the tenant, with some little assistance, could reclaim it at one-half the cost.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, the speech of the Prime Minister very much impressed him, and had rather altered his (Mr. O'Connor's) view on the question. But, after all, he thought they were disagreeing more about words than about realities; and it would seem that there was not so much difference between the Prime Minister and them as at first sight appeared. He thought that it would be seen that it was possible for them to adopt a compromise on this question. They were all agreed that some of the holdings were so small that it would be advisable that they should be enlarged in some way or other. They were also agreed on the point that the tenants should be afforded facilities for enlarging their holdings, by having land to reclaim, because the Prime Minister had brought in a subsection which really admitted that principle. But the point where they began to disagree was as to whether there was power existing to give the tenants this land to reclaim. What Irish Members asked was this—Would the Government give the Commission authority to advance money to the tenants to reclaim? If the Prime Minister would consent to give the Commission power to take reclaimable land in order to give it to the tenants, the whole question of dispute between the Prime Minister and the Irish Members fell to the ground. They were not asking the State to take any burden upon its shoulders; they were simply asking it to give the labourer the opportunity of reclaiming the land. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) raised the question in a more convenient form; and he could not think the Prime Minister could have any objection to it. Therefore, he would suggest that the Amendment they were now discussing should be withdrawn.

MR. PARNELL said, that after having occupied so much time on this discussion it would be a pity if it were not possible for both sides of the House to come together, and to arrive at some practical result. He was struck by the force of the Prime Minister's objection that the work which the hon. Member for the City of Dublin wished to place on the Commission was not work for which the Commission was fitted, and that it would require a great deal of local inspection throughout all parts of the country from time to time—in fact, constant supervision. ["No, no!"] Undoubtedly, this would be so. These works of improvement and reclamation would have to be superintended in every district where they were set on foot; and it was possible that neither the Commission nor the Board of Works would be capable of carrying out that supervision. But supposing they were to give to Boards of Guardians in Ireland the same power that they gave under this clause to the public Companies, they would meet all the necessities of the case, and they should require that this was essentially a work of Poor Law relief. It had acquired its prominence in this Bill because of the sufferings of the 50,000 or 100,000 small tenants in Ireland. What would be the prospect of these small holders of whom Professor Baldwin said—

“There are 50,000 in five or six of the Western and North-Western Irish counties who cannot live on their holdings unless they are weeded out and transferred to some other place.”

He did not say that the Bill as it stood would not give them some relief. No doubt, the rent clause would reduce many of their sufferings to some extent, and in some cases to a large extent; and undoubtedly the project for the settlement of arrears which the Chief Secretary placed on the Notice Paper would favourably affect some of these poor people for a time. But it would only be while the three or four or five or six good seasons were lasting, and on a recurrence of the bad seasons they would be confronted with the same difficulty with which they were confronted in 1879 and 1880. Who, he would ask, were the people who created this land movement, which had cost some £5,000,000 or £6,000,000 to keep in check, and of which, perhaps, they had not yet seen the end. It had been the small cottier tenants according to the evidence of their own Commission appointed to inquire into the subject—the small cottier tenants who were concerned in the meeting at Irish Town in 1879. It was the cottier tenants who kept alive that agitation, and spread it into the county of Galway, the county of Sligo, and partly into the county of Donegal. In the course of the following year the tenants in the rest of Ireland, the better-off tenants, took up the movement, and brought it into the position it now occupied. But it was the poor tenants who started it; and if the Government supposed they were settling the Land Question while they left 100,000 of the people of Ireland living in pig-sties, where it was impossible for them to obtain any subsistence, they were reckoning without their host. It was, therefore, worth while on the part of the Committee to devote a little more time to see whether they could not devise some practical plan for the purpose of settling this very difficult problem. He did not ask the Prime Minister to agree to the suggestion he might now make, after listening to the course of the debate; but he would ask him if he would not reconsider, in the light this debate had thrown on the matter, the question of what should be done for these small tenants in the West of Ireland. If the Prime Minister would consider the matter between now and the time when the new clauses would be moved later on, before the Bill left the Committee, he was sure his hon. Friend would not think it necessary to take a division on the present Amendment, especially as that Amendment was undoubtedly open to some objection in point of detail. The duties placed on the Commission were not the duties they expected when some of them were placing Amendments on the Paper. The matter was one for careful consideration; and, looking at the shape which this Bill had now assumed, he thought there might be a general agreement to a clause which might be accepted by the Government—something which would give these poor people some hope of being able to live in their own country. If this hope was not extended to them there would be nothing left to the cottier tenants but the Emigration Clause of the Bill. He did not mean to say it would be necessary to emigrate the people in the first year, for he admitted to the full extent that the Bill would give them some relief; but he would ask the Committee not to wait until they were driven by the emergency of coming famine, or bad seasons, into attempts at hasty and ill-considered legislation for relieving the people. He had drafted an Amendment between last night and the present moment which he thought would be satisfactory, and which he would indicate to the Committee. He would not move it now after the length to which the debate had gone; and, in view of the statement he made last night when asking that Progress should be reported, he felt himself even precluded from bringing it on without the consent of the Government. The Amendment was to the effect that the Treasury should authorize the Board of Works to advance, from time to time, any moneys in their hands to Boards of Guardians, on the security of the rates, for purposes of reclamation, or any other agricultural improvements; and that the Boards of Guardians to whom such advances were made might purchase such lots of land as they thought desirable, and sell or let them. The rates of the Unions were fully sufficient to meet any advances that might be made. As to baronial courts, they were not representative, but the Boards of Guardians were; and he trusted that in the progress of legislation they would be rendered still more representative than they were at present. It would then be the fault of the local bodies if they did not do their duty with regard to these small holders. No loss and no risk, when the security of the rates were given, could attach to the British Exchequer. He did not wish to delay the Committee in coming to any decision they might wish to come to on the Amendment of his hon. Friend. He would suggest to him that if they obtained some further consideration of this complicated question, this debate would not have been thrown away, and that he might, under the circumstances, withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GLADSTONE: If the hon. Member will be good enough to put the clause on the Notice Paper, I will bring it under the consideration of my Colleagues. It is, no doubt, a most important question.

MR. SHAW doubted very much whether they could impose such duties as these upon Boards of Guardians at ordinary times. No doubt, last year they imposed some exceptional duties upon Boards of Guardians; but then it must be borne in mind that the time was one of very great distress. He doubted whether it would be wise to put this burden upon them now. There would, however, be ample time to discuss the proposal when it was formally before them. He hoped they would now allow the discussion to end, and, no doubt, before the Report, they would be able to agree to some clause dealing with that part of the question. The Government had given power to the Board of Works to make advances to Companies, which might not mean speculative Companies; and they had given further powers to the Board of Works to make advances to occupiers, which were most important, and which, in fact, he looked upon as the most important part of the Bill. The hon. Member for the City of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) said they should give the Land Commission power to take these waste lands; but he (Mr. Shaw) clearly saw the difficulty which the Government found in giving any Commission the power of taking large tracts of waste lands, or unreclaimed lands, and dividing them into holdings and putting tenants upon the plots for the purpose of carrying out reclamation. It would be one of the most difficult things which the Government could undertake; but, at the same time, he thought that the boundaries of the small tenants should be enlarged, so that the 10 acre men might, in a very short time, and at a very small outlay, become 50 acre men.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I agree very much with the Committee with regard to the great, the very great, interest that attaches to this subject, and, at the same time, the great difficulty of this question; and I would add this remark, that—in proportion as this question is enlarging, so it is the more necessary that we should take great care what we do in regard to it. The very natural interest and desire which everyone feels to enlarge, as far as possible, the field of profitable cultivation in Ireland may very often induce much too sanguine expectations, and may lead us to embark in schemes which, after all, are doomed from the beginning to disappointment. Therefore, I think it very unwise to plunge into anything of this kind without considering how far it would answer. The proposal in the Bill with regard to Companies is a very simple proposal, and the readiness which, I think, has been expressed by the Government to consider whether they can go further in this matter is a symptom which ought to induce the Committee, and those specially interested in the object in view, not to press the Government too hard, but to give the Government the opportunity of carefully considering and adjusting such proposals as they think it possible to bring forward. I think that we should be acting rashly, not only in the interests of the Exchequer, but in the interests of Ireland, if we were to press the Government to undertake schemes which, after all, are not properly devised and matured. It is a very dangerous thing to encourage people to believe that by advancing money, or by any other way, you can turn their plot of land, which may be a very bad one, into a very profitable holding. No doubt, there are parts of Ireland where a great deal has been done by such men as the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), and the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart), and others, in the way of increasing and developing the holdings of the tenantry; but those are Gentlemen who know what they are about, and I think that undertakings of this sort ought not to be entered upon without very great care. I trust that the interesting discussion that we have had will not be without its effects, and that before we finally settle the matter something further may be done.

MR. BARRAN said, that knowing that this Bill would come before the House this Session, he spent the Autumn Vacation in going through those districts in Ireland which had been described as congested with population. Amongst other places he visited the neighbourhood of Ballycroy, where there were great reclamation works in operation. A considerable quantity of waste land was taken by a priest on a long lease, and handed over in plots to a number of tenants. The people had gone to work upon it, and had reclaimed it, and their efforts had been crowned with signal success. He had been assured on all hands by persons best qualified to judge that there were many thousands of acres of land in Ireland that could be profitably reclaimed just as the land he had referred to had been. In his journey in the neighbourhood of Glengariff he met with a magistrate, who told him that if he would just walk along with him to the top of the hill he would show him 10,000 acres of land, none of it more than 600 feet above the level of the sea, and all of which would pay for reclamation, although, in its present condition, it was not worth 2s. 6d. per acre fee simple. Said that gentleman—"The only thing that can at all stand in the way of this reclamation would be the question of cost." Now, this was a large and comprehensive Bill, and they all rejoiced that the Prime Minister had been able to meet the demands of both that and the other side of the House. But he was sure that unless this Reclamation Clause was made so as to comprehend pretty nearly that which had been indicated by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) they would not by any means get over their difficulties. In the West of Ireland the normal condition of the people was very bad. They had a large population that depended largely for its subsistence upon the result of labour performed in England, Scotland, and Wales. The improvements introduced in the last few years in connection with agricultural pursuits in those counties had diminished very largely the demand for labour from the West of Ireland, and therefore those poor people had not the same means of subsistence that they had in the past. If by any possibility the Prime Minister could provide for the employment of this congested population, he felt satisfied that it would be one of the most acceptable provisions of the Bill in the minds and hearts of the Irish people. He did hope that something would be done, and he spoke on behalf of his own constituents in this matter, when he ventured to say that if a sacrifice was to be made for the promotion of the well-being of these people they would very much rather make a sacrifice in the direction that he now indicated, than for the purpose of continuing the measures they had had to take for the purpose of preserving the peace of Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR said, he understood the hon. Gentleman to withdraw his Amendment for the reason that if it was negatived it might be subsequently held that some other proposition that the Government might be prepared to agree to could not be entertained.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he fully expected the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment would, after what had been said, withdraw it. ["No, no!"] Well, if the hon. Member did not consent to withdraw it, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) should have either to negative or vote against it. What he wanted was to get something done, and he did not wish to see the Amendment put for the sake of having a large majority against it.

Amendment negatived.

MR. MACFARLANE said, the next Amendment on the Paper was in his name; but as it had been suggested to him that it would be better for him not to move it, he should not ask the Committee to consider it.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Emigration).

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL moved, in page 18. line 12, at beginning, insert—

“On obtaining sufficient security for the repayment of moneys advanced under this section.”

If the Government were going to persevere with this clause it was extremely desirable that it should be put upon a safe footing, and that the public money should not be advanced without sufficient security. In that view he had placed an Amendment on the Paper, because he had some doubt whether, as the clause stood, there was sufficient security for the repayment of moneys advanced to Canada, or the Colonies, or to Companies. He was very distrustful of a scheme which would seem to advance money to the Government of Canada, and for two or three reasons. It seemed to him that considering the peculiar relations which existed between this country and Canada that money should not be advanced by this country without security. Great complications might arise between this country and Canada, and we might have great difficulty in getting back our money. He confessed to a sort of prejudice which he entertained with regard to advances in Canada, and this had been a good deal caused by what seemed to him an unreasonable scheme by the Government of Canada. The Government of Canada wanted to fill up their waste lands and to dispose of them, and they had a proposition with regard to emigration that this country, at our sole risk and charge, should advance money for emigration to Canada, and not only to advance, but to guarantee the Government of Canada from any loss which might result from the turning of the emigrants into paupers. The Government of Canada had been long anxious to get rid of their waste lands, and they had sent advertisements to this country to get rid of them; but they were not willing to contribute to the expense themselves. For that reason he feared that very considerable complication would arise if they advanced money to Canada without any specific security. He was also apprehensive that this might give rise to a great deal of land jobbing. They knew that British Colonists, when they were not checked by the Mother Country, indulged in land jobbing. The Americans adopted a very much wiser course, for they never allowed Colonists to dispose of their waste lands. No doubt latterly, to promote railways, large grants of land had been made, and this had led to land jobbing. He believed that very great land jobbing was now going on in Canada, and large tracts of Manitoba were granted on easy terms. There was another reason why they should not advance money for emigration to Canada. He was in the West of Ireland last autumn, and he must say that of all the nations of Europe they were the most unfitted to emigrate. What were they to expect from people living in those miserable cabins that they were only able to live in, because the summers and winters were mild. How were they to expect those people, who hitherto had not shown over much energy, to go through the seven months of severe winter in Manitoba? He confessed that he had doubts as to whether they would succeed. In Minnesota the Scandinavians, Norwegians, and Swedes, who were accustomed to work and who had indomitable perseverance, had got on with considerable success. It was only the best of the Irish people who could succeed there. Therefore, he very much distrusted the proposal of allowing the Government of Canada to have the people of the West of Ireland. He did not feel disposed to press the Amendment if the Government did not accept it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 12, before the first word “The,” to insert the words “On obtaining sufficient security for the repayment of moneys advanced under this section.”—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. NORTHCOTE said, he had no objection to the insertion of the words of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. The reason he had risen was because he was connected with Companies in Manitoba and Minnesota owning altogether some 30,000,000 acres, and after the insinuation and the charge which the hon. Member had made with regard to land jobbing by people in the North West, he thought it was due to the gentlemen with whom he was associated to say that they on their part would certainly not be guilty of anything in the nature of land jobbing; and when he told the Committee that they sold their land at the price of 5s. per acre, the fact of so much land being in the market at that rate did not afford very general scope for land jobbing. He should like to say one word upon the Emigration Clause; and, speaking for himself, he should be very sorry if the Government Land Bill suggested emigration as the sole remedy for distress. He certainly thought that it would not be a statesmanlike act at all if they found no other remedy for Irish distress than by taking people out of the country. He hoped that hon. Gentlemen from Ireland would not continue their hostility to this clause to the bitter end, because this clause was really in the nature of an alternative. By another part of the Bill which they had just been discussing, the option was given to the Irish tenant to stay at home and cultivate those reclaimable lands, of which it was stated, and of which he entertained no doubt, that there were many thousands, or perhaps millions, of acres in Ireland. But he could not see why hon. Gentlemen could entertain any objection to the alternative being offered to the labourer if he wished to transfer his labour to another country. It was merely an alternative; and, certainly, even if it were possible to enforce or compel emigration, he did not suppose that any British Government would attempt to force people to emigrate. There was one remark which the hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir George Campbell) made in which he agreed to a very considerable extent, and that was in the warning which he addressed to Her Majesty's Government, that they should not send out the extreme paupers—the very poor Irish, who, perhaps, had not been accustomed to work, but who had picked up a living as they could—and ship them off bodily without making any provision for them, because they might perish in the undoubtedly somewhat severe climate of Manitoba. He thought that it would be very necessary indeed that in advances under those clauses Her Majesty's Government should take great care to use every precaution to ascertain that proper steps and proper arrangements would be made when they reached the other side for the receiving of them in any part of Canada to which they might be going. As a matter of fact, the hon. Gentleman (Sir George Campbell) had somewhat over-coloured his statement, because he himself was connected with a Company in Minnesota in which there was a considerable number of Irish emigrants; and although it was quite true that they did not thrive so well, or earn such high wages as Scandinavians, he was informed that their position was improving every year, and was materially better than it was in their own country. He wished to say one word on the general question of emigration. He thought it was very important indeed that, in any steps which the Government took, they should provide as far as possible, not merely for the emigration of young men and young women, but for assisting the emigration of whole families or districts. It seemed to him that the reason was very obvious, and it was very desirable that the natural pang of leaving their native land should be in every way possible softened; and he could see no readier way of softening that pang than by having their parents, or neighbours and friends going to a more prosperous clime to renew the old associations of youth. Although it might not be, economically, the most prudent thing to do, on political grounds he thought it was most desirable that families, or districts even, should be assisted to emigrate; and he must confess that he should be very glad indeed if the native pastors could be induced to accompany them. It was said that emigration should be discountenanced on account of the commercial loss to the country. Although it was quite possible that the value of an emigrant to Canada or the United States might be £100, more or less, that did not at all represent his value to the country which he left, because in Ireland a man who had to live on charity was of no commercial value. He begged to thank the Committee for having heard him. He only got up on account of the charge made by the hon. Gentleman opposite, which he was very anxious to disclaim on behalf of those with whom he was connected. He should give this clause his most cordial support, and he trusted that most beneficial results would flow from it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that I am not keeping hon. Members closely to the Amendments, because there are only two or three Amendments to the whole clause, and they all involve similar principles, and if I were to be as strict as usual we should have the discussion too prolonged.

MR. RATHBONE had not hitherto said a word on this subject. He wished very much to appeal to the Irish Members in the House with whom he had so often acted. He had been interested and actually engaged in the relief of Irish distress from 1847 to the present time. And he ventured to say, in looking back, that no money that he had spent or seen spent, and no labour that had been given, had, to his mind, produced more permanent and real good, both to the labourer on whom it was spent, the country from which they were sent, and the country to which they went, than the money which was spent judiciously and carefully in emigration. He appealed to Irish Members not to oppose this system of emigration, but to insist that proper regulations should be adopted, and care taken, in order that it might be of benefit to Ireland. He entirely agreed with the opposition that had been raised by Catholic priests and by religious men of all denominations against a certain kind of emigration that had gone forward. The poor Irishman was taken from his country, where he had been half-starved, and he was put into a large town in America, where he had high wages and cheap spirits. It was not in human nature that a man should not lose both his morality and his religion under such circumstances; and he considered that the pastors were perfectly right in opposing emigration so long as it took that form. There was a great deal of attention being given to the subject of emigration; and some of the best Irishmen, though they differed from him in politics, would be willing to follow the leadership of Mr. Kavanagh to establish a system of emigration in which the religious pastors of those who emigrated should either accompany their emigrants, or that provision should be made on the shores of America against their being exposed to the dreadful peril both to their religion and morality. Surely, when they looked at the state of the Irish people at home and in America, there would not be an Irish Member who would not join in trying to remedy the evil that existed. In Liverpool, during the last Famine, they sent the best men they could find to investigate how they could be most useful. They sent them to Galway and Donegal and other parts, and they were accompanied by one of the ablest men he knew—Father Nugent, a Catholic priest in Liverpool. What did those men report? They said they could save the people from suffering by emigration; but if they gave them the whole land of Donegal they could not live decently. Under their advice, and out of the fund which Father Nugent had collected, they sent 800 people from Donegal and the neighbourhood to America. They were consigned to the charge of the Bishop of the district, and these poor fellows, from starvation in Donegal, found a house and 160 acres of land, with a guarantee of a dollar a day until their crops were ready. Did they wish to stop these poor fellows going from where they were poor and a source of poverty to others to a country where they would be rich, and a source of riches, and where they would be in the charge of those very pastors to whom they were so much attached. He appealed to Irish Members not to stop this beneficent work, but to aid them in taking care that they should so act that the men's bodies as well as their souls should be benefited.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had carefully looked at this clause, and it certainly was one which had astonished him; for a more imperfect and worse-drawn clause he had never read. It described nothing. It did not tell them what was to be done. There was no scheme of emigration, which was the one thing that everybody had looked to for the salvation of the Western portions of Ireland. They had a right to ask the Government whether behind this clause they had not got some scheme; and he would ask the Chief Secretary, or the Prime Minister, or anyone of the Government who had studied this question, what the scheme was by which emigration was to be conducted for relieving the Western portions of Ireland from that chronic state of semi-starvation which always existed there, because without it the Bill would do no good whatever. He was not going into the question; but he would state that there was not one Irishman who would deny that the greatest relief that could be conferred upon Ireland would be that some hundreds of thousands of people in the Western portions of Ireland should be placed elsewhere than on those farms where they now were. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had stated that there were over 250,000 tenants holding farms of less than four acres, on which it was impossible for them to live. What were they going to do with these people? The Government of Canada and other Governments would take nobody but able-bodied men and able-bodied women; they were not going to take families who would go out there and be of no use to them. What they had got to do was to have a proper and well-constituted Emigration Board, who would be able to overlook the districts, and be guided by circumstances as to who should emigrate, and then consolidate the holdings, so that the people might be able to live on them. They ought not to pass this clause now without having come to some determination that it should be a clause for the purposes for which it was intended—namely, the relief of that ever-growing distress which they found continuously amounting almost to perpetual famine in the Western portions of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman would not attempt to deny it, or for one moment admit, that this clause contained all that was necessary. It seemed to him that this clause was an after-thought and a makeshift. There was no scheme of emigration, and there really ought to be a definite scheme, showing what ought to be done. Until this was accomplished by the Government, they would have done but little to stay those dangers which would be perpetual, and would be ever recurring.

MR. GLADSTONE: Undoubtedly the clause contains no scheme of emigration, and I do not think that it ought to contain a scheme of emigration. I do not think that the Government ought to undertake the management and promotion of a scheme of emigration for Ireland; and, therefore, I do distinctly intimate to the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that, so far as his ideas go, we are not prepared to carry them out, except to a very limited extent. Not that we are not able to enter into them at all, because I am prepared to admit that there are words to be put into this clause, and such words as my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Rathbone) has suggested. They are a development of the words in the clause already; but I do not hesitate to say they are a development which may be necessary. A portion of the clause declares that the agreements shall be made with the concurrence of the Treasury. And the Commission on such agreements shall contain provisions relative to the mode of the application of the loans, and securing the repayment thereof to the Commission, and for other purposes. Under the words "application of the loans," and under the words, "and for other purposes," the intention is to convey that the Commission is not to look simply to the fact that certain solvent and capable bodies, whether they be Governments or whether they be Companies, are about to undertake the transport of emigrants over the sea, but that the Commission is to be responsible for the propriety, morality, and generally satisfactory conduct of these arrangements. To that extent the clause is intended to go—beyond that extent it is not intended to go; and I should, for one, and the Government would distinctly object to any scheme which would unquestionably give to the people of Ireland the notion—perhaps the more than plausible notion—that the Government entertained plans and desires of something like the depopulation of that country. On that point I have only to say that we consider that the securing the interests of the emigrants to be within the proper purview of the Commission. With regard to the Amendment before us, I own that I do not see any necessity for it. I think that if my hon. Friend will examine the clause more closely, he will find that the clause gives power to the Commission to make provisions relative to the maintenance of the loan as well as its application and securing repayment of the loan, and has no reference at all to the transactions with Companies or with the Governments. I have no objection at all in principle to his words, nor do I think that they will do any harm; but I believe that they are provided for in the clause as it stands. As to the clause generally, I need not describe it more particularly than I did last night. I think I may say a word as to the spirit in which the Government have introduced this clause. They did not think themselves justified in entirely overlooking emigration, and they did it with the intention which I have again signified of carefully listening and allowing very great weight to the deliberate expression of the judgment and opinions of the generality of Irish Members without distinction of Party or section. What we want is a reasonable expression of opinion by those who certainly have, upon the whole, a greater capacity to judge than we possess on this subject. One hon. Member said that the Canadian Government would not be disposed to take anyone but able-bodied persons. Now, upon that subject, I entirely concur with what has been said by the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote). Emigration of this kind, if it were limited absolutely to families, would not do, because there would be cases in which a man might not have a family, and there would be some men who would not emigrate with families; but, unquestionably, we should not object to the insertion of words for the purpose of showing that the emigration of families was the principal idea. I must say that it was with great pain that I heard imputed to the Government the entertaining of some latent scheme for getting rid of the Irish people. I wish to disclaim any such thing. I must say that reason and common sense would show that, if we had no other desire in our minds than to see the people of Ireland cleared off the soil of Ireland, we might have contrived some better and some less cumbersome process than emigration. [Mr. HEALY: Buckshot.] Well, as to that expression from a single Member, I do not think that I ought to notice it. I do not know who it was gave utterance to it; but I trust that in his more sober moments he will regret having allowed such an expression to escape his lips. Sir, the sort of emigration, undoubtedly, that we supposed must arise under a clause of this kind is organized emigration. I may say highly organized emigration—emigration of the kind described by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Exeter—certainly of families, or even of labourers, in a district, and possibly of communities; and if of communities, then, probably, in no way could it be so beneficial as under the guidance or companionship and assistance of their pastors. It appears to many of us that there will be a great many faults to find, if hon. Members attempt prematurely to canvass all the several provisions of this Bill; and I do object to any assumption now as to the likelihood that a clause of this kind may operate largely or narrowly. We have endeavoured to place it so that if it does operate largely, it shall operate only in conformity with the perfectly free will of the people themselves; and every other security that can be supplied will be taken for the well-being of those who emigrate. There is one point on which I must own there is some scruple in my mind. Voluntary emigration from Ireland now is the emigration which we have no desire to promote; and I do not think it is desirable for us to promote it, but we ought not factiously to object, and there is a consideration which we ought to weigh, and upon which I should be glad to have the opinion of those better informed than myself—namely, that the intervention of the Government, and the offer of the Government to do or even assist in doing certain things, may have a certain amount of tendency to prevent private persons from applying themselves and their own resources to the doing of that thing. I do not dwell upon that matter at the present moment; but what I say is, that it is perfectly worthy of dispassionate consideration on this clause. With regard to the Government of Canada, it is certainly quite inaccurate to suppose that the efforts made by the Government of Canada, as far as they were in our knowledge, contemplate in any way that more emigration of the labourers, which hon. Gentlemen justly view with misgiving and disapproval. The language of the Government of Canada, as far as it has gone, and it has not reached anything like a matured or practical scheme, undoubtedly proceeds entirely upon the supposition, first of all, of the emigration of families; and, secondly, of the location of these families upon plots of land under a combined system which would keep them together in Canada as in Ireland. Now, Sir, with regard to the imputation of our desire to depopulate Ireland, I will speak for myself, and make the frank confession that I am not one of those who view with satisfaction the decrease in numbers of any population. I wish to see man increase and multiply upon the earth, and not to see him dwindle and pass away. It is very satisfactory to me to consider that there is no country in Europe in which greater progress towards a tolerable state of physical life, or even so great progress towards such a state, among the poorer part of the population, has been made during the last 30 years as in Ireland. But I must confess that the feeling is greatly dashed and qualified in my mind when I consider that it is accompanied by such a vast removal of the population—not a removal in the strict sense of the word, but still involuntary from its being due, in an enormous proportion, to the pressure of want, such as constitutes something like a necessity. I have a certain amount of sympathy with the jealousy of some Irish Members. I think they are right in a desire to see their own people happy at home instead of seeing them happy abroad. We are doing what we can towards making them happy at home; but in doing so we know very well what are the delays and what the obstacles to the accomplishment even of the best conducted schemes of human legislation; and, therefore, we do not feel justified in entirely shutting the door upon plans which, pending the period when the population of Ireland may be in a satisfactory condition at home, we may give a good alternative, such as is described by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Rathbone), of finding a comfort abroad which they cannot find in their own land. I think this is, upon the whole, not a very unfair view of the temper in which we have endeavoured to approach this subject. There can be no greater mistake than to suppose that we, at least, consider that this is a primary portion of the Bill, and much more would it be a mistake to suppose that it is a portion of the Bill which was intended to be a cover to the rest of the Bill. This is an important portion of the Bill; but the primary object of the Bill is to secure the people of Ireland comfort and happiness upon their own soil. This, if I may so, is the wicket-gate compared with the portal, that the emigration may be said, in our view, to supply. Upon that subject, in all its bearings, we shall be very glad to hear what may be the view of the Committee, and the view of Irish Members in particular; and certainly, as far as our knowledge goes, my hope and my expectation are that any jealousies that are entertained of the specific provision in this clause we shall succeed in disarming, and that this matter may not be the subject of painful division between those who represent Ireland and those who, from outside, desire and endeavour to promote the welfare of Ireland; and, further, that the provisions of the clause, as they require it, will receive the general and even speedy assent of all portions of the Committee.

THE O'DONOGHUE said, he could not join his hon. Friends in their opposition to the clause. He saw nothing objectionable in the proposals of the Government. Supposing this Bill was to become law, and this clause was to remain part of it, emigration would still continue to be in Ireland the same voluntary act it had hitherto been. No one had ever thought of protesting; no one could ever think of protesting against emigration when the means of emigration had been provided by the friends and relatives of the people; and he was at a loss to understand how the effect of emigration could become more injurious because the State stepped in and did that which had hitherto been done by others. Those who remitted money to their friends and relatives to enable them to emigrate had done so from a desire to take them away from want and misery to places where their lives might be spent under more agreeable conditions; and he, for one, was perfectly satisfied that Her Majesty's Government were actuated by the best of motives. [Cries of "Oh!"] No one felt more sorrow than he did when he saw the people going towards the emigrant ship; but, nevertheless, he would not feel himself justified in saying to them—"Do not go to where you will find plenty and more comfortable homes; but remain here and be half starved while I and others are trying to work out a political problem which may possibly some day afford you relief." Probably many Members of the House were Poor Law Guardians, and they must have seen men coming before their respective Boards asking for assistance; and they must have noticed how cruel and stingy the Board of Guardians were considered when they refused to grant assistance and were unwilling to give aid out of the rates by inaugurating a system which, if carried to its fullest extent, must ultimately lead to the absorption of the Union rates. He was convinced that the provisions of the Bill would only be made available by the people under the pressure of extreme necessity; and he, for one, would be sorry to deny them the relief that would be offered to them by this portion of the Bill, without being able to offer them an equivalent in the shape of migration. But as to migration, he had always looked upon it as utterly impracticable, because if they migrated the farming class they must dispossess the tenants in districts to which the removal was to take place; and if they migrated the labourers, then he ventured to say there was not a single district in Ireland which did not already possess more labourers than they were able to find employment for. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would adhere to this clause, because his conviction was that it would be regarded by the Irish people as a wise and beneficent provision.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON wished to say a few words in reply to the observations which had fallen from the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). He had recently been in Canada, and he had endeavoured, as far as possible, to ascertain the opinion of the people there in regard to the condition of the country. He had received his information from officials. Perhaps hon. Members from Ireland might think that those officials were interested in the matter; and, therefore, before stating what the official information which he had received was and expressing an opinion upon it, he would ask the Committee to give him its indulgence while he read some passages from a letter written by the son of a small Irish tenant who went out to Minnesota some time ago, and who had written to friends of his own class in Ireland.

MR. O'KELLY said, he rose for the purpose of asking for information.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is irregular unless he rises to a point of Order.

MR. O'KELLY: I only ask for information.

MR. BIGGAR rose to a point of Order. He wished to ask whether this particular clause could be introduced into a Bill of this kind, as he held it to be entirely contrary to the Preamble of the Bill. The Preamble said that this was a Bill "To further amend the Law relating to the Occupation and Ownership of Land in Ireland, and for other purposes relating thereto." He spoke with due deference; but he was of opinion that the question of emigration, and provisions of that class, had nothing whatever to do with the occupation or ownership of land in Ireland, or any other purpose appertaining thereto.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that, in the first place, there is no Preamble to the Bill at all; and, with regard to the title of the Bill, it distinctly says—"For other purposes relating thereto." The noble Lord is, therefore, perfectly in Order.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON said, that the letter to which he had referred contained the following passages:—

"I have got along pretty well; have secured a nice home for my family, and am glad to say we are happy and content, living on one of my farms, where I built a nice farm-house and offices, &c., four miles from town, in a beautiful prairie country, having abundance of game in the season. I have, at the end of the year, severed my connection with the Railway Company, and I hope to get along in future my own boss. Without exception, this is the finest country in the world for a man having energy, common sense, and brains, to come to. The only drawback is the cold, long winter. The country is fast settling up, scarcely a farm now to be had, where there were hundreds when I came here. I have managed to secure a little over 500 acres of choice land, one of my farms being situated on a beautiful river, where I can kill all the ducks and geese from my window. I have about 100 acres ready to crop with wheat, oats, &c., in spring; and should I be so fortunate as to get a good crop, it will leave me a profit of about 2,000 dollars. Our grain can rarely be sown before the 10th of May, and is ready for cutting early in August. Wheat yields from 20 to 30 bushels to the acre, and oats about 30. It cost me nearly 2,000 dollars for my horses, cattle, and implements, and 600 dollars for my house; but a few good seasons will clear all. I wish to God I saw you and family settled in this fine country. I see by the papers that they have poor times in our old home. I only wish I saw a good many of them here, and not to fool their time and money as they are doing where they never can be better off; and should you see any deserving fellow in search of a home, drop me a line, I may be able to assist him in getting work. Hoping soon to hear from you, I am, &c."

An hon. MEMBER asked the date of the letter.

VISCOUNT LYMINGTON said, the date of it was January, 1881. In regard to the growth of the country, he might give a few facts which he had obtained from the Prime Minister of Manitoba indicative of the very rapid development of that country. In 1872 there was at Emerson scarcely a house. The population of that town was at present over 1,500. At Winnipeg, in 1870, there was a population of 2,000, which had now grown to between 10,000 and 12,000. Throughout Manitoba there was a very excellent Municipal Government, consisting of a Municipal Council and a presiding officer, elected by the rate-payers, which settled the rates levied on the property in each district. Although he had no desire to detain the Committee, he would further mention the fact that a scheme had been drawn up by which the cultivation of the land was insured. That scheme proposed to offer to each emigrant 160 acres of land, and to enable him, by paying a fee of £2, to acquire the right of purchasing another 160 acres. The only fees he would be charged were two of £2, one on allotment, and a second on application to purchase additional land. The officials calculated that the amount of money that would be necessary in order to pay the expenses of a family from this country, and place them on the land in the North-West of Canada, would be from £80 to £100. This sum would include cost of removal, small outfit, cost of shelter on the land and subsistence until the head of the family could support them by wages, which he could obtain at the present time in constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway. His only object in speaking, having no personal interest in Canada or in emigration, had been to show that this country in the North West was an exceedingly fertile country, and a country upon which Irishmen had already been largely located; and, further, that if it was the desire of the Irish people in future to emigrate with their families to this country, and the Government were willing to assist them, and to make the emigration as cheap and commodious as possible, it would be most unfair that any obstacle should be placed in the way of the Government in carrying out that object.

MR. O'KELLY said, he had listened with some interest to the statement which had been made by the noble Lord who had just sat down (Viscount Lymington). The noble Lord had described Manitoba from the prospectuses of persons who were interested in land there. The noble Lord had told them what the land was capable of producing. He admitted that Manitoba was one of the richest territories in the world; but he wished to know what was the use of a rich territory where there was no communication with it. The noble Lord told them that farmers who went there found extremely rich tracts of land; but the Irish peasant, who was in the habit of living in a temperate climate, in going to Manitoba, would find himself in a climate where the heat in summer was 120 degrees in the shade, and in winter 40 degrees below zero. The noble Lord had spoken of Manitoba and Minnesota as if they were practically the same country. Now, there was this difference. From Manitoba there was no outlet, while from Minnesota there was a railway connected with the whole civilized world and the best markets of America and Europe. That made a very great deal of difference. [A laugh.] Hon. Members who laughed knew nothing about the matter, and were simply exhibiting their own ignorance. He was not an opponent of emigration; on the contrary, he was in favour of judicious emigration. "He had never concealed the fact that there were many parts of the world which ought to be opened out to the intelligent labourer. But he would not be a party to sending the Irish people into a waste of snow during seven months of the year, and during the remainder a waste of burning sand, which could find no parallel except in the Desert of Sahara in Northern Africa. It was a place compared with which the climate of the Amazon was a heaven. He had had the advantage of travelling through these regions, and he knew what he was speaking about. What had been done with reference to the Colony by Father Nugent? He had always given to Father Nugent the credit of possessing the very best intentions. The people taken by Father Nugent from Connemara were left at Minnesota. But they were sent out without experience and without the capital necessary to establish them upon farms. Many of them were put down upon prairies that, under favourable conditions, could have been converted into productive farms; but when these unfortunate people found themselves on these prairies, without means, without money, without food, and with no sufficient shelter when the winter came, about 30 per cent of them were frost-bitten, and many of them died of hunger and starvation, in spite of the protecting arm of the man whom he regarded as one of the best men in America—Bishop Ireland, of Minnesota. That right rev. Prelate threw over the people the protecting shield of his influence. He helped them with his money; but, in view of the large number of persons he had to make provision for, it was too much for his resources, and he was unable to give adequate protection to that small and miserable Colony. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote) told them that there were some 30,000,000 acres waiting to be colonized. The hon. Gentleman spoke simply on behalf of the executive of the Northern Pacific Railroad and in the interest of speculators, and of persons who cared nothing for what became of the people whom they induced to go to this land. Under proper conditions, it was a fair and proper field of emigration; but in order to make it a fair and proper field of emigration, they must place men upon it with capital—men who were suited to the Northern climates, who were accustomed to bear the cold of winter and the heat of summer, and not poor, miserable people without money, without clothes, and without any proper protection from the severity of the climate, otherwise the emigrants would perish miserably. If this Emigration Clause were intended to put the people upon the Eastern lands of Virginia, or to place them in Texas or Kansas, where they could live and work and hope to survive, he would be a most strenuous supporter of it; but when they told him that the object of the clause was to send the Irish people to perish in Manitoba, then he declared that he would oppose the clause to the utmost of his power—not because he was opposed to emigration, but because he was opposed to badly-conducted and badly-considered emigration. The reason that he said this scheme was intended for the benefit of Manitoba was this—the only parts of Canada that were worth living in were those parts that were situated along the shores of the St. Lawrence; but they had long been taken up, and they were no longer open to emigration; and emigrants going from this country could no longer place themselves there. Even the old dwellers in Canada were crossing the river by thousands every year in order to seek a home in a thoroughly free country. He did not know whether any Member of the House had ever crossed the St. Lawrence. If he had he would know the difference there was between one bank of the river and the other. He had only to cross the river to find the wide distinction that existed between the two Governments and the two people, although there was apparently nothing to divide the one people from the other. Nevertheless, on the one side of the river there was a miserable territory occupied principally by Native French Canadians; and on the other a flourishing and prosperous country under the Government of the United States. Day by day the inhabitants of Canada were pouring into the United States by thousands; and yet it was proposed by Her Majesty's Government to send the people of Ireland across the Atlantic to supply in Canada the place of the native population who were deserting it, and who, like rats, were leaving the sinking ship. Under these circumstances, he would support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy.

MR. RAMSAY said, he agreed that this proposal was one of the most important in the Bill. The hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) told the Committee last night that there were 360,000 holdings in Ireland, of a class on which the so-called farmers held farms of a less annual value than £8. Did any hon. Member suppose that any legislation could provide for such a class of people? Personally, he did not believe that it was possible, and he thought that the Report of the Richmond Commission, which had been so often quoted in that House, was fully justified in asserting that no course which Parliament could take could make adequate provision for the prosperity of tenants in such a miserable condition. Indeed, if they were offered the fee simple of the land they occupied, without paying anything for it at all, they would always be found in the wretched state they were now occupying whenever a bad season occurred. He thought the Committee laboured under great disadvantage in having the question discussed by hon. Gentlemen who knew very little either of agriculture, of the value of land, or the condition of the small occupiers. He was himself quite at home upon those points, having had considerable experience for many years, and he was able to give information in regard to the position of a number of persons who had emigrated from his own property some time ago. He had made a visit in Canada in order to renew his acquaintance with them, and he had spent some time in that country; and, notwithstanding what the hon. Gentleman who had last addressed the Committee (Mr. O'Kelly) said, the Irish settlers who had emigrated there were living in contentment. In point of fact, the characteristic of their condition which struck him most was the spirit of contentment that universally prevailed among them. The hon. Gentleman asserted that the emigrants who were sent to Canada very rapidly passed over into the United States. And why should they not do so? If they preferred to go to Virginia, where a great number of his own neighbours had gone, he saw no reason why they should not do so. The hon. Member seemed to think that the provisions of this clause should not be made applicable to our own Dependencies. Our own Dependencies had a vast area susceptible of improvement by cultivation, and capable of sustaining the whole population of Ireland; and his experience was this, that no legislation could make adequate provision in Ireland for the population that were dependent upon that country until they had reduced their number and consolidated their holdings. He believed that the Bill would have a tendency to consolidate holdings by inducing the small tenants to sell their tenant right as a preliminary step towards emigrating. He had no doubt that that would be the effect of the Bill, and that a considerable number of the smaller tenants would emigrate. He did not suppose that very great advantages would accrue from the creation of a vast number of peasant proprietors. As he had said, he looked upon this as a most important matter, and his object in addressing the Committee now was to express his opinion of the contentment of some of the small occupiers who had emigrated from Scotland and Ireland, and settled in various parts of Canada. He had visited them there, and lived among them for some weeks; and he went there with no other object than to ascertain for himself the condition of the people who had gone out from his own estates. That was only about 12 years ago, and he had induced them to tell him their circumstances. They were prosperous then, and he believed they were going on as prosperously as ever. Further than that, they had no feeling towards this country but one of affection, and they desired to do all the good they could to the "old country," as they termed it. Under these circumstances, he trusted that the clause, with such Amendments as the Government might see fit to accept, would be speedily agreed to by the Committee.

MR. GORST said, he would not trouble the Committee with many observations. The noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Lymington) seemed to him to have intervened in the debate for the purpose of advertising the great merits for the purposes of colonization of Manitoba. The noble Lord seemed to have encountered an adversary on that side of the House who desired to run Minnesota against Manitoba, and they had had a somewhat lively debate in consequence. As the Chairman had not presumed to interfere in order to prevent the discussion, he supposed the matter was in some way which he did not understand relevant to the Question before the Committee. His object, however, was to point out to the Committee the difficulties which an English Member felt in accepting the clause. He did not in the least doubt the liberal intentions of Her Majesty's Government towards the people of Ireland in proposing the clause, and he did not doubt that there were people in Ireland to whom emigration, if carried out by voluntary societies, or even by Government assistance, would be a great boon. But what he had failed to see at all in the speech of the Prime Minister, which he had carefully listened to, what it failed to inform him upon was what was the benefit the people of the United Kingdom were to receive from the deportation of part of the population of Ireland. There was this remarkable peculiarity about the clause under discussion—that the money to be voted would come out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the United Kingdom. All the advances which were made by the Land Commission under the other clauses of the Bill, although they might be paid, in the first instance, out of the pockets of the taxpayers, would ultimately be recouped from Irish funds. Therefore, in every other clause of the Bill, although the credit of the United Kingdom might be pledged for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Bill, yet the payment would ultimately be made out of the resources of Ireland. But in this particular clause the payments made to the emigration societies would come firstly and lastly out of the pockets of the taxpayers. ["No!"] He should like to know out of what other source they could come. What, however, he wished to ask was, what were the advantages the taxpayers of the United Kingdom were to derive from the deportation of a part of the Irish people, and what should induce them to vote the taxes of the United Kingdom for the purpose of carrying out such a project? It was no answer to say that emigration was for the interests of the Irish labourer himself. About that there might be a good deal of difference of opinion. He had himself been in the Colonies, and he had brought away from the Colonies a very high idea of the advantages of emigration to the ordinary unskilled labourer. But he thought that skilled labourers should think twice before they carried their skill to a Colony. If he himself were a mere unskilled agricultural labourer, he would only consent to remain in the United Kingdom long enough to scrape together money to carry him away to a Colony. ["Oh!"] That, at any rate, was his opinion. Many other people, no doubt, had other opinions; but he believed that a great deal that was said about emigration was nonsense. Very often when a man took himself off to Australia or New Zealand, when he got there he found that he would have been very much better off if he had stayed at home. He could very well understand that emigration was of very great value to a Colony itself. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote) said that every emigrant was worth £100 to the Colony. That might be so, and if an emigrant was of such great value to the Colony, the Colony would be perfectly justified in spending its taxes in the introduction of emigrants. But in order to justify us in spending our money, it must be proved that we gained something by sending our labourers out of the country. What did we gain? Somebody had talked about starving labourers. Now, starving labourers would be chargeable on the Unions or the parishes to which they belonged; and if the people were starving in the West of Ireland, and there was no other way of relieving them except emigration, it might be economical for the Unions or the parishes to send this starving population out of the country. But what did the nation gain by sending them out of the country? If these people were capable of being made peaceable and orderly citizens of the United Kingdom, we lost our subjects, and a country was rich and powerful according to its population. Therefore, if we lessened the population of the United Kingdom by sending the labourers away, it did not matter whether it was to Canada or the United States, if they were capable of becoming orderly and law-abiding citizens, we thereby weakened our strength; and what we were really asked to do was to expend the taxes of the United Kingdom in weakening the strength of the Empire. As long as the Irish labourers remained in Ireland, they were the producers of part of the wealth of the country. Every piece of bread produced, every potato grown, all the wheat and agricultural produce that these men might raise in Ireland, Ireland was so much the poorer for if these men went away to America. And they were, moreover, the consumers of our produce. A rich, prosperous, and contented population in Ireland would increase the riches and prosperity of our manufacturing industries. It therefore appeared to him that however much it might be for the advantage of the labourer himself and of the Colony to which he went, for every Irishman they sent out of the country the United Kingdom was so much the poorer.

THE CHAIRMAN: I wish to point out that the hon. and learned Member is wandering entirely away from the Question. The hon. and learned Member is now speaking against the clause as a whole and not upon the Amendment.

MR. GORST said, if it was in Order for the Prime Minister to speak in favour of the clause, surely he was entitled to speak against it.

Mr. Gorst

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. and learned Member that the difference is this—that although he has a perfect right to speak against the clause as soon as it is proposed that it shall stand part of the Bill, he is not in Order in speaking against it upon an Amendment which applies to a part of it only. In the case of the Prime Minister he explained the bearings of his Amendment upon the clause, and he was in Order.

MR. GORST said, he really must object to the ruling of the Chair. ["Order!"] And, without desiring to be out of Order, he wished respectfully to explain to the Chairman that he did not intend to oppose the clause, but was rather asking for information from the Government upon it.

MR. O'DONNELL rose to Order. He wished to know if it was not competent for any Member of the Committee to speak against the clause until the Question of putting the clause as a whole was submitted to the Committee? Must a Member who was opposed to the clause be silent during the whole discussion of the Amendments, until the Question was put to the Committee that the clause stand part of the Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already explained that I have difficulty on this occasion in following the ordinary Rules of Committee. The ordinary Rule of Committee is to confine themselves to the Amendment before the Committee. I have explained to the Committee that there were only five Amendments originally on this clause, and that all of them involved the same principle. Therefore, I could not entirely keep hon. Members to the Amendment immediately before the Committee. But, at the same time, any person who wishes to oppose the clause as a whole ought to wait until the Question is put that the clause stand part of the Bill.

MR. GORST said, he was anxious to reply to the observations of the Prime Minister; but he now understood that he would be out of Order in doing so. He would, therefore, content himself with inviting the Prime Minister to supplement the extremely interesting speech which he had made to the Committee by pointing out to him (Mr. Gorst), who represented taxpayers of England, what those whom he represented would gain, and how they would be benefited, so that he should be justified in voting that their taxes should be spent in that way. He absolutely failed to see how the people of this country were to be benefited by any part of the population of Ireland, who were capable of being turned into industrious, law-abiding subjects of the country, being sent away out of the country at the public expense.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had listened with great interest to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), and he confessed that he heard with some surprise the doctrines which had been laid down to the Committee. His hon. and learned Friend asked how it could be of advantage to the country that persons who were capable of contributing to the riches, power, and strength of the nation should be induced to emigrate? That was a question that might fairly be asked; but the real question they ought to ask was—how could these people, living under circumstances in which for years past they had been totally unable to earn their living, and who, instead of being a source of riches, content, and power to the country, had been a source of weakness and a drain on the resources of the country, requiring year after year the country to step out of the course usually prescribed to an Executive Government, and make advances for the purpose of keeping them alive—the question was, how could such a people best be benefited? The Report of the Commissioners showed that it was impossible for the wretched inhabitants of the West of Ireland to exist in a manner that was creditable to the country unless something was done to afford them relief, and unless they had some larger sphere accorded to them for their labour? Then, what was the Parliament of this country to do? There was only one of two things open, either migration or emigration. All those who were acquainted with the circumstances of Ireland knew how extremely difficult any scheme of migration must be. It would not only be necessary to get rid of the tenants in possession, but it would be necessary to incur a costly system of removal in order to place those unfortunate people in a position to earn their own living. An objection had been taken that the expense of emigration was to be incurred at the cost of the British taxpayer. He should decidedly object to a large grant of money being given at the cost of the British taxpayer for the promotion of any system of emigration; but, as he read the clause, there was to be no charge ultimately on the British taxpayer. The Land Commission was to enter into an agreement, with the concurrence of the Treasury, and every precaution would be taken that security should be had for the repayment to the last farthing of the sum advanced, and the loans would be made payable at such a rate of interest, and within such a period, as was directed by the Act. He was not ordinarily a supporter of the recommendations of Her Majesty's Government, and he was not a supporter of this Bill; but he could not conceive any provision which was calculated more to improve the condition of the Irish people. The clause, properly worked out, would tend to restore prosperity and improve the condition of the unhappy population of Ireland, who might ultimately expect to become prosperous inhabitants of our Colonies, and customers to this country, because every man who attained a position of prosperity in Australia, or Canada, or New Zealand, would be a customer of this country, and would add to the strength and resources of the Empire, tending to keep in employment, and at better wages, those who remained at home. He confessed that he should look with great regret upon any course which would have the effect of withdrawing from this measure one of its few redeeming features.

MR. MACDONALD said, he had entertained the hope that this clause would not have been pressed by Her Majesty's Government, and that hope had been founded on the generous remarks which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister last evening. He regretted, however, to find to-day that the clause was still pressed; and as he was not in the habit of making long speeches, he should ask the Committee to give him a little attention while he argued the question which had been raised by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). He regretted to see that they had had advertising speeches in favour of Manitoba; and advertising speeches in favour of the Canadian railways. He was afraid that the promoters of those speculations went there with unclean hands from an unclean nest. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy asked that they should have security. Where was the security to be got? He was old enough to remember, 45 years ago, when a body of men numbering some 400 persons went to Nova Scotia; and although they had signed bonds and documents for their passages and employment when they reached America, in less than four months most of them had made tracks and were on their way back again. It was then found that they had no security for the payments they had made. He had known many societies formed in the United States in which the Members agreed to contribute towards the assistance of each other; but the moment they got to the United States they dissolved partnership, and the bond of agreement they had entered into was worth less than the paper upon which it was written, seeing that the people who were parties to it disappeared altogether. They were now asked to send the poorer classes of the Irish population to Canada; and he should like to know if the Government had taken upon themselves the duty of advertising agents to the Canadian Government, in order to induce whole families of the Irish people to go out to an inhospitable climate—so inhospitable, that it made most hon. Members shiver when they thought of it. He should like to ask Her Majesty's Government how many of the engagements that were made in England were ratified in Toronto and Montreal? How much of the money that was agreed to be advanced was ever paid, and where were the persons to be found who consented to emigrate? He ventured to say that the great mass of them would be found in the United States. There was no following them, for they got rid of their engagements and went into the United States. He looked upon this proposal not only as vicious, but as immoral in the highest sense of the word. It was immoral because it encouraged people to break the promises and engagements that they had entered into; and the Government that would consent to enforce it would only lead to the ruin of the people that they sent out. They were asked by the present clause to send out the people of Ireland to Canada. What was there in Canada to induce them to send the people Ireland there? If the people of Ireland were allowed to have their own way when they left Ireland they would go to the United States. He was informed, on very good authority—that of an important official of the United States—that during the last 24 years more than £20,000,000 sterling had been sent to this country by persons who had emigrated from England and Ireland, in order to assist their relatives and friends in finding their way to America. He should very much like the Government to give a Return of the amount of money which had been spent in emigration, and he believed they could easily ascertain it from the books of the shipping companies. He should also like to know how much money had been sent from Canada in order to assist the people of this country in emigrating to that Province. He was fully able to corroborate the statement made by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. O'Kelly) that Canadian settlers were rapidly leaving the country. He had visited America more than once, and he was able to say that the rush of emigration from Liverpool, at certain seasons of the year, was nothing like the rush from Canada to Virginia and other parts of the United States, where there was real scope for the employment of the labouring classes, and where every man, no matter what his occupation might be, could find work. He strongly objected to the clause as it now stood. If they were going to permit emigration at all, he asked them not to confine it to Canada, but let it be to Australia, New Zealand, and even to Japan and China. It would be most objectionable to tie the emigrants to one spot, from which at this moment every person was flying. One word for the Conservative Party. The noble Earl opposite might smile now; but that smile would become something very different before long if emigration still went on. Thirty years ago America almost supplied her own wants, and during that period a large proportion of her population had gone on to the land in Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, and the Great West, increased means of transport had been provided, and the men they drove out of their agricultural districts, and out of their mining districts, by the low rate of wages, these men had found their new home in the West, and were supplying them with cheap wheat. The produce coming from those great Western plains would make their farming and their landed interest do other than smile by-and-bye. He agreed with the Irish Members in their opposition to the Emigration Clause. Not that he was an enemy to emigration altogether; there were Colonies in the United States planted by himself or under his direction; but the men there went of their own free will, not at the luring of an emigration agent, not at the luring of a Colonial Government—they went under their own desire to be located in a free land among free people. He would only simply say he was altogether opposed to this Emigration Clause as a monopoly to be created in favour of the Canadian Government, in favour of bogus railways and swindling concerns.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, they had been invited to express their opinions by the Prime Minister, and that was his only reason for interposing. Looking at this Emigration Clause as part of a great scheme—as he would call the Bill—for the benefit of the people of Ireland, he entirely concurred in supporting the clause. He looked upon it as one means—the right hon. Gentleman had not put it forward as the principal means, but as a secondary and subsidiary means with the Reclamation Clause; the first means being, of course, the security of the occupier and increased means of purchase. What did this Emigration Clause propose to do? It merely enabled assistance to be given to a certain number of people desirous of emigrating, and who, but for that assistance, could not emigrate. Public opinion would not in the long run support those hon. Members, if there were any such, who offered an unreasonable opposition to this proposal. The present emigration had caused a good deal of alarm and concern in Ireland. That he admitted, and that it had assumed far too large proportions; but this would remain absolutely untouched by the Government proposal. The present emigrants consisted of the sons and daughters of the better class of farmers, and this class would continue to emigrate, and the assistance of the Government would have no possible effect on their going or staying. Take one of the present occupiers of land in Ireland—say, of a farm of 40 or 50 acres. Say he had four or five sons on that farm, was it reasonable to suppose that two or three of those young men would remain at home, servants to their father while he lived, and liable to be turned adrift by their elder brother when he succeeded to the farm? No; they would continue, as they had continued, to strike out a better career for themselves. But there were also numbers of people—families—who, if assisted, would make a fresh start in life, emigrate, and prosper. Much had been said during this discussion against Canada; but his experience—and he was there for seven or eight years, and visited a great many Irish settlements—was that the people there were most prosperous. It was an entire mistake to say the climate was bad. Cold in winter it was, no doubt; but it was not hotter in the summer than London now was. It was infinitely preferable to English and Irish people to the climate of the Southern States. Some hon. Members had alluded to the failure of the emigration from the West of Ireland in Minnesota. Well, that experiment failed because Father Nugent allowed the people to be chosen for him, and the selection was made of the poorest and most helpless. Bishop Ireland, in a letter he (Colonel Colthurst) had in his possession, said that if the people had been determined to work they would have thriven as Irish people from the towns and cities of the States were thriving. At the same time, this Colony was failing, and this failure was due to their improper selection. But this clause did not select; it was for those who came forward—it was for the assistance of those who were prepared to go, and only needed this assistance to carry out their intention. With the greatest pleasure he supported the clause.

MR. BLAKE said, there would be a far better understanding of the matter if the Committee knew precisely what the clause meant. The great apprehensions were as to the extent of the clause, and it was here that the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) fell into his mistake. As he (Mr. Blake) understood the clause, its operation was by no means confined to Canada or anywhere else; but it would be open to the emigrants to go to Australia, to New Zealand, or any British Possession. He was prepared to express an opinion as to Manitoba and the North-Western Territory, from whence he had but lately returned, having gone over the whole of Manitoba and a part of the North-West Territory; and he confessed he was rather surprised to hear the description of the hon. Member for Roscommon. It must have been many years since that hon. Member visited the country, for his own experience was of an entirely opposite character. No doubt, if he visited the country now he would have much the feeling of a Rip Van Winkle. He described Manitoba as having no railway communication—the fact being that it had already through it the Great Pacific Line, and its railway communication in other respects was fair. The hon. Member described the country as little better than a Sahara. Now, it was well to understand what the climate of Manitoba was. It was quite true it was subject to great vicissitudes, warm in summer and cold in winter. The hon. Member said the temperature was in winter 40 degrees below zero; quite true, and it might be added and sometimes 55 below zero, and sometimes as cold as the Arctic regions. Now, what was the effect of this on the inhabitants of Manitoba? The first inhabitants of the country were the adventurers under the old North-West Company; next came the agents and hunters of the Hudson Bay Company, and the next were the Selkirk settlers, and there were more recent arrivals. Now, some of these descendants of the Hudson Bay men, hunters and trappers, were the finest men he had ever seen, with sons and daughters about the finest type of humanity. He saw some of the survivors of the Selkirk settlement, he could give name after name of those who went out under Lord Selkirk, they were 80 years old and hale and hearty, and their descendants were the finest people they could meet with. Amongst the most successful emigrants, although few, were the Irish people; and one great fact he could not avoid mentioning, that the Permissive Bill was in full operation throughout the greater part of Manitoba, and was extending, and, he was happy to say, with most happy results, and was in full and successful operation in the North-West. But it should be borne in mind that Manitoba was a very small portion of the great North-West, some 340 miles long and 240 wide. There was a wheat belt extending for at least 1,000 miles, and 300 miles wide. The climate rapidly improved westwards. It was capable of much improvement as agriculture progressed. He endeavoured while there to make the acquaintance of the famous refugee Chief, "Sitting Bull," though he had not the good fortune to meet him; but he was there, and supported his thousands in the North-West territory for years from the buffalo, and where buffalo thrived other cattle would thrive. A more promising region he never saw; with its belt of wheat land 1,000 miles long and 300 miles wide, and grass lands on either side to the extent of five times Great Britain and Ireland. He did not condemn or encourage emigration, he merely stated facts. There were, as all knew, a certain number of people always anxious to emigrate, either from love of a change, desire of adventure, or forced by circumstances. In the United States at this moment there were, it is said, 16,000,000 of people of Irish blood; and although in Canada the number was considerably less, and would always be so, a certain number would go to Canada. And he would appeal to his hon. Friends near him, from whom it was his great regret to differ, if these people were resolved to go, why should not their way be smoothed for them, whether they went to Canada or elsewhere? Was it not better to have some preparation made for their arrival, instead of their going with nothing being prepared for their arrival? It seemed to him to be quite forgotten what it was the Bill offered. He held in his hand the despatch of the Governor General to Lord Kimberley, in which he stated that in the case of single young men and women emigrants no difficulty would arise; but he said in the present distressed state of Ireland it must be by the removal of entire families that any sensible relief would be made in the pressure of redundant population, and for these families arrangements must be made for their temporary maintenance. Then his Excellency went on to explain how a number of small farms had been allotted, that small buildings would be erected for their reception, and the seed actually sown to enable the emigrants to reap a harvest in the first season. It was well known in what a benevolent manner Canada acted for the relief of Irish distress at its late trying period, and this document showed the extreme desire of the Government of Canada to assist any Irish who might wish to emigrate. He quoted from the Report of the Inspector of Fisheries for Galway district, showing that the population in some parts was the poorest in Ireland, at the best just able to eke out a miserable existence, and always open to the temptation to engage in illicit distillation. The words he quoted he had written himself, and he knew how true they were; the same description would hold good of Mayo, part of Kerry, and other parts of Ireland. And when he went to Canada and contrasted the miserable position of these people in Ireland with the settlers there, he felt that let the consequences be what they might in unpopularity in that House or at home, that he should be committing a deep political sin if he did otherwise than give his support to such a clause as that under consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN: The position of the clause is now entirely altered, and so many Amendments have been given in, that I consider it will be necessary when we meet again to go regularly through the Amendments in the ordinary way.

And it being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again this day.

The House suspended its Sitting at five minutes to Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.

Progress resumed.

Clause 26 (Emigration).

Amendment again proposed,

In page 18, line 12, before the first word "The," to insert the words "On obtaining sufficient security for the repayment of moneys advanced under this section."—(Sir George Campbell.)

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 9; Noes 56: Majority 47.—(Div. List, No. 302.)

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he wished to move an Amendment proposing a different scheme from that of the Government. He was perfectly unable to understand how this clause of the Government would work, although he had given as much attention to it as might be in his power, which, perhaps, might not be much. Who was going to ask for the money? Who were the persons to be employed, and on what grounds were the Commission to advance the money? Were the Commission going to have interviews with, for instance, Sir Alexander Gordon, and, in that case, who would represent the Irish people as between the Commission and the Government of Canada? How were local knowledge and local wishes to be brought to bear on the Commission? Anybody who looked at this clause would, he thought, come to the conclusion that it was not intended by the Government to have any very actively operative effect. He was perfectly certain the intentions of the Government were good, and that if emigration could be carried on for the benefit of Ireland, and with the concurrence of the Irish people, the Government would be glad to give a lead and direction to that movement; but if he were not satisfied of that, he should say the whole of this clause was a blind, and that the Government merely wished to head one of the clauses with the word "Emigration," and then go to the country and say—"We have dealt with the difficult question of Irish Emigration." He did not believe that was their intention; but that was a charge that could be made against them from the way in which the clause was drawn, for it was so indefinite. He could not make out how any real action could arise under the clause, and he wished to point out that the Government had abandoned the line which Parliament had distinctly laid down on this subject. This was not the first time the question of emigration had come before Parliament. It had been legislated on by Parliament since 1838. The first Irish Poor Law that was passed took into consideration the question of emigration, and Parliament had since that time distinctly and definitely laid down a line to the effect that it would not allow the State directly to interfere in Irish emigration. In the Irish Poor Law Act of 1838 Parliament indicated that the Guardians of any electoral division might apply to the Poor Law Commissioners for authority to call a public meeting of the ratepayers to consider the question of emigration from that electoral division, and a majority of such meeting might apply to the Commissioners for permission to raise a sum, which should be charged on the rates, for the purposes of emigration from that particular Union; so that as long ago as 1838 this question had been prominently before Parliament, and had been dealt with by Parliament. The rate for emigration under that Act was limited to sums not exceeding 1s. in the pound of the rateable value of the Union, and the emigration was strictly limited to British Colonies. Again, in 1843, the subject was brought before Parliament, and Parliament took a wider view, considering that the calling of a public meeting and requiring the majority of the meeting to declare in favour of emigration was not a machinery likely to produce any great advantage. Accordingly, by the Act of 1843, it was enacted that two-thirds of the Guardians of any Union might assist any destitute person to emigrate, provided that he had been three months in the Union workhouse; but they could only assist him to emigrate to a British Colony. The charge was made to fall on the electoral division, and this action on the part of the Guardians did not require a public meeting. Parliament, in that case, therefore, made some extension of the principle, but they still kept up the limit of the charge paid by the electoral division, and restricted the emigration to British Colonies. He believed that a considerable amount of emigration had taken place under that provision, and many paupers had been assisted to emigrate from workhouses; but he wished to point out to the Committee that a man who had been so degraded as to have been in a workhouse for three months was not the man who would be selected for emigration. He did not believe that a man of that kind was likely to succeed. In 1847 the subject was once more brought before Parliament, and by the Act 10 Vict. c. 31, it was provided that the emigration expenses of any holder of under five acres of land should be defrayed by the Guardians of the parish, together with the emigration expenses of his whole family. That was the first time that the emigration of families was recognized by Parliament; but it was stipulated in these cases that the landlord must forego all claims for rent and supply two-thirds of the money required. On that condition the Guardians might provide one-third of the amount, and charge that on the rates of the electoral division. That Act went a great deal further, for it entirely set aside the Act of 1843, limiting the power of the Guardians to emigrate persons who had been in the Union for three months. It allowed the Guardians, with the assent always of the Commissioners, to emigrate all persons as long as they were poor and destitute; but such persons had to be approved by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. How the Secretary of State for the Colonies could tell whether a family was suitable for emigration he could not imagine; and, with such a provision as that, the Act was not likely to work out well. Then, in 1849, shortly after the great Famine, Parliament again considered the question, and by the Act 12 & 13 Vict. c. 104, it was enacted that Guardians might apply any money in their hands for the rates of any electoral division, or might borrow from the Government, or from private persons, sums sufficient to emigrate poor and destitute persons. It did not say anything about their being paupers, but simply referred to any poor persons whom the Guardians thought fit for emigration. The only limit he could find in that Act was that the amount should be 2s. 4d. in the pound.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he found that the Act did not say "destitute persons." It appeared from what he had said that in 1838, 1843, 1847, and 1849, Parliament had dealt with the question of emigration, and had throughout been consistent in declining to bring the State into direct contact with the people who were to be emigrated, and had left the question of Irish emigration to be decided by the localities, utterly refusing to take the line which the Government now proposed to adopt. There was no question whatever of local authority—it was a case of the State dealing with some individual or public body who need not have any necessary connection with the locality in Ireland. He proposed, after the word "agreements," in page 18, line 13, to leave out—

"With any person, or body of persons, having authority to contract on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, or of any province thereof, or on behalf of any British colony or dependency, or any state or other district in such dominion, province, colony, or dependency, or on behalf of any public company or other public body with whose constitution and security the Land Commission may be satisfied."

In place of these words, he proposed to insert—

"The Land Commission may, from time to time, with the concurrence of the Treasury, enter into agreements with Boards of Guardians, or with any persons for the time being authorized to act as Guardians to any Union, to advance out of the moneys in their hands such sums as the Commission may think it desirable to expend in promoting emigration in Ireland."

The object of these proposals was to keep the Land Commission, which ought to be a Commission having the confidence of the people, altogether away from any such awkward subject as emigration. He did not wish the Commission to be brought into contact with the people upon this question, but with the local authorities, who must be the best judges of the emigration necessities of their localities. Then the State might be brought in indirectly merely to advance money to these local authorities; that might be done with safety, because the Government would not appear in the light of an agent for deportation. The people who selected and recommended persons for emigration were the Guardians, who were conversant with the people of their district; and he would add, that there was nothing so absolutely essential to the proper conduct of an emigration scheme as local knowledge. Another important consideration was that the Boards of Guardians, being popular representatives, enjoyed the confidence of the Roman Catholic clergy; and, if the confidence of the Roman Catholic clergy was not secured, any clause, such as this Emigration Clause, would be merely waste paper.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is impossible for me to keep the Amendments in their proper order, as they are brought to me sometimes half-a-dozen on one sheet of paper. I understood that the noble Lord was about to move an Amendment equivalent to the Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), to the effect that Boards of Guardians should take the place of the Land Commission. If the noble Lord chooses to move that he is in Order; but if he does not move that, there is an Amendment in the name of Mr. Torrens which it would be necessary to put first.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked what was the question immediately before the House?

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood that, Mr. O'Donnell not having risen, the noble Lord was going to move an equivalent Amendment—"That Boards of Guardians should take the place of the Land Commission;" but if he does not move that here, it must be moved at a subsequent point.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he might agree with some portion of what the noble Lord had said, but he could not agree with much of it. He understood the noble Lord's view to be that it was desirable, as a general policy, that the business of Emigration should be separated from the Land Commission. In that view he quite concurred, and it was with that view that he placed on the Paper his own Amendment. He wished to induce the Government so to frame the administration of this sub-Department that it should be disconnected, at least permissively, from the action of the Land Commission. He believed it was generally understood that the business of the Land Commission would be more than enough for it to do in the next two years, and he supposed that whether the opinion formed on it was favourable or not, it would have a great deal on hand; if so, he should object to the work of emigration being consigned to the leisure hours of an over-weighted Department; and he should prefer that the Government should have two Departments instead of one. The whole business of Emigration would be quite sufficient work for a special body; and he would explain why he and those who were emigrationists, above all things desired that this Government or their successors should have at their command a sufficiently strong sub-Department to work out what they regarded as a very difficult, a very onerous, and a very honourable function. He regretted very much the presence in the clause of the word "Canada," and he said that not from any lurking disposition to sneer or to find fault, but because it had had the effect of throwing the apple of discord among those Members who were jealous of any preference being given to Canada. As a Representative of the taxpayers of England, he held that no preference should be shown in this matter. If they had, or thought they had, at any particular time or place a surplus population, then they should endeavour to facilitate their transference to any Colony which might be suitable to them at the time, if that Colony should at the time desire to have them; and therefore he regretted the introduction of the word "Canada," because it was an indication of preference which he was sure the Government did not intend. He had no interest personally in Canada; he had no communication with people in Canada, except in the capacity of public men; but he was bound to say that his intercourse with the public men of Canada had not given him the slightest reason for suspicion of their motives upon this question. But if any suspicion should be entertained with regard to Canada, a despatch from the Queen's Representative in Canada (the Marquess of Lorne) to the Home Government directly and officially upon this subject would dispel suspicion. In March last, he had moved to have that despatch laid upon the Table; and in consequence of the publication of that document, for the first time in the history of emigration in England, a great Colony made them an offer of lands at nominal prices for persons of industrious and respectable character. They might reject that offer if they pleased, but there was nothing in that offer unworthy of Canada. But the noble Lord had amused the Committee with a sort of sketchy history of what he called emigration in this country. He (Mr. W. M. Torrens) must say that anything more unlike his recollection of the history of this question he never heard; it might be an outline from the noble Lord's view, but it was not an outline of anything that he knew. What was the history of emigration in this country? Fifty years ago emigration was considered a most vital subject; several Committees of the House were appointed to take evidence upon it; Commissioners were appointed by the Crown to investigate the question; and the result of all that was the creation of a sub-Department of two Commissioners, with a staff of secretaries, who, for 20 or 30 years, facilitated emigration. That Commission had been allowed to drop. That course he considered a mistake; but it was one of those changes in legislation which might easily occur again, and the Commission might be re-constituted whenever the Government thought desirable. Ten years ago, an hon. Member sitting on the opposite side of the House, who had once held distinguished Office, concerted with him (Mr. W. M. Torrens) a Motion on the subject, which was discussed at great length for a whole summer's night, an effort being made to persuade the Government to re-organize the Emigration Department. What was the argument used then by some hon. Members, who were now Ministers, and other Members who were associated with them? That the Colonies were so depressed, that their organization was so different, that the distance was so far, and the course of post so long, that it was impossible for us to communicate so efficiently as was necessary to exchange surplus labour in our markets. Since that time science had abolished all these obstacles—steamers had been quickened, telegraphy had brought Colonies into direct communication with us; and the result was that when there was a surplus labour in any one market it could be made known all over the world at once. If a system of emigration was instituted under this Bill, say, for Ireland, how would it be possible, at any given time, for the directors of emigration to know when it would be safe to send labour to any particular point of the world that might seem to require it, unless it was in close communication with other parts of the world? Telegraphy had brought the means of doing that which the specific organization he advocated would require to be done; and it would be better, from that point of view, to have a separate Department devoted entirely to the work of emigration than to place the matter in the hands of the Poor Law Guardians, as suggested by the noble Lord. If the noble Lord's plans were adopted, emigration would be disfigured with the taint of pauperism from the start. Emigration, in his view, should have nothing to do with pauperism. In 1870 there was great distress in England, and the labour market greatly overstocked; the head of the Poor Law Department offered to issue a Circular, enabling Boards of Guardians to give assistance to promote emigration. Upon that, he and others who were interested in the subject with him issued a Circular to every Poor Law Union in England, warning them that it would be a fatal mistake to undertake emigration; and in that way they succeeded in defeating the inadvertent purpose of the Government. They did not pursue that course from any pragmatical view, but because they had received communications from the Colonies stating that the Colonies would refuse paupers, if sent out as emigrants; and he would now warn the noble Lord that if the Government and the Committee were beguiled into mixing up emigration with Poor

Law relief, Australia, and Canada, and other Colonies would refuse the emigrants. He was authorized and warranted in saying that the Canadian Government would not stand such an affront as that; and the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with such knowledge of Colonial questions, would be able to confirm that statement. If that was the case, what should be done? He would appeal to his hon. Friends opposite, as fellow-countrymen, and ask them, as honest men, loving their country, to consider what they were doing in throwing difficulties in the way of remedying the existing evils. There was nothing in the whole cosmogony of politics so fallacious or false as the talking about over-population and over crowding. In Ireland, he unhesitatingly declared, that there was no over-population; there was fearful overcrowding and fearful shortness of wages; and that during the last 18 months had led to people bidding against each other for the few farms that were available. What else was rack rent? How would landlords be able to increase rents if people did bid against each other? What was wanted was more farms. More farms producing wheat unrivalled in the world were offered to these people, and what was the price? The Irish farmer might say he could not afford to pay 30s. or 35s. an acre; but Queensland, with unlimited resources of untilled soil, offered them 40-acre farms at the official fee of 40s. Farmers who accepted that offer would become 40s. freeholders, and that for ever. These fee farms would not be tenancies that might be terminated, and would not be subject to leases, but would become the freehold possession of the farmers by mere stroke of the pen; and in addition to that, the purchasers would have the option of 40 acres more at a £1 fee. It was not in the power of the Land Bill, or of the Ministers, or Parliament to give land on these terms in this country; but the Colonies were able to make this offer, and not as a favour. In Leinster, in Ulster, and in Connaught, and in Canada, he would say there was not a surplus population; but it was admitted that the overcrowding was fearful in the West of Ireland. Canada and New Zealand offered land as large as Ulster, Leinster, and Connaught put together, capable of growing wheat; and why would hon. Members, for a mere political sentiment, object to people accepting that offer? The reason why the clergy of the people naturally, and he thought justly, objected to let their young people wander away from their homes was that they would be unable to exercise over them any moral influence; but if hon. Members would only enable the Government to do what was reasonable and right, the Colonial Governments would place no difficulties in the way of the establishment of Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Presbyterian villages throughout the Colonies. He did not mean to say that they could suddenly uproot and transport Mayo, and place it in a distant part of the world, and he did not desire to see anything of that kind; but what he did wish to see was fusion instead of confusion. They had had confusion with a vengeance, and now he hoped hon. Members would try to create fusion. He had once heard a gentleman ask the question why this country should do anything for the good of her Colonies? He (Mr. W. M. Torrens) maintained that if people emigrated for our good as well as for their own, and for the good of those to whom they went, we should be spending our own money wisely in assisting them. He believed, from his knowledge of the subject, that there was not the least risk as to the Government recovering the advances; but if the money were all lost would it not be well lost? Was it not better to spend the money in true glory than in real sham? He would urge the Committee to spend their money, and put an end to discontent, and to do that which was good for all.

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 12, after "the Land Commission," insert "or such other Commission for the purpose of emigration as Her Majesty shall appoint."—(Mr. W. M. Torrens.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. EWART described this Amendment as raising the most important question that had arisen under the Bill, and, expressing a hope that good would result from the clauses on the right of free sale and on fixed rents, explained that a holder of only five acres could not earn a subsistence from his holding. At the bottom of the present state of things in Ireland was a want of energy and industry; but he defied any man of energy and industry to maintain himself out of five acres of land. So long as there were those small tenants, there would be constantly recurring bad seasons. But how were they to be got rid of unless the tenants were encouraged to emigrate, and the small holdings consolidated? The soil could not be fully developed with such small holdings. The tenant of a five-acre farm would rarely have an animal upon it. He could not keep a horse or a cow, and was in the position of a factory operative thrown back to the hand-loom or spinning jenny. Every effort ought to be made to consolidate these small farms, and for that reason he approved of the Emigration Clause. Ireland was not overpopulated, but there were far too many of these small farms. The assistance proposed should, however, be given only to tenants, and he feared the clause, as it stood, would be inoperative. He did not think the mere granting of loans would carry out the scheme of the Bill; it would require considerable grants of public money, and £1,000,000 devoted to this purpose would not be an overgrant. The thing could not be carried out by the clause as it stood, and he hoped the Government would amend it.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is not the clause that is before the Committee just now. It is the question whether an additional Commission for the purposes of emigration shall be nominated.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have heard with interest and have been much struck by the speech of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens); but I do not propose to follow him in his general remarks, because there are many Amendments on the Paper, and the discussion of the general principle of the clause can better be postponed till we come to the clause itself. I shall therefore assist in carrying out your ruling, Sir, if I confine myself in reply to the Amendment brought before us. I have no great objection to the words proposed; but I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press the Amendment, because the Government have no intention of appointing another Commission, and the Amendment would give an altogether wrong impression. There is no difficulty in so arranging the business of the Commission that emigration can be well attended to, because they will have power to appoint Assistant Commissioners, and no doubt they will be able to obtain assistance if they find that their other important work will not allow them to deal individually with emigration. Therefore, I trust the hon. Member will not press his Amendment. The hon. Member made one suggestion to which I may allude, because I think it was very valuable. There was nothing further from the intention of the Government than to give a preference to one Colony over any other, and I see no reason why the word "Canada" need be retained. It was inserted because Canada is nearer to us, and opens out great inducements to emigration at the present moment; but there is no reason why it should stand in the Act of Parliament before the other Dependencies, and we shall be quite prepared to omit the words "on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, or of any province thereof," and make the clause read—"contract on the part of any British Colony." I have some remarks to make on the general policy of the clause, but I think it would be more convenient not to make them now.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he could quite agree with the view of the right hon. Gentleman as to the proposal of the hon. Member for Finsbury; but, at the same time, he thought the Committee would not do well to allow themselves to be carried away from the arguments of the hon. Member by admiration for the language in which he clothed his thoughts. For instance, it sounded extremely well when the hon. Member described the miserable condition of some of the poorer populations in the West of Ireland, where there was overcrowding through some of the neighbouring districts being depopulated; and then presented to their mental vision a dazzling picture of the future of these poor Irishmen when transplanted to the Arcadiæ of Manitoba and elsewhere. He said in place of their sufferings in Ireland the Irish peasants would get 40-acre farms for a few shillings, with beautiful skies and fertile soils—that, in fact, for 40s. they could be happy and comfortable. But he would remind the Committee that the Irish peasant must pay, not only 40s., but he would have to pay 40s. plus denationalization; he would have to pay 40s. plus banishment; he would have to pay 40s. plus his separation from all the associations which were so especially dear to all the Irish race. The hon. Member spoke of the Irish peasant as a freeholder; but the Irish peasant did not desire to be turned into a freeholder—at the Antipodes. The hon. Member for Finsbury did admit that among the objections to the plan of banishment which he advocated was something which he considered mere political superstition; but it was that political superstition which kept an Englishman from becoming a Frenchman, a Frenchman from becoming a German, and a Pole from becoming a Russian, and which he hoped would prevent an Irishman from ever desiring to be anything else than an Irishman, or from making his own prosperity a consideration separate from the prosperity of his country. The hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Ewart), had said some kindly words as to the spirit in which the Prime Minister had introduced this clause; but he must be counted an opponent of the clause, for the keynote of his speech was that Ireland was far from being overpopulated. That was his (Mr. O'Donnell's) opinion, and he failed to see why the British taxpayer, who had to pay for the Transvaal and other blunders of the Government, should be called upon to pay for an additional blunder for promoting emigration. The proposal seemed to him to lack the usual breadth and force of philosophic Liberalism. Ireland was, in his opinion, distinctly under-populated; and the fact that in some of the poorest and most wretched parts there was overcrowding, was due to the circumstance that the beneficial results with which British rule had blessed Ireland had caused acres of waste in the place of districts which might be inhabited by Irish peasants. Before adopting measures for transplanting the Irish people, England ought to adopt the best measures for enabling them to live in comfort in Ireland; but the Government were anxious to devote something between £1,000,000 and £2,000,000 to the transportation of Irish peasants to Botany Bay and elsewhere; and it was curious that whereas England used to be inclined to spend large sums of money to get rid of her worst citizens, she now wanted to get rid of her best citizens, and to transport 50,000 or 100,000 Irish families to other countries. He should be prepared to give some assent to that proposal if the Government would meet the Irish Members half-way, and would engage, before transporting these people, to settle 100,000 Irish families, now in the overcrowded districts, on the depopulated parts. Then, if there were any Irishmen left requiring to be emigrated and dealt with in the drastic way proposed by the clause, the Government could make their proposal with a better chance than they now could. Then, another point was that even if there was reason for emigrating Irish people, Irish Members ought not to be parties to a scheme binding down that emigration to simply British Colonies, for that meant nothing else than political disfranchisement and political degradation. What were the contemptible politics of Canada compared with the privileged and grand politics of this country? If there were an Imperial system in which the people of Canada, Australia, and elsewhere could make their voices heard in Imperial politics, then Irishmen would not be transported, by emigration, to places where they would have no voice in shaping the destinies of their own race. But if there was to be any exclusive region to which the Irish peasants should be sent it ought to be to the United States. England had, by her policy, diminished the population of Ireland. By a long course of mismanagement she had caused the people of Ireland to become a minority of the Irish race; and, no matter where a race was bred, the minority must be guided by the wishes and will of the majority to a large extent. The centre of the Irish nation had been transported to the United States; and until English statesmen redressed the grievances of Ireland, they must be content to see the Irish people dwelling in their own dominions, following more and more that great and vast majority which they had driven outside their dominions. The constituencies of the Irish Members were, to a great extent, influenced by the greater Irish constituencies across the Atlantic; and if the Government would blindly close their eyes to that fact, and spend £2,000,000 to plant hundreds and thousands of Irish emigrants within the magic circle of British dominion on the borders of the United States, they would only be paying the passage of those people 99-100ths of the way to the American Republic. If, therefore, the Government did not want to conceal their object, they would frankly admit that they were asking the Committee that day to vote large sums of money in order to increase the population of the United States. Deeply as he deplored it, he must still feel that the Irish race would manage to derive a certain amount of comfort from that transaction. He asked, did the Government imagine that the Irish people were going to be caught by the prospect of getting farms at the cost of 40s. each, plus denationalization; that they were to be enticed by the prospect of becoming freeholders at the Antipodes; that they would be parties to a scheme for depopulating Ireland still more; and that they were going to consent, above all, to their brothers being transported to the interior regions of second-class Colonies and Dependencies? As a protest against depopulation, against the disregard of the opinion of the Irish people expressed through their Representatives in Parliament, and against the odious system of British misgovernment in Ireland, he should struggle against this clause line by line, and word by word, and do all in his power to hold it up to contempt. The Government might succeed, after long discussion, in passing the clause in words; but, he said, it was not in the power of the British Parliament to give it effect. He and his hon. Friends pledged themselves to render this scheme of expatriation ineffectual.

MR. BIGGAR said, it was a great misrepresentation to say that this clause was supported by the opinions of Irish Members. The opinions of Irish Members, as a rule, received no consideration whatever; indeed, in matters of this kind, it appeared to be the practice of Ministers to oppose their views, and set their experience at defiance. With regard to the Amendment before the Committee, he took exception to the evidence adduced by the hon. Member in support of a very material part of his case. No doubt, many years ago, the hon. Member had been a Member of a Commission which went into the Western parts of Ireland, and there gathered certain information and experience, and came to a conclusion with regard to the state of the population in those parts, and the proper remedies which should be applied to the existing state of things. But the

hon. Member forgot that a great deal had happened since that time, and particularly that the population of Ireland had fallen away by upwards of 3,000,000. In short, the condition of the country at present was entirely different from what it was in 1835. He did not himself pretend to a very intimate acquaintance with the Western parts of Ireland; still, in the spring of 1880, he had visited the counties of Leitrim and Mayo, and had had a good opportunity of seeing the state of things which existed in those two counties—particularly Mayo—which were intended to be influenced especially by the Bill now before the Committee. His experience of those counties was that the good land there was almost completely depopulated, and that it could support in comfort a very much greater population than existed there at the present time. The population had been entirely cleared away from the neighbourhood of the towns, and there was little else to be seen than large tracts of grass land, which were used for grazing cattle. He believed that a noble Lord had said on one occasion that he would make the grass grow at the doors of the shopkeepers in the streets of the towns in the county of Mayo; and although, he was happy to say, the noble Lord had not been thoroughly successful in carrying out his intentions, anyone having experience of the counties of Leitrim and Mayo would know that the people who cultivated the land had been driven from the good land to the mountain side, and that cattle were now grazing where their dwellings once stood. That state of things proved to the satisfaction of every reasonable person that those two counties were no more over-populated than any of the other counties of Ireland. In some small districts there might be a greater number of inhabitants than in others; but no such thing as a superabundant population existed. What the Government ought to do was to take the matter in hand with a determined spirit, and force the men who, not many years ago, depopulated large tracts of land in Ireland, to allow the people to return to the land from which they had been driven. That was the only substantial remedy which could be applied to the great grievance he had described. With regard to the county of Galway, he knew little beyond the fact that it was a large cattle-feeding county — which proved that it was equally adapted to the feeding of large numbers of the people. But what was the project of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), as expressed in his Amendment? It was that some new Commission or tribunal should be erected by the Government for the purpose of making arrangements for the further depopulation of Ireland. But the real truth of the matter was that Ireland was too thinly populated already. It was an increased and not a decreased population that was wanted there. There might be some small districts in which the population could be lessened with advantage; but it was perfectly within the power of the Government, if the Bill had been properly framed, to have effected this by allowing the people the opportunity of filling up the partially reclaimed lands, which would be sufficient to support a very large population. But instead of that, the Government proposed to transport these people to a climate where probably a large proportion of them would die in a short time. He wished to speak with some degree of plainness. The Government had assisted the landlords in evicting the tenants of Ireland from their holdings, on which they could have lived in comfort had they been permitted to remain in them at a reasonable and fair rent, and they now proposed to send them to a place where the snow lay upon the ground during many months of the year, and where, as a matter of certainty, they would not long survive. In his opinion, these people could neither settle nor live in Canada; they would get from under the British flag, and place themselves under the Stars and Stripes, in a country where they would live as free men—not as slaves. He certainly thought that the clause ought to be at once withdrawn. It was opposed by the great majority of Irish Members in that House with a determined resistance, and he hoped that night would see the last of the scheme of a Liberal Government for the depopulation of Ireland. With regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), which went even further than the proposal of the Government, he could not, of course, entertain it for a moment.

MR. MAC IVER said, he could not help thinking that the clause was unnecessary. No one could call to mind the population of Ireland 20 or 30 years ago, without being struck by the fact that since that time it had decreased by an amount as large as the entire population of Scotland. In the face of that reduction of more than 3,000,000 of people, what case was there for emigration as a remedy for Irish distress? Ireland was already far too much depopulated. He had listened with some regret to the remarks which had fallen from some hon. Members with regard to the Dominion of Canada, which seemed to him perfectly unfair and unwarranted. It was no business of his to speak on behalf of Canada; and yet he might, perhaps, be permitted to do so, because in former times he had been to a large extent connected with the business of emigration. There was at one time at Liverpool great competition between the various lines of steamships.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Member was travelling beyond the Amendment before the Committee. The hon. Member would, at a subsequent period, have an ample opportunity of speaking on the general question.

MR. MAC IVER said, he was simply replying to some remarks made quite recently with reference to the Dominion of Canada; but, if he was ruled out of Order, he should be obliged at another time to call the attention of the Committee to the subject.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the discussion had been too discursive.

MR. MAC IVER then moved to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Mac Iver.)

MR. HEALY said, the Prime Minister had reminded Irish Members that the population of Ireland was steadily diminishing, and that she was not now entitled to the same amount of representation as she had before. He regarded that as a hint from the Government that if Irish Members assented to this further scheme of depopulation, they would find a scheme brought forward for the re-distribution of seats, which would cut down the Representation of Ireland in that House to something very low indeed.

Mr. Mac Iver

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could not, on a Motion to report Progress, speak upon general subjects.

MR. HEALY said, he had always understood that on a Motion to report Progress, it was allowable to speak more widely. He remembered that on a former Motion to report Progress the Chairman allowed an hon. Member to put a question which was not germane to the subject before the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that some reason must be given why the debate should not be continued.

MR. HEALY said, he was not responsible for the Motion to report Progress. The Motion was made in order to give the Government further time to consider the clause. He desired to speak on the clause; but, if he was ruled out of Order, he would sit down.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it would be entirely out of Order for the hon. Member to discuss the clause on the Motion to report Progress.

MR. HEALY wished to know whether he would be in Order in discussing the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that immediately the Motion to report Progress had been disposed of, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury would come before the Committee.

MR. MACFARLANE said, if it would not be out of Order, he wished seriously to appeal to Her Majesty's Government to withdraw the clause. Although hon. Members on both sides of the House had spoken against the clause, he did not remember that a single voice had been raised in its favour. The Irish Members were almost unanimously opposed to it. There were many provisions in the Bill which would be of inestimable value to the Irish tenant, and he did not wish to see the progress of the measure delayed for 12 hours for the sake of this clause, which, if it were ever so good, was not worth fighting for as compared with other portions of the Bill. He observed that Irish Members were determined by every means in their power to resist the clause; and, indeed, he thought they were justified in their opposition. Therefore, for the sake of harmony and dispatch, he appealed to the Government to remove the clause from amongst the valuable concessions made to the Irish tenants in the Bill.

It was entirely incorrect to suppose that Ireland required to be depopulated. What was needed was not emigration but distribution; and he believed that if the Government would put forward a scheme of migration, it would receive the support of hon. Members for Ireland. Looking at the clause as a serious obstacle in the way of the immediate passing of the Bill, he again appealed to the Government to withdraw it.

MR. W. E. FORSTER demurred to the statement of the hon. Member who had just spoken, that all the speeches which had been delivered were against the clause. Eighteen Members had spoken—ten in favour of and eight against the clause. Of these 18 Members, four Irish Members had spoken in favour of the clause and four against it.

MR. R. POWER regretted that the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) had moved to report Progress, and he trusted the Motion would be withdrawn. At the same time, he should be glad if the Government could hold out any hope of the clause being withdrawn, because he believed that its retention would considerably delay the passage of the Bill through the House. For his own part, he felt very strongly upon the subject of emigration; he had done all in his power in conjunction with his Colleagues to resist the scheme, and was determined, if the Government persisted in retaining the clause, to use every Form of the House to prevent its forming part of the Bill.

MR. MAC IVER, reserving his right to continue his remarks upon the subject of emigration to Canada, and in view of the wish expressed by hon. Members, was willing to withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

MR. PARNELL said, before the Motion was withdrawn, he wished to impress on the Government the importance of the remark made by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. R. Power), that the Government should have regard to the opinions of Irish Members expressed on the vote for or against this clause. He could not, of course, tell what would be the result of such vote. It was quite possible that the majority of Irish Members might be in favour of the clause; and, if so, then he thought that the clause ought to stand part of the Bill, but not otherwise. It would simplify matters very much with regard to the question which the Prime Minister had ventilated if the matter were put to the vote amongst Irish Members, the Government being bound by the majority. He could not pretend to say what the result would be; but if the decision was against the wishes of the majority of the Irish constituencies, it would be their fault, and not the fault of the House or the Government. The sooner the Irish constituencies learned that they were responsible in these matters, the better it would be for the Constitutional and Representative Government of Ireland. He did not wish to press unfairly on the Government; but he regretted that they had taken the discussion on the clause that day. The question of emigration was one which was linked into every line of Irish history. It was connected with many unfortunate and horrible occurrences in Ireland, of which he felt sure every Englishman was ashamed at that day. When they looked at the Emigration Returns, it was easy to see how the life-blood of Ireland had been ebbing away; how, since 1841, the population had diminished by 3,000,000 of persons, the actual population showing a very much larger diminution than this 3,000,000, because such diminution would not represent the increase of population which might naturally have been expected to occur in Ireland in the same way as in other countries. Every class of persons in Ireland was interested in this question of emigration. He believed in the truth of the words of Archbishop Manning—that there was in Ireland work for every man, woman, and child, and that there was land enough for each individual of the population of the country. He believed, also, that it only required practical acquaintance with the necessities and possibilities that existed in Ireland, but which could be acquired in no other way than by living there, to enable the people to have that abundance of work which, when applied, would alter the face of large portions of the country.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the hon. Member that it was not competent to discuss the whole of the clause on the Motion to report Progress.

MR. PARNELL said, he did not wish to anticipate the discussion which might take place on this clause. His object was to save time, and prevent reasons which might induce the Government to postpone the clause; but, of course, if the Chairman did not wish him to proceed with the line of argument he was following, he would desist at once.

MR. MULHOLLAND said, lest the silence of Members from the North of Ireland should be misconstrued, he desired to explain that they wished to defer speaking on the clause generally until the Amendment was disposed of. He hoped the Prime Minister would not give any weight to the appeal that had been made to him to withdraw this clause. The second reading of the Bill was supported by the Conservative Members from Ulster, on the faith that this most important clause would remain part of the Bill. The question of emigration, as the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) had said, concerned every man, woman, and child in Ireland. When the time came, he believed he could prove from statistics that the statements which had been made with reference to the under-population of the country were entirely without foundation.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL defied any hon. Member to receive the announcement of the hon. Members for Wexford and Cork—that this clause might delay the Bill for some days—without feelings of dismay, when it was recollected that the Prime Minister had announced that Parliament might be prorogued at the end of the first week in August. That period was now rapidly approaching, and the 26th clause of the Bill was still incomplete. He failed to see how any particular importance could be attached to this clause in its present form, because he was certain that it would be absolutely inoperative. No action could take place upon it. He suggested to the Government, without any after-thought, and being solely actuated by a desire to see the Bill make reasonable progress, that, as in the case of the last clause, they should consent to a compromise, and modify the present clause by providing machinery which would have the real effect of promoting legitimate emigration from Ireland, and that in a manner which would not excite the patriotic feelings of Irish Members. By that means, he thought the present obstinate and alarming opposition to the clause might be obviated, and he trusted that the Government would adopt it for the purpose of facilitating the progress of the Bill.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The position of the question is, to a certain extent, an involved one. At the beginning of the evening my noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) suggested an improvement in the clause in a speech of research and ability; but in consequence of an Amendment which took precedence of the words proposed, the discussion raised by him could not be pursued to its end, and thus we had a new discussion raised by the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens), which approved of the general object of the clause, and proposed additional machinery for the purpose of facilitating emigration, which machinery he regarded as preferable for the execution of the work to that provided by the clause. Well, Sir, we have not been allowed to come to a decision on either of these two Amendments, which is unfortunate, because until we know whether if at all the clause is to be amended, it is premature to come to a decision upon the Question of the clause standing part of the Bill. I hold this to be a most important and most valuable clause. We are quite prepared to discuss the question whether the particular form proposed by the Government is the best. I am inclined to think that it is, and I am not satisfied by the observations which have fallen from my noble Friend, and from the hon. Member for Finsbury, that we should improve it by adopting their suggestions. Those Amendments, however, merit consideration; but we are now on the question of reporting Progress. My hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), who moved it, is willing to withdraw that Motion; and I venture to suggest that if the Committee really desire to discuss the important question contained in the clause, they will do wisely to allow the Motion to report Progress to be withdrawn, so that we may proceed with the consideration of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury.

MR. DAWSON said, that the assertions of the Prime Minister with regard to reclamation of waste land—the changes to be effected, and the manner in which they should take place—afforded ample grounds for the withdrawal of the clause. He was quite at a loss to understand why they should ask the Government of Canada to give 40s. freeholds to Irishmen when there was plenty of land in Ireland which would supply their wants. He would have no objection to emigration per se, if the resources of the country were exhausted; but he maintained that this was far from being the case.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was not at liberty to discuss the merits of the clause on a Motion to report Progress. Discussion on the Motion to report Progress was for the purpose of giving reasons why the Committee should not proceed with the consideration of the Bill.

MR. DAWSON said, it was difficult to understand what hon. Members might discuss on a Motion to report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had explained that already.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought that hon. Members had misunderstood the bearing of the Chairman's ruling. Some of them appeared to believe that, according to that ruling in discussing an Amendment, the clause to which that Amendment applied could not be discussed. But surely that could not be intended, because how could he, for instance, who had an Amendment on the Paper relating to the Boards of Guardians, show that the clause would work better if his Amendment were adopted, unless he could examine the whole clause? If they were not to discuss the clause so long as Amendments with reference to it remained on the Paper, he thought it would be a great convenience if those Amendments were withdrawn until the bearing of the clause was understood, when their discussion could commence with more advantage. They were in this position, that the prestige and eloquence of the Government had already been devoted to laying a certain account of the clause before the Committee, and, as an hon. Member had observed, it appeared that they were to be precluded from criticizing the Government statement because some hon. Member had moved an Amendment. The Government said that the clause conferred such and such benefits; but a number of Amendments were placed on the Paper under the impression that those benefits were by no means conferred by the clause. If, then, they were not allowed to discuss the clause, how could they put forward arguments in support of their Amendments? Under the circumstances, he thought it would be better for hon. Members to withdraw their Amendments from the Paper for a day or two, and when the clause had been properly discussed they could be again brought forward.

MR. CARTWRIGHT said, he thought that the remarks of the hon. Member amounted to a challenge of the ruling of the Chairman, and were entirely out of Order.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the observation of the hon. Member for Dungarvan had relation to the previous Question and not to the Motion to report Progress then before the Committee.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was simply asking for an explanation, because a large number of Members really did not understand the last ruling of the Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member must have observed, by the discussion which had taken place, that every reasonable latitude had been given to hon. Members to speak upon the general working of the clause whilst discussing Amendments. He did not consider that any narrow restriction had been placed on the discussion of any Amendment.

MR. HEALY said, he thought the best thing would be to have a division on the Motion to report Progress. If the Irish Members who were opposed to the clause were in a minority, let the clause stand, and vice versa.

MR. FINIGAN said, he felt very much obliged to the hon. Member for Birkenhead for moving to report Progress, because he thought the Government ought to have further time to consider this very important question. He was not personally opposed to a scheme which would assist the Irish people out of their difficulties; but he considered that those difficulties could be solved in accordance with the Irish national will better by a system of migration than that of emigration to Canada and other Colonies. He believed the Government would best serve the interests of the Bill and the expectations of the Irish people, if they consented to report Progress, or adopted the alternative of leaving emigration to be considered as a separate measure at some future time. The object of the Bill being to create peace and contentment in Ireland, he thought the Government would act wisely in dropping the clause altogether, or in consenting to the Motion to report Progress, in order that some amicable understanding might be come to between the Government and the hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell), who certainly represented Irish opinion upon the subject in that House. If the Motion to report Progress were withdrawn, he trusted it would be on the understanding that some compromise would be arrived at on this very important question.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he thought that when they arrived at the discussion of the important Question whether the clause should stand part of the Bill, the Committee would much regret that they had not had an opportunity of expressing their opinions upon the clause before the Amendments were considered.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, after "Commission," leave out "for the purpose of emigration."—(Mr. Healy.)

MR. O'DONNELL said, he understood the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) to propose that certain powers might be given to the Land Commission, but that they should not be exerted for the purpose of emigration. He thought now, that in harmony with the ruling of the Chairman, and also in harmony with the wishes of those Members of the House who were anxious to discuss this question, that the Committee would now be able to consider the question whether emigration ought to be included amongst the objects of the Land Commission. He thought a much stronger case must be made out for emigration before the Committee could consent to the increased facilities demanded by the Amendment. Irish Members considered that emigration was distinctly injurious to the public welfare of Ireland, and calculated to harm the whole purpose and object of the beneficial measure which had been proposed by the Government. If those facilities were for the purposes of migration, or for the development of Irish industries, as was proposed in a generous moment by the noble Lord the late Postmaster General (Lord John Manners), then, indeed, the objections of a certain number of Members of the House would disappear; but, not content with the alterations to be introduced by the clause, the hon. Member for Finsbury proposed that additional facilities for draining the life-blood of the country should be placed in the Bill—that the clause, in fact, should be turned off in a direction which must militate against the successful operation of the remedial clauses of the measure. The Government had obtained the consent of the Committee to a clause giving security to the tenant, and to a provision for increasing the proportion of peasant proprietors in Ireland; but the hon. Member for Finsbury opposed himself to the beneficial intentions of the Government, and would take upon himself to draw off from the soil of Ireland those who would otherwise become proprietors, and take the place of the large landowners. He thought the hon. Member hardly deserved the compliment paid to him by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, when speaking of the eloquence with which he had introduced his proposal, for, in his opinion, the right hon. Gentleman might have accompanied his recommendation of the hon. Member's style by a strong condemnation of his proposal to maximize the temptations to the depopulation of Ireland. Under the circumstances, he hoped the hon. Member would take steps to cut short the present discussion, and bring the Committee nearer to the consideration of the clause which, like the water that approached the lips of Tantalus, slid away when it was most desired. Were not the powers conferred upon the Commission enough in all conscience for the purpose of emigration? He might object that the Commission had already enough to do without devoting itself to emigration purposes. The Government had said that the Land Commission had so much to do in a judicial capacity that the Board of Works must not be relieved of any of its usual obligations, and that the Land Commission must be left to the great duty of settling the questions between landlord and tenant. For his own part, he wished the Government had left the Land Commission in the undisturbed possession of its powers of judicial regulation of rent; but, seeing that they had proposed to saddle it with the additional and ungrateful task of diminishing the number of applicants for its equitable intervention, and of diminishing the number of those to whom the Bill was intended to bring security and comfort—that was, in itself, a sufficient reason why the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury should not have been introduced.

MR. HEALY observed, that the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that day 12 months, when speaking on the Relief of Distress (Ireland) Bill, said the question under discussion was a matter upon which he must be guided by the feeling of the majority of the Irish Members. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman, on the question now under discussion, thought he should be guided by the feelings of the majority of Irish Members?

MR. DALY said, that he had been, at first, in favour of the clause, having rather too quickly accepted the statement that the emigration was to be voluntary; but he had since discovered that it was to be limited in scope. If the Government had said that the principle of voluntary emigration should apply to the districts where there was a congested population, he should have been in favour of the Government scheme; but he believed that, as it stood at present, it would be injurious to his fellow-countrymen. He regarded the plan of emigration, under any circumstances, as a confession of failure on the part of the Government; and he did not see how anyone who looked at the facts could come to any other opinion than he entertained. Again, in the Government proposal there was no provision whatever that the happiness or prosperity of the emigrants should be secured. Nor was there any security that the contracts entered into by the Companies would be fulfilled. He had simply risen to express his views on the subject of emigration, because the Prime Minister had himself invited an expression of opinion upon that question on the part of Irish Members. He said if justice was to be done under this clause the Government should allow those people of Ireland who for generations had been at the lowest ebb of prosperity to have a certain sum of money for the purpose of emigrating if necessary, and to go where they liked.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he thought that, as the general effect of the Bill would be to lead to the consolidation of holdings, emigration would not be stimulated by the clause. The Emigration Clause would, no doubt, afford some help to the emigrant, and were, so far, beneficial. But his experience as a Member of Parliament was that more applications came to him from the young men of his constituency than the old—from the very men, in fact, whom it was desirable to retain in the country. He now wished to submit one or two considerations which weighed on the other side.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the hon. Member was discussing the clause.

MR. PARNELL wished to know whether it was the ruling of the Chairman that the hon. Member for Limerick could give his reasons in favour of the clause only?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had not ruled the hon. Member out of Order, but had pointed out that the hon. Member was not speaking to the Amendment.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER suggested that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Finsbury should be postponed till the Report, so that the discussion might be relieved of all unnecessary contentious matter.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he certainly never dreamt less of anything than of raising a bone of contention. He had made his suggestion in perfect good faith, and he really believed that it might have been accepted by Her Majesty's Government. If he had not thought so he would not have moved it. As it was, he begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether the hon. Member for Wexford would also withdraw his Amendment?

MR. BIGGAR said, that his hon. Friend was not present, and had not left any instructions with him upon the subject; and he was, therefore, not prepared to withdraw it on his hon. Friend's behalf. It appeared to him that the Amendment was an exceedingly reasonable one. As he understood it, it did not criticize the clause at all, but merely expressed the opinion, in very explicit terms, that emigration was not desirable. Now, if he might make a suggestion to the Prime Minister, it would be that the Government should give the Committee some reason in favour of the proposed emigration. He did not remember, in any of the speeches they had heard, hearing any argument in favour of emigration, or any statement of facts which would lead them to the belief that emigration was desirable. He thought that if they were to have from the Government some explanation of the reasons of their introduction of that project of emigration, they might then be better disposed to entertain an idea of the subject. But, as the matter at present stood, they were really entirely in the dark; and, so far as he knew, they had not heard a single statement in favour of the principle, and until that had been supplied he thought the Amendment should stand as it did, and that they should oppose the general principle until some argument had been advanced in favour of it. He believed that it was a general principle that no legislation should be proceeded with until they had had some arguments in favour of it. Of course, all legislation involved the question of time, and certainly would in regard to that particular case, because the expense and the risk of waste of public money involved in the scheme might entail a great deal of misery and annoyance; and, therefore, he thought that the Amendment should not be withdrawn.

MR. LEAMY said, he thought it was well that they should take a division on the Amendment. They had been discussing it for some considerable time. For his own part, when he saw the Bill the first time, he considered that there were two blots in it. The first was the absence of any clause relating to arrears of rent; and the second was the presence of the clause regarding emigration. For his part, he should use every form of the House to resist the clause.

Amendment and the proposed Amendment of it negatived.

MR. BIGGAR proposed, in page 18, line 12, to leave out the words "from time to time" in order to insert the words "till the 31st of December 1881."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. O'DONNELL rose to Order. He had had an Amendment which he had not been present to move at its proper time. He wished to insert the words "with the consent of the Board of Guardians," after the words "Land Commission." He wished to know whether he was in Order in moving that Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member could move his Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that, as he understood the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had a similar Amendment on the Paper, he would not move his own.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the Amendment he had moved was a very simple proposition, and he would at once state his reasons for it. The Bill proposed to allow the Land Commission to do certain things. It had, first of all, to settle rents. It had to make arrangements with regard to leases, and the buying and selling of property, and a number of different things. If the Bill was to be of a generally beneficial nature, as they were led to believe, though on that subject he need not offer any opinion, the result would be that there would be very little occasion for emigration at all. It was alleged by the advocates of the Bill that the prosperity of Ireland would so suddenly become great that all the parties who had been evicted for non-payment of rent would be reinstated, and that those in arrears would, by some legerdmain of the Chief Secretary, get rid of their arrears, and that there would be a general state of what was called the millenium. But it was held to be desirable that in certain districts a proportion of the population should be transported to an inhospitable clime; and, if that was so, the only excuse for such deportation would be that every beneficial provision of the Bill would not have time to come into effect, and for that reason it was desirable that a certain small number of the people should be induced to emigrate. He thought it was desirable that that system should come to an end as speedily as possible, and for that reason he proposed that the operation of the clause should cease at the 31st of December, 1881.

MR. DAWSON said, he was about to say that the Prime Minister, by the concessions he had made, and which he had promised to bring in in express form before the discussion was over, had really taken away any ground there might be for the necessity for the clause. What they contended was, that if in Ireland some inducement could be offered for putting the waste lands in Ireland in the hands of the people, as in Canada and in Australia, the present difficulty could be got over. He was not so sentimental as to think that the Irish people should be kept in Ireland, or even that the English people who left their country should be kept in England, if its resources were fully developed and exhausted. But it was clearly proved to demonstration that there was a lot of land in Ireland which was perfectly capable of supporting the Irish people. The Prime Minister had, with great wisdom, and with great congeniality of manner, really conceded that question when he said that he would allow the tenants to become the reclaimers of land. He had even shown that he would allow the Companies and the branch societies to employ labourers, and would extend the provisions of the Act so as to open up the reclamation of the land. He thought that that took away the urgent necessity for expatriating the Irish people. They had heard a great deal about the expropriation of Irish landlords. Well, he did not like the expropriation of Irish landlords or anyone else; but the Bill proposed the expropriation of the Irish people en masse when it was entirely unnecessary. If they had not exhausted the resources of the country, let them proceed to develop them, and not send the labourers as forced exiles out of a country which offered them comfort and happiness at home. Now, the Prime Minister had spoken of the financial conscience of the Empire. Well, if Canada was able to offer waste land at £1 a head, and make 40s. freeholders, why should not Ireland first make such offers before the Irish had to leave their native country. The Prime Minister had almost answered that question when he said that if Canada and the other Colonies could offer such terms and give such inducements, why could not this country, with the greatest credit at its command, do so also? The Government had to advance money for labour, and what was wanted was labour. But the labour was in Ireland. Let them supply the labour to the soil, and they would electrify all that mass which was at present unable to give life to the people. Mr. John Stuart Mill had said that the reclamation of waste lands was a proper thing, and not only a proper thing, but a proper course for the Parliament of Great Britain to pursue in Ireland. A very great English statesman was once sent to Ireland, and he was reported to have made use of a sentence with which his name was inseparably connected. He said that when the people of a country left that country en masse, it showed that the Government of that country had a judgment on them. But when a Government forced the people to leave the country en masse, they not only stood condemned, but disgraced in the eyes of those who saw that it was possible to keep them there. He wanted to know why it was that the Government should force the people away? They were told that they were putting their hands in the taxpayers' pockets; but they did not want to do that. They did not want to strain the financial conscience of the nation. Unfortunately, so lamentable was the legislation for Ireland, that everything the Irish people did not want was forced upon them, and everything they required was refused them. He hoped that the Government would follow up the concessions that had been made by opening up the land of Ireland, when, instead of receiving a judgment of condemnation, they would earn the respect and gratitude of the people who would live in their own country so long as it was able to support them.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am not going to allude to this question, except so far as to say that the supposition that the Government intend to force emigration is absolutely contrary to the feelings and object of the Government, and that there is no such kind of meaning which by any interpretation can be attributed to the clause. But I must call the attention of the Committee for a moment to the Amendment before us. I understand that the hon. Member for Cavan has seriously moved it? [MR. BIGGAR: Yes.] The hon. Member proposes that the clause shall be so amended that the Land Commission shall only be allowed to take action till the end of the year. I cannot conceive any argument which could be used in favour of a limitation of the clause for only one year. The clause would be perfectly useless.

MR. LEAMY said, he would suggest to the hon. Member for Cavan that he might consent to placing a limit to the time during which the Commission might exercise the power, not of forcing emigration, but of promoting emigration, and that the limit should correspond with the time when the Coercion Act should expire. The Chief Secretary seemed to have two most effective remedies for repressing discontent in Ireland, which were exile and imprisonment; and he would suggest that they should both come to a conclusion together. The clause had been introduced into the Bill for the purpose of coming to the aid of those landlords who existed by putting their tenants into arrears. He did not intend to discuss the clause; but he believed that if it were passed they would find the unfortunate tenants in the West of Ireland in arrears because they could not pay their rent, and they would have but two alternatives—the poor house on the one hand, and the emigration agent on the other. It was all very well to say that was not a forced emigration; but if they had the power of the law driving out the tenants who could not pay their rents owing to the bad harvests, and throwing them out into the road-side, and then the emigration agent coming and tempting them to cross the Atlantic as the only resource, what was that but a forced emigration? They were of opinion that too many of their people had gone across the seas already. They looked with the utmost confidence, knowing the struggle their country had made, and the splendid resistance she had made to the attempts made from time to time to crush out her national life, to their people coming back from America, and not to see them going away in thousands.

Mr. O'DONNELL said, he was amused to hear the solemn assurance of the Chief Secretary that that clause and the proposal for emigration were by no means to be understood to imply that the Government intended to force the people to emigrate. Those solemn assurances of the Government sounded extremely well. They had had a large number of them. Of course, he was not going to suggest that their veracity was to be impugned; but, notwithstanding, looking to the fact that the Premier and the Chief Secretary for Ireland were in such marked ways the pre-destined victims of an inexplicable fatality, he thought that the Members for Ireland would do well to be on their guard against the solemn assurances of such unfortunate personages. For these reasons and others he should much prefer not to intrust the Government with the power of facilitating emigration from Ireland, for something or other was sure to happen to upset all the solemn assurances, and to defeat all the expectations which the solemn assurances might have awakened in the guileless bosoms of the Irish Members who sat on the other side of the House.

Mr. BIGGAR said, that he was serious with regard to that particular Amendment, because he thought that the whole principle was thoroughly mischievous. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had treated them to another short speech, in which he said that he did not wish to urge the Irish people to emigrate. If that were so, why did the Government urge the proposal at all? Why did they not give the Committee some reason for the proposal? Seeing, however, that no reason had been urged in favour of the proposal, he thought they were thoroughly justified in asking that the time during which the transportation of the Irish surplus population was to take place should be as much curtailed as possible.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that the hon. Member for Cavan had taunted the Government with having given no reason for their proposal. Now, Members sitting on that side of the House had not troubled the Committee in that discussion, because he believed that, in the main, they desired not to hamper or hinder the progress of the Bill by taking part in a discussion which was mainly got up for the purpose of obstruction. But he desired to say that he considered the Government had very good reason for the introduction of such a proposition. It was not a question of the Government forcing the people of Ireland to emigrate at all. It was not even a question of inducing them to do so. It was a question of offering facilities to those who desired to emigrate to do that which they wished to do, and Members from Ireland in opposing that were opposing what the people of Ireland themselves desired. Now, the hon. Member for Cavan asked for reasons why the Government proposed that clause. He had the honour of hearing the evidence given before the Richmond Commission, and a gentleman gave evidence before that Commission whose name, he thought, was deserving of the confidence even of hon. Members below the Gangway—he meant Professor Baldwin.

tenantry, with whom he had consulted in the West of Ireland, were entirely in favour of emigration; and he had stated that he believed that if they were given the great majority of the poor and wretched people living in the West of Ireland would gladly emigrate. That was the reason the Government had introduced the clause. In his opinion the Bill failed of the object it desired to attain if there were not some such clause in it. It was quite idle to suppose any alteration of the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland for one moment, meet the misery and wretchedness which existed in a large portion of Ireland. It was impossible, if they were to give the people their land for nothing, that they could exist in comfort and decency, therefore it was that the Government had put into the Bill some provision which those who desired to emigrate, and those only, should be afforded facilities for doing so. How hon.
Members from Ireland, who said that they did not represent the interests of the tenantry at all, could object to that clause, which was a merciful clause, passed his commission to understand if they were not in what they said. For his own part, having taken a great and deep interest in that question, he believed there was no part of the Bill which was to do more good than that clause, and himself spoken to many tenants in most parts of Ireland, and he had always found their attachment to their native soil so great that they would wish to remain upon it as long as it afforded them something to eat—with that they would be content. The right hon. Gentleman had asked the Committee to postpone the clause until the end of the Bill. That was a proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman on the previous evening, when he was told that the Bill, and particularly this special portion of it, would be fought out to the end. The Irish Members felt deeply and warmly on this matter of emigration, and they were not prepared to accept the maxima ascribed to various statesmen who had spoken and written on the subject. The same principle was adopted in the year 1847; but no one could say that it succeeded then, or was likely to succeed if adopted in the present crisis. The hon.

Member for Finsbury (Mr. W. M. Torrens) had spoken at large about the great advantages which were offered by Canada to intending emigrants, and perhaps what the hon. Member had said was perfectly true; but if it was so, he would like to ask the hon. Member why he did not himself go there? As far as he knew of the people of Ireland, he was certain that there was a large contented class wishing to remain in the country of their birth, and the emigration proposals of the Government could only have effect with the discontented sections of the Irish people, whose numbers in an ab-

in favour of migration as against emigration, in view of the fact that in Ireland there were thousands of acres of reclaimable land. He must say that his views on this subject were so strong, and as he believed, so strongly based in reason, that he should avail himself of all the Forms of the House in order strenuously to oppose the clause.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he thought the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. R. Power) had done less than justice to the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie), whose statement, in the course of his speech, was to the effect not only that the Irish people desired a system of emigration, but that such suggestion was backed up by the evidence of Professor Baldwin. In proof of his statement, the hon. Member said he had in his possession, as had also every hon. Member of the House, a copy of Professor Baldwin's evidence given before the Commission, in the course of which he stated that half the people would prefer emigration to migration, as was shown by the fact that of 260 tenants to whom he had put the question, not less than 164 were in favour of emigration. He was perfectly prepared to admit that the present might not, perhaps, be the best occasion to introduce this matter; but he could not allow it to be passed without expressing his opinion on the subject, and stating that when the question was properly before the Committee, he should be prepared to make a proposal, which, if it was adopted, would carry out the views which he held, and which were held by a considerable section of the House, in regard to what he might describe as the emigration proposals contained in the Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for Waterford had stated that it was his intention to oppose the clause to the bitter end; and as he and his friends who held the same views had been largely influenced by the presence of the clause in the Bill, they would hold themselves free to take whatever course they might think necessary in the event of the clause being dropped.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets had based their arguments upon statements made in evidence by Professor Baldwin; but they had only relied on isolated passages.

Mr. R. Power

MR. CHAPLIN said, he had only quoted isolated passages in Professor Baldwin's evidence, because at this particular juncture he was only dealing with the question of migration as against emigration.

MR. PARNELL said, the hon. Member had culled out from the evidence of Professor Baldwin isolated passages which did not give a correct idea of his evidence taken as a whole. It was evident, from the statements which the learned Professor had made, that he was in favour of migration as against emigration; and that, in his view, there was in the county of Mayo an abundance of cultivable land for the use of the surplus population—an observation which might also be applied to the counties of Donegal and Kerry. In answer to other questions which were put to him in reference to emigration and migration, Professor Baldwin said he should not like to see a single able-bodied man leave the country as long as there was in it land which could be improved. It was perfectly true that Professor Baldwin said further that he was in favour of offering the people the alternative of emigration, many of them being in favour of such a course; but no one considering this question ought to forget the fact that the opinion expressed by Professor Baldwin was contained in evidence which he gave as far back as the 4th of March, 1860, when there was no prospect of a measure being introduced for the purpose of giving the very poor in Ireland an alternative between starvation, the workhouse, and emigration. He could not but regret that Her Majesty's Government had thought fit to introduce what he might describe as an Emigration Clause instead of proposing something which would enable the waste lands of Ireland to be reclaimed and brought into cultivation, and so preventing a moiety of the starving and despairing population of the country from taking the earliest opportunity that offered of leaving their native land and emigrating to, perhaps, the other side of the world. If this was done the congestion which now existed in many parts of the country would be got rid of. He asked the Committee why they wasted their own time, and that of the country, in discussing a proposal which would stand no chance of acceptance by the Representatives of English working men and ought not, because of its inherent injustice, to be forced upon the Irish people?

MR. STOREY said, he became a Member of the House with no engagements to his constituents in reference to the Land Bill; but, as representing a large working-class constituency, he wished that the scope of the measure might be so enlarged as that it should afford a complete remedy for the prevalent distress in Ireland. Therefore, he had possibly been more often than any other Member on that side of the House in opposition to Her Majesty's Government; but he should be the last to oppose them in any proposal to enlarge the scope of the Bill. He wished to ask whom it was proposed to assist in emigrating? Did the Government mean this clause to be used in assisting the better class of Irish tenants in emigrating—tenants, he meant, who were farming holdings ranging between 50 and 300 acres? If that were so, he could only say that there was no necessity for any such assistance, inasmuch as the farmers of such holdings had means enough and wit enough to take the step for themselves if they thought it to their interest. It was the poorest and most miserable class of tenants—those in Mayo, Galway, and other districts in the West of Ireland—whom it was intended to deal with; and, that being so, he was not surprised to find the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) supporting the proposal. What was the position of these tenants under the Bill? It was said that the Bill would confer upon them the right to sell their tenancies; but he would ask what man would be found to buy a tenancy in the present circumstances in the poorer districts in the West of Ireland? If they could not sell, what else could they do? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had been the mouth-piece of the Government in the unpopular cause of coercion; and it was therefore, perhaps, fitting that he should again be the mouth-piece of his Colleagues when they were offering a bribe to the tenants. He proposed that they should be released of a year's rent, but only on condition that they paid one year's rent down—a thing most of them could not do.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the remarks of the hon. Member were wide of the subject immediately before the Committee.

MR. STOREY said, all he wished to do was to prove that the Emigration Clause of the Government was a bad one, as it stood, in that it would drive out of Ireland a large class of men whom it was the interest of the country to retain, and who, not being able to sell or to compound for their rent, were to be expatriated under that Emigration Clause. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets was astonished that Members from Ireland should not be willing to assist emigration from their country; but he (Mr. Storey) held it to be patriotic to endeavour to keep the men in the country. Who would be the men to leave our shores? Who were those that went from his own county of Durham? Were they the weak and the useless, and those they would wish to get rid of? No, they were the bone and marrow of the country; and were hon. Members to be twitted with being void of patriotism if they sought to keep these men in the country? He held it to be the true policy to endeavour to retain them, and therefore it was he joined with Irish Members in objecting to the Government proposal contained in the clause. He thought it very possible that later on in the discussion he might have some further remarks to make on the proposal of the Government; but, at any rate, as one English Member—and he was quite prepared to believe there were more, that there were a great number who would do wisely to open their mouths instead of sitting still—but be that as it might, though he stood alone, he should declare his deliberate conviction that the Government would do wisely to drop this Emigration Clause. The hon. Member for Cork City (Mr. Parnell) truly said the condition of things in Ireland would be greatly altered by the Bill; and under these new conditions they should seek to keep the Irish people at home, with the means of livelihood in their own country. As an Englishman he did not want to see them passing over to America, with bitterness and anger in their hearts. Let the Irish working man be fixed on the Irish soil, and if there must be emigration, let it not be that of the industrious classes, but of those smug self-satisfied Gentlemen whose only remedy for the evils of the country seemed to be to sweep from the shores of Ireland the cream of the Irish work-people.

MR. W. E. FORSTER welcomed the addition that the hon. Member for Sun-

derland had clearly shown to the debating power of the House, though he could not fully agree with his remarks. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) must endeavour to abide by the Chairman's decision and not debate the clause; but he must remove some misconceptions that existed as to the policy of the Government as contained in the clause. It did considerably and beneficially enlarge the scope of the Bill. One advantage there had been in this discussion in that it had called from Irish Members below the Gangway expressions of confidence in the general results of this measure. These expressions of hope and confidence it had given him great pleasure to hear, and they were rather stronger than he had heard at earlier stages of these discussions. The hon. Member for Cork City began by describing the condition of the poor cottier tenants in America, and he ended by saying let all that could take advantage of the Bill and remain in Ireland, and let them have no emigration. Now, in a few words he might be allowed to say why the clause was brought in. The Government had the condition of Irish tenants, and especially of Irish cottier tenants, before them; it had been occupying all their attention, and they had succeeded in getting the House to give the whole of the Session to the consideration of the subject. ["No, no!"] Well, at any rate, the last two or three months. The Government believed it was necessary to make great changes in the relations of landlord and tenant; but it was true, and it had been stated over and over again even by the hon. Member for Cork City and those opposed to this clause, that a mere change in the relations between landlord and tenant would not meet the condition of the cottier tenants. Well, that being generally acknowledged, the Government brought other plans before the House. There was the proposal for reclamation, as to which he would say he did not believe with some that it would be waste paper, but, on the contrary, that it would be put in force with great effect; and there was also offered that alternative which Professor Baldwin had suggested—the alternative of emigration. The Government entirely disavowed every kind of intention to force the people to emigrate; and he could not conceive that anybody who read the clause could suppose they did. He really did not know the use of language by the framers of the Act in expressing their views and intentions if, with the words before them, hon. Members could believe it was the intention to force tenants to emigrate or to do anything more than enable Government assistance to be given to those who wished to emigrate. He would not enter into the particular provision by which it was hoped that object would be attained, but would address himself to the remarks which had been made, and to removing some of the misconceptions that had arisen, and he was prepared to make two or three verbal Amendments, which would show that some of the remarks were unfounded. The word "promoting" had been objected to as too strong a word, and he would propose to substitute the word "assist." It was a little different; and, at any rate, it was not open to the charge that had been made against the use of "promoting," as in some way urging and compelling, and "assist" could not have that meaning. One of the great objects was to regulate emigration. There was less emigration this year than last, and he was very glad that that should be so, for he accepted it as a proof that there was less distress to cause emigration; but, as he had said, a great object was to have emigration better regulated. It was a great merit among the younger members of a family that they were willing to take on themselves the burden of supporting their parents where they were able to do so, and they would more often emigrate if they could take members of their family with them. Therefore, the Government wished to assist, as far as possible, the emigration of families. To give such facilities he proposed to submit an Amendment to the 24th line, after the word "commission," to add—

"And such regulations as may be provided relative to the mode of the application of the loan, and of repayments for shipment, transport, and reception of emigrants."

Giving this public notice of what the Government intended, he hoped now the Committee might go to a division on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan. He was sorry to anticipate by thus stating the Government intentions; but he thought he might appeal with confidence to all impartial persons when he said this clause was proposed by the Government as one of many remedies—a very important one, though not the most important—for the great miseries that exist in the crowded districts in Ireland.

MR. CALLAN asked, was it intended that the clause should be confined to Canada and British Possessions only?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he intended to state that he would move to omit the words "Dominion of Canada, or of any province thereof," and make it applicable to any British Colony or Dependency. It was a mistake to suppose that emigration would be limited to a British Colony; but it would be hardly possible to enter into agreements with foreign Governments in regard to it; but the other words "or on behalf of any public company" would leave it open, supposing the arrangements were of a proper character, to conduct emigration to the United States or elsewhere.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, whether Canada was left in the clause or not, the effect would be that the emigration under the clause would be to that country and nowhere else, and for this reason—other British Colonies were too far away, and the cost of removal would be too great; so it was to Canada that the people would inevitably be emigrated. Now, he was very grateful, and so, he was sure, were the Irish people, to the Dominion of Canada for the generous kindness exhibited during the recent Famine; but they must remember that when the Irish people chose to emigrate of their own motion and by their own resources, it was not to Canada they went; but, under the operation of this clause, to Canada they would be sent, whether the word "Canada" was in or out of the clause.

MR. HEALY felt sure it would not be unreasonable to report Progress at a quarter past 1, considering that the Committee would resume again at 12 o'clock, and that they had been engaged since 2 in the afternoon. He begged to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Healy.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he really thought that the question raised on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan had been sufficiently discussed to allow of a decision being taken. That being decided, he would not ask the Committee to proceed further.

MR. HEALY, on that understanding, begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

MOTION.

POOR RELIEF AND AUDIT OF ACCOUNTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—[BILL 182.]

(The Lord Advocate, Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.)

NOMINATION OF SELECT COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Select Committee on the Poor Relief and Audit of Accounts (Scotland) Bill, do consist of Nineteen Members."—(The Lord Advocate.)

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he was surprised at the course Her Majesty's Government had taken with respect to this Bill. A short time ago a meeting of Scotch Members was held upstairs, at which he was not able to be present on account of a debate in the House; but he had taken occasion to inform himself of what took place, and he understood that an agreement was arrived at that one of the Scotch Bills before Parliament should be proceeded with this Session—the Educational Endowments Bill. He was surprised, therefore, to find that the Bill now under notice had been read a second time at a late hour a few nights before, and was now to be sent to a Select Committee. He would also beg to remind the right hon. and learned Gentleman that on the 28th of June the Prime Minister reminded the House that the 28th of June this Session was equal to the 28th of July of an ordinary Session, and that, therefore, the House had arrived at what was practically the 12th of August, and not July; and he believed it was quite unprecedented that a Bill of this importance should, on such a date, be sent to a Select Committee, nor did he understand why it should be sent to a Select Committee at all. Why not discuss it in Committee of the Whole House, like other Bills? There was nothing mysterious about the Bill, and treating it in this manner would encourage the idea that there was that about Scotch Bills that could not be understood, and English Members never would understand them so long as they were sent to Committees upstairs. Why, he wished to know, had the Bill been proceeded with? And to give the Government the opportunity of informing the House, he begged to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
 (Colonel Alexander.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, really, the vehement speech of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was entirely in consequence of his not having been at the meeting referred to; if he had been, he would have known that exactly the opposite of what he had stated took place.

COLONEL ALEXANDER: I was at a debate in the House.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was there, and in a position to state what did take place, for he happened to occupy the Chair. The course which the Lord Advocate had taken was that recommended unanimously, he believed, by the Members present at the meeting. There was no such understanding as that stated by the hon. and gallant Member, that only one Bill should be proceeded with; but, on the contrary, there was a strong opinion that two Bills should be proceeded with, and the question of this Bill was fully brought under consideration, and the suggestion of many Members who were present was unanimously adopted, that the Bill should be sent to a Committee upstairs. And yet the hon. and gallant Gentleman came now and denounced the Government for taking a course which was recommended by a majority certainly, and, he believed, unanimously, of the Scotch Members then present. There were complaints that Scotch Business was not attended to; but the very moment an attempt was made to forward a Scotch Bill a single stage, a Scotch Member rose and denounced the Government for the attempt, and did his best to obstruct the progress of the Bill—and this was being done now. This was an administrative Bill of much utility; no one ever pretended that the Government desired to press it, they desired that the Bill should be thoroughly examined. The hon. and gallant Member said that Scotch Business would never be understood, because it was sent to a Select Committee; but surely English Bills were always sent to a Select Committee when those Bills contained matters of detail requiring careful and minute consideration. It was no great encouragement to forward Scotch Business if, when the Government were making an effort of this kind on the unanimous understanding with Scotch Members, up starts the hon. and gallant Gentleman and did his best to thwart and defeat the course taken on advice from Scotch Members.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he must say his impression of what occurred was not the same as that of the right hon. Gentleman. He was sure that Scotch Members were delighted to have the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and they almost felt it did away with the desire to have a Scotch Minister of State. Probably there was only one Member who was not quite satisfied with the position there, and that was the Lord Advocate himself, for hitherto he, holding a high and honourable position, ruled supreme; but he must have felt a little overshadowed by the Home Secretary. But, at the meeting, the conclusion was this—it was a sort of dictatorial conclusion, no vote was taken, and few Members spoke—but the right hon. Gentleman, with that prescience for which he was so conspicuous, seemed to conceive the opinions of every person present—he summed up in this way, at all events, the measure that ought to be proceeded with was the Educational Endowments Bill. He said, in his metaphorical language, that was the horse that was to win; he did not know whether a second horse might be placed at all; but he understood that if there was to be a second measure it was the Teinds Bill. Such was his impression of what took place, and all he could say was that the Bill for which the Committee was now proposed was ignored by the right hon. Gentleman as an impossible thing; and as to a Committee being proposed or suggested by himself or the Lord Advocate it never was at that meeting.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, rising to explain, said, it was generally understood by the Scotch Members that the Bill could not be got through this Session; but it was pressed upon him that, if sent to a Select Committee, the subject might be investigated with the view of taking it up next Session.

MR. ORR-EWING said, he would not bring his opinion against the right hon. Gentleman's recollection. No doubt, his intellect was much the keener; but, at all events, the impression on the minds of the bulk of the Members present was that it was an impossible thing, and it never suggested itself to his mind. But it was an extraordinary thing, for, if there was any measure that had general support from Scotch Members after the Educational Endowments Bill, it was the Teinds Bill. It was introduced by the Government, and read a second time, only one Scotch Member opposing it; there was no block in the way, but only Amendments, and why it had not been proceeded with he would like the Lord Advocate to explain. Every party in Scotland supported it; it had been petitioned for by many boroughs in Scotland, the only opposition being ecclesiastical, and the only Scotch Member offering opposition being the hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Dick-Peddie); and yet it was said it was impossible to carry the Bill through. If there was a Committee of Scotch Members, and a Secretary of State honoured them by presiding, he ought to take a deliberate vote and not gather opinions from hearsay, and then bring up such measures as were really supported by Scotch Members, and not such as would be advantageous to a particular Party.

MR. HEALY asked the Lord Advocate—for he had received several letters from Scotland, and he really did not know anything about it—was it a fact that the Government did not intend to proceed beyond the Committee this year?

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion, and he would take the opportunity to disavow any intention of obstructing Scotch Business. He agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. Orr-Ewing) that the feeling in Scotland was very much against the Government for having withdrawn the Teinds Bill. A large meeting, held in Edinburgh last winter, gave expression to a desire for legislation—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not entitled to make a second speech in asking leave to withdraw his Motion.

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, he would only express his great disappointment that the Bill had been withdrawn. He begged leave to withdraw his Motion.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. M'LAREN) said, it was quite true that the Government did not expect to pass the measure during the present Session. So far back as 1871, a Committee of the House was appointed, who received a large quantity of evidence on the subject, and almost unanimously recommended the changes in the Poor Law of Scotland which were embodied in the Bill. Bills founded on the Report of the Committee had been introduced in successive years during the interval of 10 years, which had since elapsed, but no progress had been made, because it was impossible for the House, within a limited time, to discuss the various details of such a measure in Committee of the Whole House. Accordingly, at a meeting of Scotch Members which took place at an early period of the Session with reference to this and other forms of local government, a strong desire was expressed that the measure should be re-introduced with the view of its being considered by a Committee upstairs; and he must express his surprise that the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. Orr-Ewing) had taken up the position he had in throwing doubt on the propriety of the course adopted, for he well remembered that at this meeting it was his suggestion that before and beyond all other reforms connected with Scotch local government the Bill for the amendment of the Poor Law ought to be introduced. He would only say, in respect to the meeting referred to by the Home Secretary, that his recollection of what took place was substantially in accord with that of his right hon. Friend. It must be quite plain that it would be impossible to expect that during the Session the Bill would be considered in Committee of the Whole House; but, looking at the fate of former Bills on the same subject, he ventured to indulge the hope that by referring it to a Committee upstairs it would be so improved and perfected as to admit of its introduction in a subsequent Session and its passage without serious opposition. As to the Teinds Bill, that was no longer before the House, it having been withdrawn last week. That it was withdrawn was due to circumstances for which he was not responsible. It was his earnest desire, if possible, to proceed with it; but at the meeting to which reference had been made, an hon. Member intimated that he was prepared to use all the Forms of the House at every stage when the Bill was before the House to prevent its passing. Now, he would appeal to hon. Members whether, under the circumstances, and knowing as he did that there was other opposition, without which that which he had mentioned would not have been sufficient—that there was a considerable body of opposition—would it have been right to keep the Bill on the Paper, when it was absolutely certain, looking at the many more important engagements of the Government, that the Bill could not be sent up to the other House in time to pass this Session?

MR. ORR-EWING said, he was not opposed to the improvement of Poor Law management in Scotland, and he did think it was more likely to be legislated upon this year than the Educational Endowments Bill. But that was not the decision of the Committee of Scotch Members they had heard of, and he understood that the Home Secretary was to be guided by that. He was not opposed to the Committee, late as it was; but he understood it was the intention not only to pass the Bill through Committee, but, if possible, to make it law this year; hence his opposition.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) BILL.—[Bill 135.]
(Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Forster, Mr. Bright, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [TWENTY-SIXTH NIGHT.]

[Progress 12th July.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

PART V.

ACQUISITION OF LAND BY TENANTS, RECLAMATION OF LAND, AND EMIGRATION.

Reclamation of Land and Emigration.

Clause 26 (Emigration).

MR. BIGGAR said, the Committee were in rather a peculiar position at the present moment with regard to the Amendments which stood on the Paper. In the first place, the printed sheets containing the Amendments had not yet reached the Vote Office, and he knew how inconvenient it was for Members of the Committee to discuss Amendment when they had not a copy of them before them. In addition, the Committee were in this awkward position, that there was no Minister of the Crown present to listen to the arguments which they wished to adduce; and, under those circumstances, he would move that the Chairman report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. Biggar.)

MR. HEALY said, it was an extraordinary thing that the Government should bring Members down at that hour of the day, and that not one of the Members of the Government should turn up himself. They had kept hon. Members there until 2 o'clock in the morning, and had insisted on their being there again at 12 o'clock in the day. Yet when they came down they found that they could not get a copy of the Amendments at the Vote Office, and when they entered the House they found that there was not a single Member of the Government in his place. He was certainly not surprised that, under these circumstances, his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) had moved to report Progress, and he trusted his hon. Friend would divide the Committee.

MR. LITTON said, he hoped that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was not serious in asking the Committee to report Progress. No doubt, it was an unfortunate circumstance that the Amendments placed on the Paper had not reached the Vote Office; but they appeared with the Amendments issued to hon. Members that morning at their private residences, along with the other Parliamentary Papers, and he presumed that they were easily obtainable. He also regretted that Her Majesty's Government, or, at any rate, some of them, were not present; but, at the same time, it would be exceedingly inconvenient for the Committee to report Progress, and that the whole day should be lost at a time when it was of the utmost importance that they should make progress with the measure from day to day.

MR. MACDONALD rose to Order. At the same time, he was afraid he might be out of Order in rising; but the question which he wished to put to the Chairman was this, as there were no Amendments obtainable at the Vote

Office, how could they discuss the Bill in the absence of the Amendments?

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not a question of Order. The Amendments were delivered this morning with the blue paper Votes. The only thing that has not yet arrived is a copy of the Amendments on white paper. I myself received the blue paper Votes this morning, together with other hon. Members, and the simple difficulty is that the white paper Amendments have not yet reached the Vote Office.

MR. LITTON said he could not understand the great anxiety which hon. Members evinced in rising upon points of Order, which, so far from being in Order, were themselves most disorderly. The complaint made was that the Amendments were not on the Paper. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) must be aware that it was not necessary to have an Amendment on the Paper in order that he might be able to move it. An hon. Member having an Amendment on the Paper which had not yet reached the Vote Office was still competent to move it.

MR. LEAMY thought the Motion to report Progress was very reasonable upon this ground—if an hon. Member moved an Amendment there was not a single person responsible for the Government to say whether they would accept it or not. The Irish Members were treated very unfairly. They had been kept there until 2 o'clock in the morning, and if they moved at any time to report Progress they were accused of impeding the progress of the Bill. He was very much astonished to find that right hon. Gentlemen opposite took so little interest in the Bill that they declined to come down to support it.

MR. GLADSTONE (who had just entered the House): If the hon. Gentleman thinks it consistent with his dignity and with decency to hold such language about the small amount of interest which the Government take in the Bill I can only express my surprise. It is quite open to the hon. Gentleman to repeat that language as often as he pleases; but I trust that that will not be the feeling of his Irish fellow-countrymen, and I hope that no further time will be lost in proceeding with the measure.

THE CHAIRMAN: We are now upon the question of reporting Progress.

[Twenty-sixth Night.]

MR. GLADSTONE: Whether the Government have no interest in the Bill or not they are now present, and I hope the Motion will be withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: I may mention for the convenience of hon. Members that the white paper copy of the Votes has now arrived, and may be had in the Vote Office.

MR. HEALY said, the reason for reporting Progress was not because Ministers were absent, but because the Committee could not get a single Amendment, and as a protest against the way in which they were treated in being brought down at that time of the day when the Government were not ready to go on with the Bill. He hoped that his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would take a division upon the question. If the Government threw too much work upon the printing department that was not the fault of the Irish Members. He certainly did not see how they were to go on with the discussion of the Bill unless they knew what the Amendments were. What, therefore, was the good of bringing them down at 12 o'clock in the day?

MR. MACDONALD thought that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) would be exceedingly ill-advised if he pressed his Motion to a division. He hoped that the Motion to report Progress would be withdrawn, and that the Committee would be allowed to proceed with the Bill.

MR. DAWSON said, he really thought there was something due to the heavy pressure which had been put upon all Departments of the House, and he had some sympathy with the officials who were now under so heavy a strain. If hon. Members were kept there last night until 2 o'clock this morning, so were also the printing officials, and he did not think that the Irish Members should be too hard upon the officials. They might blow up Her Majesty's Government as much as they liked. They were able to hear it; but they should not convey a Vote of Censure upon the officials. In all probability, better punctuality would be observed in future on all sides.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. LAW) stated that 30 or 40 Amendments were given Notice of late last night, which were sent off at once to the printers.

MR. M'COAN said, he would join in the appeal to the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to withdraw his Motion. At first there was some slight colour for the Motion in the accident of the Papers not being there; but he thought it was more apparent than real, because, in common with other hon. Members, he received a copy of the Amendments; and the accident of the absence of the leading Members of the Government for a few moments had resulted in no practical inconvenience.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was disposed to take the advice and act on the recommendation of his hon. Friends, and he would not press his Motion to a division. But he objected to the statement of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for the County of Wicklow (Mr. M'Coan), who assumed that he had only a slight show of reason for what he had done. Now, last night they were discussing this unfortunate clause until nearly 2 o'clock, and there was a squabble as to its adjournment with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. When they came down to the House prepared to continue the discussion that morning two things occurred. The first was that they could not get the Amendments, and every hon. Member knew how exceedingly inconvenient it was to discuss Amendments which were not on the Paper. It very often gave rise to complaint if an hon. Member did not happen to give Notice of an Amendment in due time. And then another thing occurred. They had Amendments on the Paper on a question in which the Government were certainly interested, and they were in their places the moment the House was made. But, although they were there ready to go on with the discussion of Amendments in which the conduct and capacity of the Government for certain purposes were called in question, there was no Minister in his place to defend himself. Now, it seemed to him perfectly preposterous that they could go on with the discussion of the Bill under those circumstances. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite had official duties to discharge, and they had charge of an important Bill; and, therefore, they ought to be in their places so as to conduct the Business. They had an illustration of how quickly Amendments moved by private Members were disposed of at the Sitting of the House last night. As soon as the House met at 9 o'clock, an Amendment, which had already been discussed at considerable length, and which he, as well as other Members, wished to discuss still further, was at once put by the Chairman and disposed of. In point of fact, it was constantly the practice to rush through important Amendments if hon. Members who were interested in them did not happen to be in their places at the moment. He would not press the Motion for reporting Progress, but would ask leave to withdraw it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR said, the first Amendment which appeared on the Paper stood in his name, and its object was to omit certain words which appeared in the clause requiring the consent of the Treasury to an agreement entered into by the Land Commission with emigrants and contractors. He proposed, in lines 12 and 13, to omit from the word "with" to "Treasury" inclusive. He would shortly give his reasons for moving this Amendment. They were these. They all knew, as a matter of practice and of general observation, that it was very undesirable that responsibility should be divided. What was proposed to be done in this instance was this. The Land Commission was to have authority to do certain things subject to the control of the Treasury. Of course, they did not know at present who the Land Commission would be; but, at the same time, they would be gentlemen who lived in Ireland, and they would have more or less control over the merits of any particular scheme of emigration that was to be carried out, and they would be influenced, to a certain extent, by the popular opinion of the country in which they lived. They would, at least, read the Irish newspapers, and hear what was said by the leaders of public opinion in that country; and they would have an opportunity of hearing the arguments that could be advanced for or against any particular course of action. But, on the other hand, what was the Treasury? The Treasury was a body living in London, who did not read the Irish newspapers, and who knew nothing at all of what was passing in that country, and who got all their information about Irish affairs entirely at second hand, and must be guided by the whispers they received more or less from irresponsible parties. They were also within easy reach, being in London, of scheming speculators and promoters of fraudulent schemes of emigration and land speculation; and they were open, therefore, to be interested adversely to the interests of the Irish people. Then, again, the Treasury was a body of a very fluctuating character. The Financial Secretary to the Treasury sat in that House, and he had very laborious duties to discharge; but he was put plainly in that troublesome and laborious position simply as a step to something of an easier nature, which, although it might be a position of more dignity, was certainly one of much less labour. The result was this—that the Secretary to the Treasury, who must know all the details of every matter that came before the Treasury, was very much in the hands of the permanent officials of his Office; and if it were not for the assistance that he obtained from these officials he would be unable to give an explanation of the details of the Estimates when they were brought before the House. Seeing that that was the case, there was an opportunity open for fraud and for advertising the schemes of fraudulent speculations. They knew that at the head of the Treasury was the Prime Minister; but they also knew that he had so many other matters in hand that it was perfectly impossible for him to inquire into these questions. They also knew, from the statement made to the Committee last night by the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote), that Members of Parliament who had influential connections were hired by these fraudulent Companies as decoy ducks. [Cries of "Order!"] He did not mean that the hon. Member for Exeter was one, because he looked upon the hon. Member as an unsuspecting Gentleman, or the hon. Member would not have confessed openly in the House that he was the representative of these swindlers.

MR. GIBSON rose to Order. He wished to call attention to the fact that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was now asserting that the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote) appeared there last night as the representative of swindlers.

THE CHAIRMAN: Unfortunately I was looking at the Paper at the time, and the words used by the hon. Member did not attract my attention. But if the hon. Member used the words imputed to him they are altogether out of Order.

MR. BIGGAR said, he had guarded himself by saying that the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote) had proved by his speech that he was an unsuspecting Gentleman who would not wilfully do a dishonest thing; but the hon. Member added that he represented these land swindlers in Minnesota and Manitoba. Now he (Mr. Biggar) was prepared to state deliberately that the Companies in question were advertising themselves very excessively, and hon. Members knew that any scheme which came from the United States must be perfectly unsound, because there was plenty of scope there and plenty of able men in the United States thoroughly competent to carry on public Companies, and any scheme with regard to the division of land among persons who were able to cultivate it, without coming to England for assistance. It was not necessary, therefore, that they should come to London at all if they had a sound and honest case on which to base their prospectuses. What they did, however, was to come here, where they knew there were a great number of people who had a good deal more money than brains.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member that I certainly do not see the relevancy of his remarks to the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to show that the Treasury was likely to be imposed upon in regard to schemes embraced in a further part of the clause; and he wished to show, further, that whoever might be the proper body to be responsible for these loans and emigration schemes, the Treasury should have nothing whatever to do with them. They went entirely beyond the range of the duties of the Treasury, and it would be injudicious for them to mix themselves up with such schemes in any way. As he had stated, an hon. Member in that House very recently informed them that he represented a Company from Minnesota, and he (Mr. Biggar) wished to point out that a Company in Minnesota must be unsound, or it would not come to London. If it was a sound speculation, it would be carried on in Minnesota itself, where there was plenty of opportunity for testing the bona fides of a Company. Again, a sound speculation carried on by sound men would be as successful in that country as here, and for these considerations he did not think it desirable that the Treasury should have anything to do with these emigration schemes. Then, again, they all knew that the Treasury was more or less a political body. They constantly saw absurd ideas propounded, such as were mentioned in The Daily Telegraph that morning; and a Minister who wanted to be popular would go in for a scheme, no matter whether it was unsound, no matter whether the body promoting it was responsible, if the fleeting influence of political partizanship were brought to bear upon him. He would give another illustration to show how unreliable the statements of Ministers were. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland told them plainly last night that the greater part of the present Session had been spent in promoting this Land Bill. That would have been all very well if the right hon. Gentleman had told it to his constituents in Bradford, or to somebody who knew nothing about the facts; but to tell the House of Commons that the greater part of the Session had been spent upon the Land Bill was only another illustration of how unreliable purely political parties were upon purely political questions.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member must really make his remarks relevant to the Amendment, and his Amendment is simply to omit the words "with the concurrence of the Treasury."

MR. BIGGAR said, he was showing that the Treasury were a political party, and that they would be influenced by the action of practical politics and by pressure that it was undesirable should be brought to bear upon them. He would, however, go no further, but would be content to move to omit the words in question.

Amendment proposed, in page 18, lines 12 and 13, leave out the words "with the concurrence of the Treasury."
—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not think that the Committee will expect me to reply at any length to the remarks of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar). I think he has answered himself. The hon. Member wants us to suppose that there may be schemes set on foot by speculators which may be unsound and fraudulent, and he stated that the hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote) had been hired here to represent a Company in Minnesota. All I can say is that I did not understand the hon. Member for Exeter to say anything of the kind. If the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) wishes simply to have security for the loans which the Commission are empowered to advance, it would be the business of the Treasury to examine the nature of the security offered. To say that the Commission should be able to enter into agreements would certainly be depriving the Bill of the security which it now gives. I do not think that any responsible Government would ever consent to get rid of the security which the concurrence of the Treasury is to involve in this case. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) has stated that the money would eventually come out of the pockets of the British taxpayer. That is not the intention of the Government, nor is it the wording of the clause. The wording of the clause is that it should be a loan upon good security, and it is most desirable that the Treasury should have an opportunity of expressing its opinion upon the value of the security offered.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the discussion which had taken place showed how very inconsistent the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was. The hon. Member was opposed to the whole policy of emigration, and yet he proposed now to leave out one of the most important safeguards the clause contained against extravagant exercise of the powers proposed to be given to the Land Commission. The proposal of the hon. Member for Cavan was to have the Land Commission standing alone as the authority to deal with the subject. Now, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had expressed a strong objection against intrusting the Land Commission with the duty of undertaking the reclamation of land; and he (Mr. Arthur Arnold) certainly thought that it was a matter of doubtful policy to make the Land Commission an emigration agent. If the Amendment were agreed to, the Land Commission would stand alone and supreme as an emigration agent in the matter; and he could not recommend the Government to attach to the Land Commission any such function. He thought it was desirable to confine the operations of the Land Commission to judicial questions, and, as the Amendment of the hon. Member affected the entire policy of loans to be granted under the clause for the purposes of emigration, they ought not to leave out of sight the policy which that proposition brought into view. In the Library of the House of Commons, the other day, he was looking at the Census Returns of the population of Ireland; and, in considering the policy of authorizing the Treasury to grant loans for the purpose of emigration, they ought not to forget that one of the consequences of emigration had been to leave in Ireland a proportion of deaf and dumb and afflicted persons—much greater than existed in any other country in Europe. He did not propose to discuss questions of political economy now; but he believed they would all agree with him that, whether the policy of the clause was sound or unsound, the worst export a country could make was that of its own population. Emigration should, at all events, be the last resort. Until they had arrived at a definite and certain conclusion that there was no possibility of dealing with the redundant population of Ireland in certain districts in any other method, he would earnestly counsel them not to look upon emigration as the wisest and best course that could be taken, for, as he had already said, they should always remember that the worst export which a country could make was that of its own population. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister took credit that the Government did not propose to engage in the reclamation of land. That was a policy of which he entirely approved; and he asked them now to go one step further, and not to undertake the work of an emigration agent. If the emigration to be conducted under this clause was to be of the same character as that which had taken place heretofore, it meant that the proportion of blind, deaf and dumb, and of the miserable and afflicted, would rapidly increase in Ireland as the work of emigration went on.

MR. MAC IVER rose to Order. He wished to know whether he would, in reply, be allowed to go into the general subject of emigration as the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Arthur Arnold) was doing?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold) is wandering into matters which have no connection with the Amendment before the Committee. He is now really making a speech against emigration, and not discussing the clause.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) was to leave out of the clause the financial control which at present existed—namely, the most safe and valuable control of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and he had been alluding to the expressions made use of by the right hon. Gentleman that the Government did not propose to manage or direct either the work of reclamation or emigration. He approved of the policy of the Government in declining to be active emigration agents or reclamation agents; and what he wished to point out was that the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Cavan was a palpable contradiction of the policy which the Irish Members had hitherto pursued in regard to the clause.

MR. HEALY said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland had made an important statement when he said that the Treasury would have to examine the nature and value of the security offered. That was quite true; but were they to understand that it would be the business of the Land Commission to go into the highways and byeways in order to find out the people who wished to emigrate, and then for the Treasury to say that the security was good? He understood that it would be the business of the Land Commission to pay some attention to the security, and also to the character of the parties who availed themselves of the advantages of the scheme. He would ask the Prime Minister to take the Amendment in connection with an Amendment lower down, which proposed to limit the entire amount of money to be placed at the disposal of the Land Commission. If that were done, and a fixed sum only granted, what necessity would there be for the controlling power of the Treasury? If a limited amount of money were placed at the disposal of the Land Commission, it would be the duty of the Land Commission to see to the security and bona fides of the persons who undertook to carry out these schemes, and there would be no necessity at all for the retention of the control of the Treasury. But the fact was that the Government wished to place an uncontrolled sum of money into the hands of the Land Commission, and that was the very thing that the Irish Members dreaded. An uncontrolled sum of money was to be placed in the hands of the Land Commission, and therefore it was necessary that the Treasury should have a controlling power. If the Government fixed some tangible amount, the Committee would be able to discuss the clause from something like a reasonable standpoint. The Prime Minister said the present Government had no intention of granting a very large sum; but hon. Members did not know what would come after the present Government went out of Office. They had had plenty of experience of bad government in Ireland, and unless a limit was fixed it was impossible to say that at some time or other men might not come in power who might choose to offer the most extraordinary inducements to the people to quit the country; and, for anything they knew, an entire Province might in that way be depleted. And then, having depleted the population, the next thing would be to cut down the representation. Let the Government, at all events, tell them what sum of money they intended to place in the hands of the Land Commission. This was not a case like that of the purchase of farms. The Prime Minister said that no control would be put on the expenditure of the Land Commission in regard to the advances for the purchase of farms. The Irish Members admitted that that was a beneficial object, and they were quite sure that there was no sinister political object to be served by it; but in this case they had a distinct dread of some sinister object, and they would fight the matter tooth and nail. It was no argument to say that they had only the present Government to deal with, and that the present Government would give them their assurance that their intentions were good. They all knew something about the good intentions of the Government, but they must not forget that future Governments would follow; that other Governments would succeed the excellent Government of the Prime Minister; and what did they know about them? Let Her Majesty's Government do one of two things. Let them give a fixed sum of money; and if they declined to do that, let them make the scheme operative for two years only. It was quite true that certain portions of the country had become congested; but would the Government confine the operation of the clause to those congested portions of the population? They admitted that Mayo and Galway were overpopulated; would the Government confine the clause to Mayo and Galway, and not give power to emigrate the people of the county of Dublin?

MR. C. S. PARKER rose to Order. The hon. Member for Wexford had been discussing two Amendments lower down in the Paper, one of which was in his own name.

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that the hon. Member is quite in Order in discussing the limitation of the sum to be granted to the Commission, because it has a bearing upon the Amendment before the Committee. But with regard to a limitation of the districts, I do not think that would be in Order.

MR. HEALY said, he was prepared to admit that it was hard for the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. C. S. Parker), or any other Scotch Member, to see the exact bearing of these Amendments. But it was very hard upon an Irish Member, when he had to deal with English and Scotch Members, that his arguments should always be met in this way. If they were discussing these matters in a Parliament composed of themselves, they would be allowed something like liberty of speech; but they must remember that they were in a foreign Assembly, listened to by foreigners who had no sympathy with them. If the proposal were to export the constituents of the hon. Member for Perth to Zanzibar, or to Virginia, or to Zululand, the hon. Gentleman might object; but his interruption in the present discussion was quite irregular. What he asked was that the Government should give them some assurance that they would limit the total sum to be granted; that they would limit the power of the clause by confining its operation, and not extend it to the whole of Ireland.

MR. SHAW thought that the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had made some good suggestions, especially the one in which he proposed that the sum of money to be granted should be limited. He (Mr. Shaw) certainly thought that nothing like an unlimited sum ought to be placed in the hands of the Commissioners, although he had no fear that emigration would be carried out to an unlimited extent. There was something also in the suggestion that the operation of the clause should be confined to the distressed districts. It was very evident that if the Commissioners purchased property they would find upon it a number of poor small tenants. He knew some of those districts himself. He had been over them, and he had seen some of the estates upon which it would take 10 years to migrate the distressed people, unless they were taken bodily and put down in some of the rich lands of Meath. If the poor people themselves were asked whether they would prefer to be migrated to the poor mountain sides, or to be sent with their families to America on a well-arranged scheme of emigration, he knew what their answer would be. He was not speaking speculatively, because he had made it his business to put the question to the people who would be most deeply affected, not in the presence of the Commissioners, but whenever he could meet the people outside. They did not, however, want wholesale emigration in Ireland; and he looked forward to the time when, owing to the increased population, and also to new industries, labour in Ireland would not be a drug in the market, but would be able to command fair terms. But, in the meantime, he was strongly in favour of some provision for a well-considered system of emigration, which could not possibly do any harm, and might do, in many cases, a great deal of good. He certainly thought that they ought not, for any slight reason of their own, either political or otherwise, to prevent poor people now living in wretched hovels on the mountain side from having a fair opportunity of changing and bettering their position in another land. That was all that the clause proposed to do. Some Amendments had already been introduced by the Government, which he thought would improve the clause very much; and he should be glad if there were some expression included in the clause which would make the desire to emigrate originate with the poor people themselves, and not make it seem that it was the desire of Parliament to get rid of them and send them somewhere else. At present, he was sorry to say that that was the impression which the clause produced in most minds. He thought that a few words might be introduced to direct that applications from persons wishing to emigrate should, from time to time, be considered. Neither landlords nor speculators should have power in the matter. The Committee had now discussed the clause at very great length, and he was sure it was not so important a clause as many of his hon. Friends thought, or as the representatives of the landlords seemed to think; but, at the same time, it was thought that there would be many cases where it would be exceedingly useful to the people themselves. His hon. Friend the senior Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart) said last night that persons in Ireland were so attached to their little bits of land that no one could induce them to emigrate. If that was the case, why no one would emigrate. He might say that he had had the best opportunity, while acting with the Commission, of making inquiries, and he had made it his business to ascertain the opinions of the people in regard to this very clause. He believed that if they could see their way to obtaining a fair living at home, as he thought they would under this Bill, they would not like the idea of going to America at all. But round the coast of Ireland there were many spots where the land was not sufficient to afford a living for the people, and this clause would be a benefit to such persons. He did not think that the Government contemplated any scheme of extraordinary magnitude with regard to emigration. The people of Ireland, and the public opinion of Ireland, would not allow of anything that had not the full consent of the people themselves. But he would ask what his hon. Friends intended to gain by carrying the discussion of this clause beyond a legitimate point? A critical time was now passing, and the Bill had to be sent to the House of Lords. The clause could not do harm, and it might do good. It was, practically, of some importance. He hoped his hon. Friends would excuse the liberty he took. His only object was to do the best he could for his country. He must honestly say that he was in favour of allowing this clause to stand part of the Bill.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise with the view of saving time. In consequence of what has been said, there is no objection on the part of the Government to the insertion of a provision of the kind suggested by the hon. Member (Mr. Shaw) in the clause. I do not know whether it is wanted or not; but the Government would have no difficulty in inserting words to make it clear that it is at the desire of the people themselves, and not by the intervention of middlemen, that the emigration should take place. I hope, under these circumstances, that the Amendment will be immediately withdrawn.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY hoped now, after the suggestions made by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had been approved of by the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw), and adopted by the Government, the debate would be brought to a close. There was, however, one suggestion of the hon. Member for Wexford which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had not touched upon. The hon. Member for Wexford suggested that the provisions of this clause should be confined to the congested districts, and, if he made no mistake, the hon. Member for Cork approved of that suggestion. Now, if the clause was to be passed at all, the district to which it would be confined would be limited. There were certainly one or two districts upon which tenants were located who could not possibly derive a living. It was a matter of natural necessity that they should get a living; and if they were not able to get a living in Ireland, and were obliged to have recourse to emigration, it was only reasonable that they should get such assistance as the State could give them. But it was equally desirable that they should not unnecessarily extend the power of the clause, which would be very unpopular in Ireland, beyond those districts which had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Wexford. The reason why he should like to see it confined to those districts was this—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Member could not have been in the House when I mentioned that it would not be in Order to discuss the limitation of the clause. That question is raised in a later Amendment.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY thought the question had been discussed most distinctly, both by the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw).

THE CHAIRMAN: Not when attention was called to it, and I ruled that it was out of Order to discuss that point.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that must have occurred before he reached the House, and he apologized for having unintentionally disobeyed the ruling of the Chair. The remarks which he wished to make would turn altogether on the necessity of confining the clause to the distressed districts, and with regard to those distressed districts—

THE CHAIRMAN: I have told the hon. and learned Member that there is an Amendment on that point which will come later on, and must not be discussed now. There are three pages and a-half of Amendments, and unless we go through them regularly it will be impossible to get through them at all.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he had misunderstood the observations of the right hon. Gentleman. With regard to the clause now before the Committee, it sought to take away from the Treasury all control whatever over any scheme of emigration. If it were put to the vote he should be obliged to vote against it for this reason—that the clause as it stood afforded the best security that could be provided against the abuse of any scheme. The Treasury was the very best security that the provision would be carried out properly and economically, and that the money would not be thrown away on speculative schemes of emigration, or the country unnecessarily depopulated. The best safeguard against the landlords having the power to turn out the people by wholesale was to give the Treasury complete control over the applications. Irish Members knew something of the difficulty of obtaining grants of public money for public purposes from the Treasury; and he would, therefore, suggest that the Amendment should be withdrawn.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, before the Amendment was withdrawn, he wished to remind the Committee that the voluntary emigration from Ireland last year amounted to 95,517, showing an increase of 47,000 over the previous year.

MR. LALOR said, the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) had spoken of a well-arranged scheme of emigration; but where was that well-arranged scheme of emigration to be found in the Bill? He certainly failed to see any provision for a well-arranged scheme, and he had too lively a recollection in times past of the system of emigration carried on by Companies and by landlords from Ireland to Canada, not to be frightened at the idea of seeing a wholesalescheme of Government emigration of the poor people of the country, which would place them on the shores of Canada without a stiver in their pockets, or the chance of earning their own living. That was what was done in 1845, 1846, and 1847, when the Irish emigrants were huddled in sheds on the shores of the St. Lawrence, and died of fever. He saw nothing in the present Bill to guard against such a state of things occurring again; and he believed that if they were prepared to leave Canada out of the question altogether, and frame a good system of emigration in a way in which it could be properly carried out, the Irish Members would be better prepared to accept the clause.

MR. BLAKE asked the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to give an explanation of another portion of his Amendment which came later. If that explanation was satisfactory, he should feel strongly disposed to support the Amendment of the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment now under consideration is the first one standing in the name of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar).

MR. BLAKE said, he would not trench upon the ruling of the Chair; but he hoped the emigration would not be confined to the distressed districts.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question before the Committee at the present moment is simply whether the words "with the concurrence of the Treasury" shall be left out of the clause. The Question that I have to propose is that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.

MR. CALLAN wished to ask for some explanation of the reference to the concurrence of the Treasury in the remainder of the clause. Would the Treasury have any power to allocate the mode of application, or would their power be confined simply to the granting, securing, and repaying of the sums advanced? He should vote against the Amendment if the concurrence of the Treasury was limited solely to the granting, securing, and repayment of the sums advanced by the Commission for the promotion of emigration; but he should certainly vote in support of the Amendment if the Treasury was to have any authority whatever over the mode of application. The Commission was to be an Irish Commission. It would be constituted, he assumed, of Irishmen, and he trusted that would be the case, although he knew that there were Scotch and English applicants for the offices, who were willing to emigrate to Ireland in order to fill such a good pecuniary position. He should like to be informed, either by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland or by the Prime Minister, whether it was contemplated that the Treasury should exercise any authority over the mode of application, or as to the power of granting money to certain bodies. Anyone looking at the clause would see that it was intended solely and simply for the promotion of emigration to a British Dependency. Now, he happened to be reading that morning a report of a meeting of Poor Law Guardians in his own county, and he found that the Guardians wished to send away six pauper children about 15 or 16 years of age to America, and it was proposed to allocate the amount of their maintenance for one year in order to assist them in emigrating. The Local Government Board did not object to the emigration; but they did object to the children being sent to anywhere else except to Canada, notwithstanding that the emigration was to be done actually for the relief of the rates. The Local Government Board objected to the removal of the children if they were to be sent to the United States; but they would permit the operation to be performed if the children were to be sent to Canada. From the wording of the present clause, it was evident that the intention was to promote emigration from the inclement Western shores of Ireland to the equally inclement districts of Canada, and the people who desired to emigrate would not be at liberty to go to the United States. Now, if the Commission were to have authority to say in what mode the application was to be carried out and where the people were to be allowed to go, he would vote that the Treasury should have full power to control the granting, and securing, and repayment of the money; but he thought that no power should be given to the Land Commission to prescribe the districts to which the emigration should be directed. The clause was altogether a very crude clause, and he should prefer to see it dropped out of the Bill. The Bill itself was said to be a Bill to amend the law relating to the occupation and ownership of land in Ireland, and for other purposes relating thereto, and he did not see why the concurrence of the Treasury should be called in.

MR. GLADSTONE: The concurrence of the Treasury in this case would be exactly what it is in military matters. The Treasury does not make itself a judge in military matters; but it exercises a certain financial control. It is proposed that the Treasury shall exercise a financial control here, exactly analogous to that which it exercises in military matters.

MR. FINIGAN said, he was sorry that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) had not had an opportunity of reviewing the whole subject; but he trusted that the hon. Member would be able to do so when the clause came up to be finally passed. He (Mr. Finigan) had risen now to ask the Prime Minister whether it was understood that the amount of the advances for emigration purposes would be limited, that the districts from which the emigration took place would be limited, and if a fixed period of time would be specified for the duration of the Act? If that was so, he would advise his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to withdraw the Amendment, and allow the Government to state simply on what lines and to what extent this very wrong principle was to be carried out.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was exceedingly unwilling to withdraw the Amendment, and for this reason. The Prime Minister had given a half consent to limit the amount, but had not told them what the limit would be. Now, the avowed policy of the Government was to stimulate this emigration as far as possible. They knew that the present Government would not last for ever, and if the Tory Party came into power, they would be disposed, as far as possible, to give effect to the policy which they had advocated while in Opposition. He knew very well that Ministers of the Crown did not always pursue a policy when in Office which they had advocated when in Opposition; but he was speaking now of the independent Members of the Conservative Party, who, at the present moment, really seemed to be very much in favour of depopulating Ireland altogether, and the present Government had assisted them all in their power. They had encouraged evictions in a wholesale manner, and now, by this clause, they proposed to send the Irish people to a part of the world where they could only exist for a few years. Still, if a narrow limit were given to the extent to which the Act would go, of course the opposition of the Irish Members to the clause would not be so strong; but as the matter now stood, the avowed policy of the Tory Party was in favour of encouraging emigration. The Government had been pursuing, and, in spite of its disavowals, it was quite evident that the Government, as far possible, were in favour of pushing forward, a policy of emigration; and his object in moving the Amendment was to prevent the Treasury from having anything to do with the matter. The hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) had spoken of the intentions of the Government and of the clause; but whatever those intentions might be, he (Mr. Biggar) would like to see them carefully specified in the Bill. As far as he had examined the clause, he failed to find in it any scheme of emigration, or any limit as to the extent to which it was intended to carry it out; or, in point of fact, any information upon the subject whatever. The general statement of the Prime Minister that emigration was not to be carried out to any considerable extent was very vague and indefinite. His words might soon be entirely forgotten; indeed, these small contentions in Committee might not even be reported in Hansard, so that it was impossible to bind the Government to a declaration of this nature; and the declaration itself, under these circumstances, was so vague that it was entirely worthless. He desired that the Prime Minister would state clearly what the limit was that he proposed; whether he would limit the entire sum generally, or limit it per annum; and then he (Mr. Biggar) would be prepared to say whether he would press his Amendment or not.

MR. DILLWYN said, he thought there was considerable misapprehension on the part of hon. Members as to the object of the words in the clause which were objected to. He understood that they were words of limitation to prevent money being drawn from the public purse, except with the consent of the Treasury, which was the custodian of the public purse. The Prime Minister, as First Lord of the Treasury, was chief custodian, and the right hon. Gentleman had expressed his willingness to limit the amount. Hon. Members seemed to think that the words in question gave the Treasury power of interfering with the whole matter of emigration; whereas, as he understood, they simply gave the power of limiting the advances.

MR. HEALY appealed to his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) to withdraw the Amendment, and take the discussion upon the next Amendment.

MR. LEAMY said, the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) suggested that these were words of limitation. No doubt that was the intention of the words; but why not give full effect to the limitation. What was feared now was that the Government might be willing to sanction any scheme of emigration to a British Colony, but that they might refuse to sanction the transport of the Irish people to the United States.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, after the appeal of his hon. Friend the Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), and as he would have an opportunity of hearing from the Prime Minister, on some future Amendment, what was really meant by the clause, he would ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw the Amendment. At the same time he thought they were perfectly in the dark as to what the intentions of the Government were, and while the Committee were in that position it was impossible to withdraw their bona fide opposition to the clause. It had been suggested by the hon. Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) that this was a factious opposition to the clause. Nothing was further from his (Mr. Biggar's) mind. He opposed the clause; but he thought if it was amended it might be made much less objectionable. But, at the same time, he thought that those whose constituents were directly interested in a matter of this sort were entitled to criticize the language of the clause as much as they thought it was worth.

[Twenty-sixth Night.]

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the Amendment be withdrawn? [Cries of "No!"]

Amendment negatived.

MR. HEALY moved, in page 18, line 13, after "Treasury," to insert, "and on being satisfied that a sufficient number of people in any district desire to emigrate." He thanked his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw) for the support he had given to the three suggestions which he had made to the Government, and he must say that he thought the Prime Minister had met them in a very fair spirit. He understood that this Amendment would rather allow the Committee a somewhat wider range; but he understood that the Government were prepared to accede to the two most important points—namely, that the range of the operation of the clause should be limited to the congested districts, and that a sum of money should be fixed for the advances. As he understood, the Government intended to accede to those two points. He was not quite clear that his Amendment, in a verbal sense, was exactly the best that could be proposed. It would be better to say—"on being satisfied that any number of people in a district to be hereafter mentioned," and then leave out "Ireland," and insert "Mayo, or Donegal, or Galway," where the congestion prevailed. If they were to discuss the question of emigration they ought to discuss it frankly. The Amendment, as it was now proposed, put upon the people themselves the entire initiation of emigration. That was a desirable thing, in his point of view, because it would prevent the people from emigrating; but, at the same time, if it was desirable that they should emigrate, it was not reasonable that the entire initiative should be cast on them. For instance, an unfortunate man, living in Connaught, who did not know a word of English, and who had lived all his life within sight of the smoke of his own hut, would not be supposed to know anything about the details of an Act of Parliament. If it was desirable that a number of unfortunate people, living on two or three acres of land, and unable to get a living, should go somewhere else, he thought their removal ought to be to some other part of Ireland, and not to America at all; but he would not discuss that point now. The clause, as it stood, threw the initiative upon speculators whose sole object was to make money. That he entirely objected to; but he thought that it was for the Government, and not for a private Member, to devise a more satisfactory scheme. The unfortunate inhabitants of the poorer districts of Ireland should not be left to the mercy of advertising agents and others, who travelled all over the country hawking about advertisements, working up emigration schemes, and making the most illusive and delusive promises.

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 13, after the word "Treasury," insert "and on being satisfied that a sufficient number of people in any district desire to emigrate."—(Mr. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I can really scarcely understand the hon Member. I have failed to gather whether he is in favour of his own Amendment or not.

MR. HEALY said, he had a preference for his Amendment, as against the Government proposal. He thought it was more desirable, from his point of view, to throw upon the people themselves the entire burden of their removal than to throw it upon a number of speculators; but he had also said that both schemes had their objectionable features.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Now, I confess that I think the words proposed by the hon. Member are very good words, and words which the Government might accept. We did not propose to insert them ourselves, but we had a perfect intention of acting upon them. The Commission must have in their view a crowded district, from which the people really wish to emigrate. I cannot conceive that any Commission, or any Company, or any Government, would consent to do it under any other circumstances, and therefore it is desirable to insert these words. The Land Commission must, as I have said, have a particular district in view, such a district as those mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for the County of Cork (Mr.

Shaw), where the remedial measures of the Land Bill would not remove the miseries of the people. I think the words would certainly meet the object which the hon. Gentleman has in view. I think that an absolute limitation would be absurd. Suppose, for instance, that the inhabitants of a crowded district in Mayo asked to be removed to some Colony under proper regulations, where they knew they would be well received, it would be a very hard thing, if some people, in some other district, wished to avail themselves of the same provisions, to declare that they were entirely shut out. At the same time, certain districts would be in the minds of the Commission and the Treasury at the time they entertained the application for an advance. I am quite disposed to accept the Amendment.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had always taken an interest in this question. The Committee would remember that on the second reading of the Bill he had strongly supported the principle contained in this clause. As he understood the object of the Amendment, it was to limit the operation of the clause as much as possible to congested districts. Of course, the word "district" was an ambiguous word, and in that sense the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) might not do much harm; but he (Mr. Plunket) did think that it was a great pity to shackle the operations of the Commission in the power intrusted to them, not for stimulating, but for facilitating emigration, where it was clearly desirable that it should take place. He was not going to discuss the subject of emigration, or to urge it as a rival plan to that of the Government; but he believed that this clause contained a very necessary supplement to the other parts of the Bill, if it were to be successfully carried out. Everyone knew that he was not himself in favour of the policy of the other parts of the Bill—certainly not of a very great deal of it; but if the Bill was to become law he considered that it should act with as little hardship as possible. He wished to call the attention of the Committee to two points. The main policy of the Bill was to give effect to the "three F's" and the creation of a peasant proprietary. The object of this clause was to enable the Land Commission, in carrying out that policy, to avail themselves of emigration by advancing the means out of the public funds. The best argument he had heard in favour of the policy of free sale was that the result would be that weak men would sell and strong men would buy, and that they would thus ultimately get those persons to cultivate the soil of Ireland who were the best able to do so for their own advantage and that of the community. But what was to become of the weak men who sold? The conditions under which they lived were miserable, and the conditions under which they emigrated might be made happy and prosperous. He adopted every word that had been said by his hon. Friend the Member for the County of Cork (Mr. Shaw). It was a mistake to say that the Tory Party wished to see the depletion of Ireland. Nothing was further from their wishes. He deeply regretted to see his countrymen going from their native shores; but when the only conditions on which they could live at home were miserable, and when those under which they could live abroad were happy and prosperous, was it not the wisest thing that could be done to provide them with facilities if they voluntarily wished to go abroad? What, otherwise, he would again ask, was to become of the weak men who had to sell? At present there was little enterprise or industry in Ireland. He looked forward to a better and happier time, when there would be enterprise and industry in Ireland, as in England, Scotland, and Wales, and when the country would be prosperous and contented.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. He did not wish to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Plunket); but he wished to call attention to the fact that the Chairman was allowing the right hon. and learned Gentleman to discuss the clause when he had restricted other hon. Members to the words of the Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the right hon. and learned Member (Mr. Plunket) has at all transgressed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was proceeding to explain why there should not be a limitation of the clause according to the Amendment.

MR. PLUNKET said, he had, when interrupted, been applying himself to clear the Conservative Party from the charge which had been brought against them of desiring to decimate the popuation of the country. What he was going to say was that if they put any limitation upon the operation of the clause as to a certain number of the population and a certain district desiring to go, they might prevent the Commission from dealing with cases that were likely to occur under the operation of the principle of free sale in Ireland. One word with regard to peasant proprietors. The Government said there must be a certain number of persons in the bad districts who wanted to go. But suppose the case of an estate where there was a number of people, and upon which there were only a few who could pay their rents. They would be in this difficulty—that they would not be able to purchase their holdings, and they would not be in a position to obtain an advance from the Commission for the purpose of emigrating. Surely there would be nothing unreasonable in such a case in assisting, perhaps, some two or three families to emigrate. For these reasons he thought it would be a mistake to place restrictions of this kind upon the Commission. It certainly would be a mistake to limit the operation of the clause as to the power of the Commission to act when they had a considerable number of persons in a particular district who desired to emigrate.

MR. BLAKE regretted that he must dissent from the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) in regard to restricting the power of the Emigration Clause to distressed districts. There could be no question that the clause would be of more value in certain districts in the West of Ireland than elsewhere; but there were in nearly every county in Ireland—amongst them in his own county—places where it was desirable that many persons should be able to take advantage of this clause. He spoke in the position of having three of his constituents sitting beneath him, and he was naturally very proud of them. The hon. Member for Wexford, who had very wrongly described himself as a simple Member, was one, and the two hon. Members for the borough of Waterford were also among his constituents. He appealed to those hon. Gentlemen if it was the fact that in the county to which they all belonged there were not some localities containing a large number of poor people who, with great advantage to themselves, might be emigrated. Some time ago he had prepared a simple scheme of emigration himself, which he had desired to carry out. He was neither the proprietor of large estates, such as had been described by an hon. Member, nor was he the proprietor of land either in Canada or America. Therefore, he was not open to the charge that it was for his own purposes that he propounded a scheme. But he had been lately in Minnesota, and the Bishop of Minnesota, Dr. Ireland, told him that any number of young women of good character, from 15 to 25 years of age, might be taken out to that Colony, and be able to obtain £20 or £30 a-year in wages, with board and lodging, and the probability of getting a good deal more in a short time, and nearly a certainty of getting well-married in the end. Part of his scheme was, that every halfpenny of the money advanced should be repaid to him, and that there should be a thorough understanding on the part of the people who emigrated that they only had the money as a loan. Dr. Ireland told him that the women who went out would be placed by him under the care of the Sisters of Charity, and that the latter would endeavour to have the money advanced for their emigration paid back. He had communicated with the Rev. Father Nugent, the originator of the emigration scheme from Connemara to Minnesota, and Father Nugent told him he had no doubt that wages of from £30 to £40 a-year could be got by young women such as he had described, if they went to some of the more Western States. In various counties, and in his own, there were a great number of isolated instances of people who could do no good for themselves at home, and who would derive considerable advantage being sent away; and he therefore strongly appealed to the Government, and to the hon. Member for Wexford not to persevere in limiting the benefit of the scheme to particular districts, but to allow the clause to be extended to such instances as those which he had described. The junior Member for Cork threw out a hint yesterday which he (Mr. Blake) very much approved of—namely, that in every case where people were sent out, it should be through the medium of Boards of Guardians, who should, in the first instance, satisfy themselves whether the persons proposing to emigrate were eligible for emigration, and that their condition was such as to lead to the belief that they were not likely to succeed at home.

MR. A. MOORE hoped the Government would consider the matter very carefully before they accepted the Amendment. No doubt, it would be cruel to compel people to live in thickly populated districts; but the Amendment, he feared, was not sufficiently guarded. If there was to be any limitation, he should like to see the Committee adopt that of the hon. Member for Armagh, which said that they should be allowed to assist tenants in needy circumstances to emigrate with their families from the poorer and more thickly populated districts. It was essential to have some such limitation as this, because it was a crime to spend public money in assisting people to emigrate from districts which were too sparsely populated already. If this Amendment were agreed to, the Commissioners might emigrate families from the county of Meath, through which one might travel mile after mile without seeing the smoke of a house. Moreover, when families were emigrated there should be adequate guarantees that proper facilities would be afforded for transplanting the poor people from their native land to comfortable homes elsewhere, where they would not be subjected to the difficulties and miseries that emigrants now-a-days had to encounter. He hoped the clause would pass, but would be limited in its operation to those districts where the people, at present, were unable to live in decency and comfort.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL did not agree with the hon. Member opposite that the principle of the Amendment was a bad one. The clause should be put into a more definite shape so that anyone who looked into it could see what the emigration was to be, and the Amendment would have the effect of doing this to some extent. It was rather too vague in its wording, however. What, for instance, did the words "sufficient number" mean? It would be almost impossible for the Commissioners to arrive at a decision; and, even when they did, they might discourage emigration where it was most desirable, because, in their opinion, there might not be the "sufficient number" desiring to emigrate that was in the mind of Parliament when the clause was passed. On the other hand, the Amendment might operate unsatisfactorily by inducing the Commissioners, in order to make up the "sufficient number," to unduly stimulate emigration where it was not required. He would suggest that after the word "on" these words should be inserted—"Application being made by poor persons or families desiring to emigrate." That would leave—what he considered to be a matter of great importance—the emigration to be spontaneous on the part of the people, and not an artificial and got up thing. He would point out that the words "poor persons or families" had been taken from previous Acts of Parliament. It was necessary that these poor persons should be acquainted with the text of the Act; but there would always be plenty of well-educated, intelligent people who would make the application to the Commissioners on their behalf, and who would give them all necessary information. Under the terms of his Amendment it would be open to individuals, who would easily have their attention drawn to the benefits of the Act, to apply to the Commissioners to assist them to emigrate.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment,

To omit all the words after the word "on," and insert "application being made by poor persons or families desiring to emigrate."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

MR. GLADSTONE: The Amendment of the noble Lord is open to the very objection he himself has raised with regard to the "sufficient number" being in the discretion of the Commissioners. He says the Amendment is indefinite; but he makes the matter still more indefinite by saying that the Commissioners are to receive applications from "poor persons or families."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: These are the words of four Acts of Parliament.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no doubt those words have been used in former Acts of Parliament; but they must be viewed in connection with their context. However desirable they may have been in other Acts they are out of place here. If you object to the discretion of the

[Twenty-sixth Night.]

Commissioners you must lay down some iron rule. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) embraces two things—one is, that there should be something in the nature of a voluntary movement ascertained by the Commissioners. That is one of the principles to which we desire to give our assent; but I doubt whether it would be desirable to specify in the clauses that this should be ascertained through the direct application from the people. A provision of that kind would have a tendency to introduce confusion in the working of the clause. It is desirable to leave it to the discretion and sense of duty of the Commissioners to find out whether there is anything in the nature of a spontaneous movement. As to confining the arrangement to particular districts of Ireland, I do not conceive that principle to be within the scope of the present Amendment, therefore I will not go into that matter. The question as to whether we should endeavour to give a specific description of the districts had better stand over until it is distinctly raised. The second point of this Amendment, as we understand it, and in which sense alone we have accepted it, is that there should be a general assertion by Parliament that the kind of emigration on which this public money is to be expended shall be a collective emigration. With regard to sporadic emigration, the hon. Member does not propose that anything should be done to limit the action of the Commissioners. I do not think any severe or stringent limit should be imposed. There should be nothing to bind the Commission, or to prevent their having to do with a scheme of emigration where the emigrants come from different districts; but, as far as this sporadic emigration from the whole of Ireland is concerned, that has been, and is now going on at a very great rate, and I do not know that the intervention of Parliament is necessary in the matter. It is that sort of collective emigration which has reference to the special position of special districts which we have had mainly in view. It is to the relief of congested population by collective emigration that the Commission is to look rather than the application of a general stimulus to general emigration. That is the sense in which we accept the Amendment, and if we can dispose of it—provided the Committee approves of that general idea—we shall come to consider, in a subsequent Amendment, whether it is desirable to attempt any more particular description of the districts where emigration is to take place, or whether it is not desirable to do so.

MR. CALLAN said, he was sorry they had had such an authoritative pronouncement as this in favour of collective emigration, which he took to be nothing less than transportation en masse instead of that spontaneous emigration which the Amendment of the noble Lord clearly pointed to. He was in the West of Ireland last April, and his attention was drawn by a Conservative gentleman—Sir Ralph Cusack, Chairman of the Midland Great Western of Ireland Railway—to the fact that in one day 175 tickets to Liverpool via Dublin were issued to emigrants en route for America, and these emigrants varied in age from 15 to 30. There were upwards of 2,000 people at the railway stations to see these emigrants off, and most of these crowds consisted either of very young or old people. This was collective emigration—the emigration of the bone and sinew of the country. He had since entered into communication with the Chairman of the Midland Great Western Railway about this emigration, and had learnt from him that whilst this great amount of emigration was going on via Dublin, there was also a considerable amount from Athlone, Athenry, and Cavan, the Athlone and Athenry emigrants going by way of Queenstown, and the Cavan emigrants going by way of Derry. In six weeks the emigration had amounted to 8,524 persons, almost every one of whom was young and strong. He was opposed to the clause, because its spirit was transparent, the draftsman who, no doubt, had drawn the provision according to his instructions, having been unable to conceal it. He was opposed to the clause and in favour of the Amendment of the noble Lord, the object of which was to aid spontaneous emigration. According to the clause the Commissioners would have no power whatever to hear the application of a family or an individual desiring to emigrate; but they would be brought into contact with a person whose name stunk in the nostrils of every Irishman—namely, the “undertaker” of the emigration movement. These “undertakers” were the persons who had authority to contract, on behalf of Canada and other Colonies, for the supply of emigrants. The Bill said the Commission might "Enter into agreements with any person or body of persons having authority to contract on behalf of the Dominion of Canada, or any province thereof, or on behalf of any British Colony or Dependency," &c.

He would, therefore, urge the Government, in order to render these undertakers unnecessary, to accept a proposal enabling the Commissioners to hear applications from poor persons. He would propose that the noble Lord should omit the words "persons or," leaving his Amendment to stand thus—"application being made by poor families desiring to emigrate." [MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] He was glad to hear the Premier cheer that suggestion. This would give to the Land Commission power to receive and consider the applications of whole families, and in future the emigration schemes might not denude the country of its youth and strength, leaving behind the weak and decrepid.

THE CHAIRMAN: Do I understand the hon. Member to move an Amendment?

MR. CALLAN: I understand that the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill) moved the Amendment, and I spoke on that Amendment.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS asked whether, if this Amendment were accepted, it would prevent the hon. Member for Armagh moving the Amendment at the bottom of the next page, which would meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and seemed to be in the direction in which the Government wished to go?

MR. MAC IVER pointed out that the alternative proposal suggested a pauper emigration, and for that reason he wished to support the original Amendment. They must remember that neither the United States nor Canada would have anything to say to a pauper emigration. Every shipowner knew very well that if he took out to America persons incapable of earning their own living, he would have to bring them back again.

MAJOR O'BEIRNE wished to know whether he was to understand from the right hon. Gentleman that the Government intended to accept the Amendment further on with reference to specifying particular districts?

MR. GLADSTONE: That is a matter for consideration.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he hoped the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would stand by his Amendment, because it would make it certain that the Government would see that the people wanted emigration, and would avoid doing anything to stimulate those feelings of discontent which emigration proposed through Government means would undoubtedly produce in Ireland. It was complained that this would lead to collective emigration, but it would not do anything of the kind. The very words of the Amendment precluded the idea of the Commissioners promoting anything like collective emigration. Some of his hon. Friends objected to the Amendment; but would they bear this in mind—that what was to be feared, and what the Conservative Members desired, was that the landlords might have the power, if they desired to use it, of suggesting and compelling emigration? This Amendment would put the law between the landlords and the people who desired emigration, because it would require the Commissioners to listen to the people and not to the landlords, and to see that it was the people, and not the landlords, who desired the emigration to take place. If anything could reconcile him to the adoption of the system recommended by the clause, it was the insertion of words which would assure them that the clause would work side by side with the will of the people. The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) objected to the insertion of the words "sufficient number." As he (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) understood it, the noble Lord felt this—that unless a pretty large emigration was likely to take place from a certain district, it might be held that there was not a "sufficient number" according to the sense of the Act. He did not think they need fear this, because if the people seeking to emigrate were numerous enough, even if they were only one or two families, they could join in a general scheme of emigration, and it would not be necessary that there should be anything like a large or aggregate emigration from any particular place. It was feared that it might be possible to emigrate people from such places as the county of Meath, where there was a paucity of hands; but this must be borne in mind—that where there was a paucity of hands the people, as a general rule, would not desire to emigrate. Wherever the people desired to emigrate, the Committee might rest assured that they would have good cause for it. Hon. Members must look at the ordinary rules of human action in these matters. As for the suggestion that there should be forms prepared which persons desiring to emigrate should sign, he considered that such a plan would only facilitate the object of these "undertakers" of emigration schemes. The "undertakers" would go round getting as many names as they could, in order to submit them to the Commissioners, and thus the very evil which the noble Lord dreaded would be created. The noble Lord said that that could be done under the plan of the hon. Member for Wexford; but they must remember that that scheme threw directly on the Commissioners the duty of seeing that a desire existed for emigration. If they had a formal application set up, that formal application would be the standard—it would be the letter and not the spirit of the application which would guide the Commissioners.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was convinced that the Amendment was in the right direction, and for the reason that it had a tendency to curtail the vicious nature of the clause by mitigating some of the evils against which the Irish Members contended. The whole policy of the Government was to turn out and clear away the peasant population, and to consolidate the farms. Reference had been made to the county of Meath. Well, in that county the wholesale system of emigration which it was now sought to establish had, to some extent, been carried out already. After the Famine of 1847, the landlords thought it would be more profitable to feed cattle on their lands than to keep a population of tenant farmers. They cleared the best land in Meath of its population; and that was the intention of the framers of this Bill in regard to the whole of Ireland. But the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford, as he had said, would have a tendency to limit the vicious operation of the Bill, because, as he understood it, it would provide that emigration should take place under the measure only where the parties had made application in sufficient numbers to make it worth while to effect a wholesale clearance. But that did not fully fulfil the condition which they would like to adopt—namely, that the parties should be absolutely free agents. They knew that in these Colonies nothing was more popular with the Government of the day than for them to borrow money in large sums to spend on railways, which never paid their working expenses, to encourage emigration, and to make a great show for the glorification of the Ministry. Ministries in the Colonies were very short lived affairs. The Colony of New Zealand had been steeped in debt by an ambitious Ministry through works of this kind. The Colonies might be able to give the English Treasury good security; but if they did, it would be a great evil to the Colony, and the Land Commission would be taught to hold out inducements to people to emigrate, which would, in the end, be found to have been based upon a thoroughly erroneous idea. The emigration agents held out the rosiest promises, which were rarely, if ever, fulfilled. In the last Parliament there was a Gentleman, who used to sit not very far from the position which he (Mr. Biggar) was now occupying, who represented the Dominion of Canada, and who had a number of sub-agents under him, who used to use their exertions to get as many people to go to Canada as possible. The unfortunate people of Ireland would be liable to be misled by the false statements of such sub-agents. Statements would be made which they would believe; and they would be trepanned into signing declarations that they wished to emigrate; and thus the evil which it was desirable to guard against would be brought about. He thought it desirable that every limit should be put to the operation of this particular clause.

COLONEL STANLEY: As a point of Order, it seems to me very inconvenient that hon. Members should accumulate Amendments upon Amendments in this way. We have had from the Government—from the mouth of the Prime Minister himself—the clear declaration that in principle he is not opposed to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy). Surely, then, the principle having been conceded, it places us in a position hardly becoming to men of business to discuss whether certain words should be inserted and certain words left out. Such a course turns the House away from its proper function of criticism—in which the House is known to excel—and imposes upon it the function of draftsman, in which it has never been particularly distinguished. The Government wish to adopt words which, in their opinion, embrace the whole of this question; and many hon. Members wish to adopt other words. Well, if we were all to take our 650 different readings of the clause, and views as to how it would best read, and were to embody those views in Amendments, we should land ourselves in a position which would be one of simple folly. I must take exception to what fell from the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) just now, when he said that there was every anxiety on the part of the landlords of Ireland, and I think he said especially of the Conservative landlords, to unduly stimulate or force on emigration. That I do not believe for one moment to be the case; and I would venture, even from my partial knowledge of the matter, to give the statement the strongest possible denial. What is the present position of affairs? Great advantages have been given to the tenants—advantages they have never enjoyed before—for continuing in their holdings. I do not think it has been said that these holdings shall be below a certain size, and it follows from that that many of them will be consolidated. ["No, no!"] Men cannot exist on very small holdings. They will have to be consolidated, and if the stronger tenants are to remain, it follows that the Government are only doing their duty in endeavouring to help those who, from various circumstances, may be anxious to try their fortunes elsewhere, to emigrate; and, I am bound to say, that they are endeavouring to assist tenants to emigrate in a manner which will be as little harmful to them as possible, and with every consideration for their feelings. I understand it is not the desire of the Government to check sporadic emigration, and that it is their desire to assist, as far as possible, the emigration of families and persons in particular districts, so as to avoid the severance of family ties, which has been so painful a feature in the past, and to mitigate, as far as possible, the evils which some persons believe to arise from emigration. I would therefore point out to the Committee that it is impossible for them to find words which will exactly suit the taste of every hon. Member, and appeal to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) not to indulge in mere verbal criticism, but to withdraw his Amendment on the understanding that any verbal alteration that may be thought necessary will be made on Report.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that during the progress of the Bill he had frequently looked along the Front Opposition Bench, and had always failed to see the right hon. and gallant Member who had just sat down in his place. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman now sauntered into the House in the middle of debate, and suggested that an Amendment that he (Lord Randolph Churchill) had proposed was merely one of verbal criticism. If the right hon. and gallant Member had been in the House when the Amendment was proposed, had heard what had been said, and had given as much attention to the details of the measure as many hon. Members, he would have seen that the proposal involved an entirely different mode of procedure to that of the hon. Member for Wexford. He, however, begged leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment to the proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HEALY said, he did not like to take any part in the framing of this bad clause—it was even against his inclination to propose Amendments to it. He merely brought forward his proposal as an alternative. It would have this advantage—that it would restrict the power of the Commissioners, would prevent sporadic emigration, and be a check to the agents and speculators in emigration.

MR. VILLIERS STUART said, he hoped hon. Members opposite would not hastily render ineffective this well-meant proposal of the Government. No one could feel more deep regret than he did at seeing a single Irishman compelled to leave his native country by stress of circumstances, and he should be the last man to support any scheme of emigration, or assist emigration, if he thought there was any other way out of the difficulty. But he could not conceal from himself that they must face circumstances as they were. He, of course, felt that in the case of every country its population ought to be its wealth, and that where that was not the case it must be owing to misgovernment. Abundant population meant cheap labour, and cheap labour ought to mean successful manufacture. He felt that the reason why Ireland had not been successful in manufacture was that, through the jealousy of England, Irish manufactures had been strangled and destroyed. But it was of no use to go back to the past, and to cry over spilt milk. There was in Ireland a state of things which condemned a large number of Irishmen to starvation, and the only immediate remedy was either migration or emigration. Why should they not try both? Migration must be slow in its operation, for uninhabited districts could not be rapidly prepared for the reception of a population, and whilst the grass grew the steed starved. They might be sure that emigration would go on in any case, but with this difference—that if the Government proposal were not accepted, it would be the flower of the population that would emigrate. The strongest and most able-bodied would emigrate, leaving the feeble and the sickly behind. The effect of the Government proposal would be to enable their families to accompany the able-bodied out of the country instead of remaining behind a burden on the rate-payers—

THE CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. Member that it is the Amendment we are on, not the general subject.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR said, he had not yet spoken on the subject of the Amendment, as he had desired to hear all the arguments which could be used for and against the proposal, and to have his mind clear on the subject. The proposal of the hon. Member for Wexford he believed to be one of the most dangerous with which they had yet had to deal, because it practically—though he was sure it was not the hon. Member's intention—admitted the principle of the clause. His hon. Friend, in trying to amend the clause, not intentionally, but impliedly admitted its principle, or, at least, helped it on. He (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) wished it to be understood that he was opposed entirely and completely, not only to the Amendment of his hon. Friend, but to the proposal which he sought to amend. He had listened with great patience to some speeches which had been made. It was said that they did not wish to assist sporadic emigration, but collective emigration—that was to say, that they did not wish to take the flower of the population, but the old with the young. Did anyone in his senses think that Canada wanted the old fathers and the grandfathers of families? They said, according to the clause, and according to the Amendment, that what they wanted was that not merely the young and strong in a family, but the whole family should emigrate. The clause did not proceed on the principle of benevolence; because, according to it, they would not be expending, but lending money. It was loans they were giving, not grants; and if they granted loans it was with the expectation of having the money repaid to them. The money could only be repaid if the speculations were profitable, and how could it be a profitable speculation to take to Canada old, decrepid, half-starved farmers incapable of earning a living? So far as their proposal was meant to deal with the old and infirm, it would result in defeating their own intention, or it would not work at all. He had heard about there being a great amount of congestion in some districts in Ireland; and the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Villiers Stuart) had suggested two remedies. He had said—“You have emigration and migration, why cannot the two work together?” This was a question which he had answered at least a dozen times in the course of this discussion. Emigration and migration could not work side by side. One was absolutely destructive of the other. If they permitted emigration, they might as well say farewell to migration. Who would assist reclamation for purposes of migration, when they had a simple means of getting rid of the people by emigration? He was sorry they had had the Amendment before the Committee at all, and thought it would have been much better for them to have stopped at the line of general and complete hostility to the proposal of the Government.

MR. BELLINGHAM said, he hoped the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) would not withdraw the Amendment, which appeared to him one that was most excellent, and which he should have to support if it were taken to a division. His (Mr. Bellingham's) prinprincipal object in rising was to answer a few observations which had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy). The hon. Member had said that the Conservatives—and he supposed that he meant Irish Conservatives—were in favour of emigration. Well, all the Conservatives that he (Mr. Bellingham) knew were against emigration, whilst all the Liberals of his acquaintance were in favour of it. A well-known Conservative (Mr. Fitzgibbon) a Master in Chancery in 1869, had written a pamphlet on this question, and in it he declared that the productive capabilities of the soil in Ireland might be increased ten-fold, that Ireland did not suffer from over-population, and that the cause of the backward condition of the country was the absence of security of tenure. Mr. Fitzgibbon said that if they once convinced the cultivators of the soil that the fruits of their labour would be their own, they would not desire to go to foreign countries for blessings they could enjoy at home. After that, it was ridiculous to say that Conservatives were in favour of emigration.

MR. LEAMY said, this proposal of the Government would be a very fair and reasonable one, provided the powers to be given to the Land Commission would not be exercised for, say, 12 months after the Bill had been in operation, and they had had an opportunity of seeing whether or not the tenant could obtain sufficient security. The great objection he had to the Amendment was that the unfortunate people at present might have that desire to emigrate which came from insecurity of tenure. Moreover, in the event of arrears of rent being due to the landlord, they declared that the Land Commission should have power to say what the rent should be, and the landlord should have power to say whether or not he would agree to a compromise, and, if he did not, that the Commission should be able to say to the tenant—"We can do nothing for you, you must go; but, if you like, we will pay your passage to America." If the Government believed in their Bill, they would prevent the Land Commission from having this power for at least 12 months after the Act came into operation.

MR. DAWSON said, he agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Galway

(Mr. T. P. O'Connor) that impliedly in the Amendment countenance was given to the project of emigration from Ireland. No doubt, the hon. Member had been actuated by this idea, that if the clause were to remain it should be as harmless as possible to the people of Ireland. He gave the hon. Member credit for that sagacious view of the matter; and, though he agreed with the hon. Member for the City of Galway, if the Amendment were pressed to a division he should vote for it. If there was a sufficient inducement to them to bring their energies into practice, all the emigration undertakers and speculators, and all those who were ever ready to project schemes for the depopulation of Ireland, would at once be up and eager for the fray. However, the Commission would be amenable to this House, and it would assuredly be visited with the condemnation of Parliament and the country if it in the slightest degree assisted these undertakers and speculators. At the proper time—and he had consulted the Chairman as to when would be the proper time—he should move a new clause, which would entirely obviate the necessity of this provision of the Government. His was a proposal for migration.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not know whether they would have a division on the Amendment; but some hon. Members were decidedly opposed to it. As far as he was concerned he would recommend his hon. Friends to accept no favours from the Government. The Government had agreed, as a favour, to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford, and thus it was held by some that they had entered into a sort of partnership with the Government in the clause, and would not oppose it when the proper time came. He must confess that he did not fully agree with that view of the question. Though the Government might agree to an Amendment moved by one of the Irish Party to curtail the operation of the clause, that Party would, nevertheless, when all the Amendments and alterations were admitted in it, be able to oppose it on its merits if they thought fit. The hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Bellingham) had read a quotation from a pamphlet by a Conservative gentleman, giving an opinion with regard to emigration. He was glad to see that, at least, some Conservatives were opposed to the principle advocated by the Government and by so many Conservative Members of Parliament. Both Parties in the House should have their eyes opened to the fact that the population of Ireland was much too small at present, and, instead of offering facilities for lowering it, they should give their attention to increasing it. The Irish Members held that it would be desirable to increase the small holdings in size; and that was a very different thing from contending that the occupiers of these small plots should be turned out and left to the tender mercies of the emigration speculators of Colonial Governments. Furthermore, he held that the occupiers of these small holdings must be, on the whole, the judges of their own interests, and, if it suited their purpose to remain in occupation, he did not see why the Committee should agree to a proposition to force them to emigrate.

MR. DAWSON: Is it competent, now, for me to move the clause I indicated to the Committee?

THE CHAIRMAN: All new clauses must be moved at the end of the clauses.

MR. DAWSON: Can I not move this as an addition?

THE CHAIRMAN: It will come in at the end of the clauses, and there are a great many Amendments before the end of the clauses.

MR. CALLAN: Would it be in Order to move at the end of the words the Committee have adopted the words "or migrate?"

THE CHAIRMAN: No; that would be outside the whole scope and meaning of the clause.

MR. CALLAN said, he wished to submit, as a point of Order, that though they had only accepted the word "emigrate," there had been no limitation agreed upon; and that, therefore, the words "or migrate," which would only enlarge the clause, could be accepted.

MR. BIGGAR said, that before the Chairman gave his decision on the point of Order, he should like to point out what was the object of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not the question in the point of Order raised. It is my duty, as Chairman, to ascertain the whole scope of a clause and to find out whether Amendments are in agreement with that scope or not. For instance, there is an Amendment further on to include the word "England." That is not admissible as, within the scope of the Bill, this clause being confined to emigration.

MR. DAWSON: I will bring on my Amendment later on in the form of a new clause.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Should I not be in Order in moving to add the words "such district being one scheduled in the Relief of Distress Act, 1880?"

THE CHAIRMAN: So far as I can see, that Amendment would be in Order.

MR. HEALY: Might I ask if that would shut out a question lower down, on the word "Ireland?"

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say anything with regard to Amendments that are to follow, as I have not considered them in this connection.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Then I rise to propose these words—

At this point the CHAIRMAN left the Chair:—Upon resuming the Chair,

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chairman whether, as a question of procedure, after his usual retirement for a short time, it would not be convenient for him to have the Division bell rung?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not in Order in his remarks.

MR. BIGGAR thereupon moved that Progress be reported, and explained that he did not wish to make any imputation on the Chairman; but he had been from time to time misunderstood in regard to the practice he had pursued of moving that the House be counted on occasions similar to this, where there was scarcely any Members present.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is referring to the procedure of the Committee, which is not the Question before the Committee. He is entirely out of Order in raising such questions on a Motion to report Progress.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would not pursue the matter; but he moved to report Progress, because the Front Benches were empty, and there were very few Irish Members present.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

MR. O'SULLIVAN observed, that he regarded with great regret these obstacles being placed in the way of this Bill. Such a proceeding as this might bring some hon. Members into notoriety; but the people who sent them there had some hope from this Bill.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; Committee counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. O'SULLIVAN, resuming, said, he regretted the Motion to report Progress at so early an hour. This Bill, if passed, would be the means of saving thousands of people who had been thrown out on the roadside. He could well understand the landlord party opposing this Bill, but he could not understand why any Irish Member should throw any obstacle in its way. He had seen with pain during the last week or fortnight that many obstacles had been thrown in the way of the Bill by those who ought to be the first to help it on; and, much as he should regret to disagree with any of his hon. Friends, he could not stand quietly by any longer and see the Bill delayed in this way. The Bill did not come up to the wants of the Irish people in every respect, but there were some good things in it. Ever since he was a boy the tenants had feared, first the rack-renter, and then the exterminator; but this Bill would put an end for ever to both, and he trusted his hon. Friend would withdraw his Motion, so that the discussion might be continued without further interruption.

MR. FINIGAN said, he thought the reasons which the hon. Member (Mr. O'Sullivan) had advanced in favour of the clause under consideration were reasons which ought rather to go against it. The object of the Bill was to save tenants from eviction, and if it prevented unjust rents and processes of law this clause was not wanted in any way.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is discussing the merits of the Bill, but the Question before the Committee is the question of reporting Progress.

MR. BIGGAR observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had expended a good deal of virtuous indignation, and had gained great applause; but when the Chairman resumed the Chair, the House was almost empty, and both the Front Benches were unoccupied. He did not feel disposed to talk to empty Benches, and he had moved to report Progress in order to give hon. Members an opportunity of returning to the Committee to discuss this Amendment. That was his sole reason; but he would now withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIVAN said, he wished to move an Amendment, which he thought of considerable importance, because the Premier had stated that the object of the clause was not to promote the wholesale emigration of the Irish people, and not to promote the emigration of the people who were likely to be most useful to the country. But now that the Government had accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), he would suggest that, after the Amendment of the hon. Member, these words should be inserted—

“And that such persons shall be accompanied by their wives and children, and other relatives whom the Boards of Guardians shall certify to be dependent upon them.”

It was important that persons who emigrated should not leave behind them others who would be chargeable on the Union, and these might be not only a wife and family of an emigrant, but his father and mother, or uncle or aunt, or other relatives. He did not wish to carry his proposal too far; but he thought it important that the Boards of Guardians should decide such a question, and he hoped the Prime Minister would accept the Amendment, or something like it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out that it is quite impossible to put this Amendment, because it will not read in the clause.

MR. BIGGAR proposed an Amendment which would raise the same question. He would not discuss the general policy of emigration; but the Government had made no distinct statement as to how it was proposed to deal with the people who were to be called upon to emigrate.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's Amendment is equally unreadable with the last, and it is impossible to put it. It is out of Order in the form in which it is now, and I cannot put it.

MR. BIGGAR said, he could not see how his Amendment was out of Order, and wished to ask in what sense it was out of Order?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has no right to ask the Chairman for the reasons why he rules him out of Order. He has no right to interrogate the Chairman, a course which is now repeated 50 times a-day.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Gentleman persists upon this point, I shall consider it an interference with the Chair.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not wish to question the Chairman's ruling; but would he be justified in proposing to insert "regarding the best means of promoting emigration," omitting the rest of his Amendment?

THE CHAIRMAN: I think that would be in Order.

MR. BIGGAR begged to apologize for any seeming incivility or improper conduct—

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was sorry to interrupt the hon. Member; but his Amendment would not make English at all. The Commission could not enter into agreements regarding the best means of promoting emigration. They could enter into an agreement as to a particular plan, but not regarding the best means.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment to "enter into agreements regarding the best means of promoting emigration" is nonsense with regard to this clause.

MR. BIGGAR said, the clause gave authority to the Commissioners to enter into arrangements with certain parties with regard to emigration, and he thought it would be perfectly competent for them to say on what terms the proposed arrangements should be made; to ask the parties where they were going to take the emigrants, on what kind of vessel, and other questions. He submitted that he was perfectly in Order in his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have explained to the hon. Member that the Amendment is not sense, and I cannot put it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he hoped he might not get before the Committee the Amendment he brought out last night, but in which he was interrupted, and that the Amendment would not draw upon him another lecture from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Lancashire. He proposed to leave out the words—

"Any person or body of persons having authority to contract on behalf of the dominion of Canada, or of any province thereof, or on behalf of any British colony or dependency, or any state or other district in such dominion, province, colony, or dependency on behalf of any public company or other public body with whose constitution and security the land commission may be satisfied."

Of course, the clause as it now stood, after taking the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy), appeared to have a greater probability of some action arising out of it than before; but the effect of these words which he proposed to leave out was to place the Land Commission in the position of a great emigration agent. He could conceive nothing more unfortunate, both as regarded the Commission and as regarded the Irish Government, than to put duties of this kind on the Commission, because its first duty was to be a judicial body to decide questions of law and fact between the parties. Now, it was proposed to make it an executive and administrative body. But what was wanted principally with that Land Commission was that it should be a body enjoying the confidence of the Irish people, and he could not conceive anything more likely to destroy any confidence the Irish people might be disposed to repose in the Commission than to make the Land Commission a great emigration agent contracting with parties over all parts of the world for the emigration of the Irish people. Now, he proposed to bring in here a body which had hitherto been uniformly selected by Parliament for the promotion of emigration from Ireland, and that was Boards of Guardians; and he had pointed out last night that four times had this subject come before Parliament. In 1838, 1843, 1847, and 1849, Parliament refused to go beyond giving powers to the Boards of Guardians to assist emigration. It refused to take a step which the Government invited the House to take now—to bring the Government in direct contact with emigration. If there was one thing wanted in emigration more than another it was that it should be the result of local effort guided by local knowledge. That he looked upon as essential; and he wanted to know how the Commission, with any persons such as were described in this clause, could possess that local knowledge so essential to successful emigration? But if Parliament brought in the Boards of Guardians, they would have bodies in whom the Irish people, as a rule, had confidence, because they were to a great extent elected bodies. And it would command the co-operation of the Catholic clergy. The powers of the Boards of Guardians were already very great. They could charge the rates with money for the emigration of paupers who had been three months in the workhouse; they could charge the rates for the emigration of poor persons who had not been in the workhouse; they could charge the rates for the purpose of emigrating holders under £5, on the condition that the landlord provided two-thirds and surrendered all claims for rent. But by the last Act their powers were extremely wide. By the Act of 1849 they could, with the consent of the Poor Law Commissioners, apply any money they had in hand from the rates of any electoral division; or they could borrow from the Exchequer Bill Loan Commissioners, or from private persons, money to be spent in emigrating persons who were simply limited to the description of poor persons, absolutely distinct from paupers. And they could absolutely, in this Act of 1849, emigrate these persons, not only to British Colonies, but to any part of the world. Parliament might enter a limitation as to where the Guardians might assist people to be emigrated. He wished to point out what he considered of such importance—that there should be local authority. There had been enormous emigration from Ireland since the Famine, and that had planted in America and into British Colonies immense numbers of persons from Ireland; and when a person emigrated, the chances were he wished to emigrate to a neighbourhood or locality where he had relatives, and the relatives in America, Canada, or British Colonies would constantly send home the money to bring out to them those whom they had left behind. He would also point out that the reason why these Acts had not operated so fully as they might was that there was too great a limit on the power of raising money. In the first place, it was necessary the rates should be charged on the electoral division, which was too small an area for any purposes of emigration; and, in the next place, the Guardians had to pay back the instalments under seven years. He thought that was a very short period, and he was not surprised that Boards of Guardians had not been too ready to contract loans to be repaid in so short a time. But, while leaving these Acts as they were, he wanted to ask the Government why they abandoned a line which Parliament had four times refused to abandon—namely, to leave this emigration in the hands of local bodies; why they were now, for the first time, proposing that the Commission should personally direct and stimulate emigration? Surely, the Government were not so popular at the present moment that they could afford to run the risk of so unpopular a step? Surely, they did not command that unlimited and unbounded confidence in Ireland which they enjoyed in England? And he could not conceive anything likely to be more disastrous to the Government in Ireland than that it should be connected, except indirectly, to advance money, with the emigration of Irish people. Then, if this Bill were passed, both landlords and tenants would stand on their rights. If tenants who were in arrears went into Court to get statutory terms, the landlords would force them to pay, and then there would be a great demand for emigration, and Boards of Guardians were the proper people to deal with such cases. The Land Commission ought not to be connected with any extensive deportation of the Irish people. The Prime Minister had said he would not favour any scheme which contemplated the conduct of emigration by the Commission; but the Chief Secretary had an Amendment for securing the satisfactory transhipment. How could there be greater detail of management than this? It was taking entire responsibility, and, if the Commission were to fulfil all such duties as that, nothing could be more disastrous. The Prime Minister had said distinctly that the object of the Bill was to stimulate collective emigration; but he objected altogether to that, because, if those words were taken with the words “a sufficient number,” which had just been passed, they would mean nothing but clearing a whole district. That was the emigration the Prime Minister wished; but it was not the emigration he wished to see. He should prefer what he should call selected emigration by the Boards of Guardians. That would not in the least involve a pauper emigration, but the emigration of persons who held holdings of £4 or £5 value or under. The Chairman of the Board of Guardians of one of the poorest districts in Ireland told him last year that such people had been utterly unable to exist in bad seasons, and they had no means of emigrating. Those were the persons who ought to be assisted—the squatters and very small holders, and not the farmers. He did not suppose the Prime Minister would accept his Amendment; but it had given him the opportunity of placing on record his distrust of the proposal of the Government, his alarm at the consequences which it might cause to the Government in Ireland, and his protest against collective emigration, which meant the wholesale clearance of districts in Ireland.

[Twenty-sixth Night.]

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 13, to leave out after the word "with," to the word "for," in line 19, in order to insert the words "boards of guardians, or with any persons for the time being authorised to act as guardians of any union,"—
(Lord Randolph Churchill,)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words 'any person or body of persons having authority' stand part of the Clause."

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he regarded the clause as a most useful provision for Ireland at the present time; but if Ireland were now a virgin soil ready to be ploughed up, and capable of yielding unlimited produce, he had no doubt that migration would be much more acceptable to the people than emigration. Being, however, satisfied that the power of reclamation was much exaggerated, and that there was not sufficient land in Ireland which could be used beneficially, he felt that reclamation and migration would not be of much use to the people. There were several impediments in the way. First of all, the nature and amount of the land; next, the difficulty of getting the land there was to be reclaimed—for this Bill would make it more difficult to get land every day, and the Commissioners, or whoever might intend to reclaim, would have to buy twice over—namely, from the landlord and from the tenant. The proposal of the noble Lord he looked upon with considerable alarm, for he believed it would do a great deal of harm. There were many Boards of Guardians who entered into long discussions on vexed political questions; and he feared the noble Lord's proposal would turn the Boards of Guardians into debating bodies on political questions, and so the poor people would be left out in the cold. He did not regard the preference given to Canada as of much importance; but he would make a suggestion as to other Colonies. It was urged by some that the Government ought to give money for emigration to our Colonies, or any other parts of the world; but, in his view, that would be a great mistake in political economy. It was one thing to send people to our own Colonies, but quite another to send them to enrich other parts of the world. If it were thought necessary to send emigrants to the United States, the Government might send them there individually; but if we were to have a system of emigration of families which would be useful, it ought only to extend to our own Colonies. He was utterly adverse to the emigration of the labouring classes, and he thought the emigration of those people now going on was very disastrous to Ireland. The bone and the sinew, the young men and the young women, were leaving Ireland, while the old and the crippled remained behind; and he hoped the Bill would not give facilities to the labouring people to emigrate. The people to emigrate were the very small farmers. Their emigration would be beneficial to the country; they would take with them a happy recollection of the Mother Country, if they were sent in families at the expense of the State, and by them there would be implanted in the Colonies a love of the Mother Country among those who preceded them. He and others on that side of the House, although the Bill was against their interests, desired the Bill to pass and become law; and he did hope that the Government would persevere with this clause and not give facilities to the bone and sinew of Ireland to leave their country, but would give large and generous facilities to the small farmers to go from where they were in misery and distress to places where they could live more happily.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The object of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) is to confine this clause to assistance by Boards of Guardians; but, from experience, I believe that foreign countries do not look with as favourable an eye on emigrants coming by the help of Guardians as on those coming by help from other sources.

That kind of emigration will not meet our object, which is to relieve the great pressure upon land, and on employment in some parts of the most crowded districts. But does any hon. Member suppose that by merely helping a Board of Guardians—for instance, in the most over-populated districts in Mayo—we should be likely to relieve that pressure? I will not allude to Boards of Guardians bringing politics into discussion, for that is not the ground of my objection. My objection is that Boards of Guardians are locally interested in this question. If it is desirable to have cheap labour, a man who has a small holding and cannot live on it, is necessarily a cheap labourer, and that is a matter which must occupy the attention of the Guardians, either on one side or the other. With our popular system of electing Guardians, it is possible the people who wanted help would elect the Guardians; but it is also very possible that the employers of labour, the farmers or landlords, may be the most active persons in the Boards of Guardians, and I do not think they are the people to decide this question. I think it is perfectly right that we should require that the Commission, being an impartial and outside body, should be convinced that there is a desire for emigration; but it is another thing to go further, and put the matter to public vote, not only as to whether the people wish to emigrate, but also as to whether they are willing to incur debts for emigration. That seems to me to put it out of the question that we should make Boards of Guardians the sole means of communication. The noble Lord said some remarks of the Prime Minister were inconsistent with the Amendment I have brought forward. He said the Prime Minister stated that we did not propose that the Commission should be the body to conduct emigration. Conducting emigration and controlling emigration are perfectly different things, and we do not propose that the Commission itself shall conduct emigration; but it is perfectly right, and we are willing to put in words to secure, that the Commission and Treasury should take care to control emigration, and one of the means of doing this is that there should be some arrangements by which emigrants can be taken out in proper ships, that due regard should be paid to their health during the voyage, and that they should not be merely landed on the seaboard, but cared for until such time as they can get to their destination. I do not think the Government would be justified in lending money unless they get an assurance that these things would be done, and could see their way to their being done. I think, therefore, that the charge of inconsistency between the statement of the Prime Minister and my Amendment is fully disposed of. Despite what the noble Lord says, we have no intention whatever of "clearing" any districts; but for the time being we wish to relieve the pressure upon land, and upon employment in certain districts, and to provide that those who remain or who are not "cleared" shall be in a happy position. This coming to Parliament for any sort of assistance for emigration is merely done under the pressure of the present circumstances. We look forward as little as any man in this House to emigration as a final cure for the state of affairs in Ireland. I believe Ireland is under-peopled; but I believe equally that the Bill under discussion—and I am pleased to find it so much more approved of by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Friends than it was when it was introduced—will bring about a new era in Ireland, and that we shall find that Ireland will support a much larger population. Of course, remedial measures do not change the face of a country in a day, and we have to deal with great calamities and miseries at the present moment. It would almost seem as if hon. Members below the opposite Gangway, who are supposed to be opposed to the Bill, really believe it will do more immediate good than we ourselves think it will do. There are many small farmers in some of the districts of Ireland, whose heads no change whatever in their relations with their landlords would put above water. I do not believe there will not be a change that will benefit the position of the small farmers generally. I think this Bill will considerably improve their position; but it must be remembered that there are some tenants who could not live upon their holdings, even if they held their farms rent free. Now, we have these people to deal with, and the noble Lord says—"Deal with them through the Board of Guardians

in the district." We do not feel that that is a satisfactory suggestion; we do not think that we could get a Board of Guardians to pick out those people who wish to emigrate, and who are most fitted for emigration. We look forward to some of these people being benefited by employment, and by the occupation of land elsewhere, and we have provided for this in our measure. This clause is opposed as if emigration was a new thing in Ireland. You may go all through the country, and you will hardly find a single village in which some of the people have not friends or relations abroad. When I visited, a short time ago, the districts which were most visited by the Famine in 1848, I found there was scarcely a man who had not got a friend in the United States; in one or two cases, the emigrants had gone to one or other of our own Colonies. Emigration is beset with great physical dangers, and still more with moral dangers. We do not pretend to be able to destroy them; but we think there would be an advantage if there could be some arrangement with any foreign or Colonial Government, or any Company—and it would have to be a very respectable and influential Company before the Treasury or the Government would venture to support it—by which these dangers would be guarded against as much as possible. Hon. Gentlemen have great suspicion of the Treasury, no matter what Government is in power; but this would be a matter for public opinion, and public opinion would very strongly condemn any assistance the Government might give to a speculative Company or a Company which wished to trade on the misery of these poor people. Arrangements may be made by which, instead of picking out the young men or the young women, you may send out a family, and every regulation can be made for their comfort. I am sure I look forward, if there is any organized system of emigration, to some of the bodies of emigrants being accompanied even by Catholic priests. [Mr. HEALY: Yes; Father Sheehy.] Why is it that there is this opposition to our proposal? What is there in what we are proposing to do that can do anybody any harm? You say that this is a scheme by which we want to depopulate Ireland. If we wish to do this, we have acted very clumsily, and we have taken a very circuitous course to accomplish the object. Is there any other part of this Bill which has that object in view? If this Bill is to be any credit to the persons who have introduced it, it must result in making the Irish people more happy and contented, and in inducing more to remain in the country. Really, it is too unreasonable to contend that at the end of our measure the Government have introduced this clause with the object of depopulating Ireland, and of undoing all the good accomplished in the early part of the Bill. I doubt very much whether the people of Ireland wish this clause to be struck out of the Bill; in fact, I challenge any hon. Member to say that the persons really interested in this matter would prefer the plan for emigration to be struck out. I believe many of the Irish people will take advantage of the clause in order to join their friends in other countries. I do not say they desire to leave their country; but they would do so because there was a chance and hope of getting better off elsewhere.

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, if the Government did not accept this Amendment, he hoped they would assent to, or themselves put in, some plain words which would satisfy the Committee that the emigration fund would get into the hands of the proper people. His fear was precisely that of the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Hervey Bruce)—namely, that the bone and sinew might be taken from some districts where it was really needed, and where every man who went away would be a loss to the community; and that those who had better go would remain. What were the statistics of emigration? From Connaught there emigrated last year 20,519, and from Ulster 28,000. The only part of Ulster, so far as he was aware, where emigration funds were needed was Donegal; yet there were only 8,423 emigrants from that county. From Antrim, about the richest and best county in Ireland—certainly in the North of Ireland, for a portion of the large town of Belfast formed part of the county—there were 5,738 emigrants, or nearly double the number of emigrants from the poor county of Donegal. Unless some words were put in the clause, limiting the district to which or limiting the class of people to whom these funds were to be given, it might be found that from Antrim and other prosperous parts of Ireland, applications would be made for assistance which ought not to be granted. He certainly hoped the Government would introduce some words which would relieve the minds of the hon. Baronet (Sir Hervey Bruce) and himself on this matter.

MR. GORST said, he would confine himself strictly to the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), and would not be betrayed into the irregularity of making a general speech in reply to the general observations of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The question immediately before the Committee was, whether, assuming that there was to be an emigration scheme, it would be better to intrust the management, or the outlay of money, to the local authorities in Ireland, or to the Government of Ireland itself? It seemed to him everything was in favour of the proposal made by the noble Lord. In the first place, it was a proposal in accordance with precedent. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary talked about having had experience of emigration schemes and about emigration having been successfully carried on in times past. True; but they were carried on under the management of local authorities. He did not think the Government could point to a single instance where the State or Treasury itself had controlled or managed a great scheme of national emigration. A local authority was the proper body to intrust with the management of emigration, because a local authority alone could successfully carry it out. Emigration was a distinct loss to the nation at large; it was an advantage only to the locality from which the emigrants went. The hon. Baronet (Sir Hervey Bruce) seemed favourable to some scheme of emigration which would send all the tenant farmers out of the country, and keep all the labourers in it. He (Mr. Gorst) did not know whether the Government were prepared to carry out that object; but, if they were, he did not believe they would succeed. The people who could be sent out of a country, with advantage to themselves, were extremely few, and if Parliament left emigration in the hands of a great State body in Dublin, it would be found that this body would become extremely unpopular. The Executive Government could not judge who were the proper people to send and who ought to be left behind; and he was certain that if the Irish Government endeavoured to carry out an emigration scheme by means of a central authority, their unpopularity, which was now great, would be enormously increased. It seemed to him that if they were to be guided by precedence, by the experience of the past; if they were to proceed in the way which had hitherto been successful, it would be far better to give any assistance that was to be given in the manner indicated by the noble Lord.

MR. A. MOORE said, he thought the Prime Minister must be deeply moved by the solicitude expressed by the Fourth Party for the reputation of his Government. In his opinion, a more disastrous proposition could not well be placed before the Committee. If emigration was intrusted to Boards of Guardians, those authorities would, of course, use the power to suit local requirements—that was to say, they would be inclined to emigrate the people who were now a burden on the rates. That was not the way in which this question ought to be looked at. What was wanted was a lightening of the congested districts, and it was just possible that the Boards of Guardians there might not be the best judges of their own wants and necessities. He did not see, moreover, how a Board of Guardians could provide for the proper shipment, transport, and residence of emigrants. The influence of a Board of Guardians was purely local; and how could it be expected that they would be able to exercise any influence with a great shipping company or with the authorities of New York? The Government would be capable of making the necessary and proper arrangements.

MR. MULHOLLAND said, it was his wish that this clause should not be inoperative. It was a necessary supplement to the other clauses of the Bill, and upon its operation much of the success of the Bill must depend. The only satisfaction the landlords would experience for the sacrifices they were called upon to make would be the success of the Bill in pacifying Ireland, and in restoring prosperity to that country. There was no doubt it was advisable to relieve, by means of emigration, the congested districts of Ireland; but of all bodies to entrust the management of emigration the Boards of Guardians were, perhaps, the least suitable. The first persons they would send out would be the paupers, so that the rates might be relieved. In the next place, unfortunately, the members of Boards of Guardians in some districts where emigration was most needed, were certainly not unconnected with political agitation; and the Committee had heard indirectly from hon. Gentlemen themselves that the chief objection to this clause had been based upon political reasons. Anything that would restore prosperity to the West of Ireland would make the people less willing to listen to those agitators who had, perhaps, been rather too much listened to hitherto. It was just possible that Boards of Guardians would not wish to facilitate the operation of this clause, but rather to throw obstacles in its way. He was decidedly opposed to the proposal of the noble Lord. In conclusion, he might say that he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) had been entirely misunderstood. The hon. Baronet never suggested that all the tenants should emigrate, but that those whose position at present was uncomfortable should have facilities afforded them of doing so if they chose.

MR. MARUM said, he thought it was very desirable that the Land Commission or the Treasury should not have absolute power in the matter of emigration, but that a local authority—and the Boards of Guardians would be the most suitable body—should be able to exercise some influence over them. With regard to the political views of Boards of Guardians, surely the introduction of this Bill was a sufficient justification for the political action taken by Boards of Guardians and other bodies in Ireland. He would urge the Government to invest in the local Guardians a controlling power in this matter which was at present exciting a great deal of attention in Ireland. He had always advocated the principle of the Bill; but he felt that this clause was unnecessary, and was calculated to produce more harm than good—more ill-feeling and dissatisfaction than actual benefit.

MR. FAY said, he would be much more satisfied if the Commissioners were the controlling power. He thought they would be much more likely to act in a generous spirit than any Board constructed of foreign materials, and, in many cases, having no element of popular representation at all. He knew that in many districts in the North of Ireland the ex officio Guardians were not very favourable to the Catholic clergy. Then there was another view to be taken of the question; for, as the hon. Member for Downpatrick had pointed out, the taint of pauperism would attach to these expatriated peasants who were shipped off by the Boards of Guardians, and that would be one of the most deterrent circumstances to prevent the people from applying for emigration purposes to the local Boards. In 1848, they died by the roadside rather than enter the poor-house; and he believed that in 1881 they would starve in thousands before they would apply in pauper form to be sent to America, Canada, or elsewhere. The name of pauper attached to the very friends of those who had been in any way relieved; and if the details of the emigration were left in the hands of the local Boards, it was known very well that they would take advantage of every opportunity to ship off the old and the maimed at the expense of the State for the relief of the ratepayers.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he did not think the Guardians should be the sole depositories of the power of emigrating the people; but he would by no means exclude them, and he hoped the present Amendment would be withdrawn in favour of an alternative Amendment of his own, which he intended to move at the proper time.

MR. BIGGAR said, he understood that the proposition of the Government was not to send out parties who were willing and able to emigrate at their own expense, and thoroughly competent in all respects to take care of themselves. If those were the people who were to be emigrated, the Land Commission would be a very suitable tribunal to deal with them, because such parties might appear before the Courts of the Land Commission by themselves or by counsel to state their case and enter into contract or arrangements with the Commission with regard to the amount of assistance they should get to facilitate their going abroad. But he thought the real object of the clause was to facilitate the emigration of those whose status in the country was thoroughly hopeless, and, i that case, the Poor Law Guardians were the proper parties to come in contact with that class of people. The intention was not that any large area of the country should supply emigrants, but that the emigrants should be taken from certain defined districts; and the best parties to deal with them were the Poor Law Guardians, who knew the feelings and wants of their own particular districts, and probably each Guardian would know personally every inhabitant in his own district, and would be able to speak of each applicant from his own personal experience, and would be better able to give a correct opinion than a party who got his information only at second-hand. The Poor Law Guardian would, in point of fact, know whether the party proposing to emigrate was able to emigrate at his own expense, or whether he was likely to become a burden on the rates, and whether such a person could earn his own living by removing to a different part of Ireland, or perhaps to England or Scotland. Besides, the Poor Law Guardians had relieving officers under them, whose special duty it was to be acquainted with all the parties. Many of the parties who would be willing to go would be strong young men whom it was not desirable to have leave the country. The object of the clause was to remove those who could not help themselves in this country to another where they could lead an easier life and not be a burden on the ratepayers of the old country, or perhaps to the ratepayers of the new community among whom they were taken. But the Land Commission, which would be a judicial body consisting of gentlemen with very large salaries, could have no local knowledge whatever, and would be thoroughly incapable of knowing the facts, especially as they would have no machinery to enable them to make inquiries. Under these circumstances, he should support the Amendment of the noble Lord, which would probably have a tendency to make the Bill less objectionable than it was at present. He knew very well—indeed, it was notorious in Ireland—that ex-officio Guardians acted in direct contradiction to the interests of the local Guardians; but, at the same time, even the ex-officio Guardians would at least know the facts of the case and be enabled, if disposed, to give an impartial judgment on these questions.

MR. MAC IVER said, he supported most cordially the general intention of the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock; but he could not vote for it as it stood, lest it should prevent the moving of other valuable Amendments on the Paper which it would supersede.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he was opposed to the Amendment, because it would enable the ex officio Guardians, who were the landlords in every district, to deport their own tenantry.

MR. O'DONNELL thought the hon. Baronet was suffering from some misapprehension. There was no danger that the landlords would use the machinery of the clause to clear the land for themselves. It was in a different way that the proposal of the Government would assist the evicting class of landlords. If the facilities proposed by the Government for emigration did not exist, then the evicting landlords would be hampered by the knowledge that the Government would be obliged to deal with the mass of evicted tenants, and would not have any means of shipping them off to foreign ports, and, consequently, the evicting landlords would be afraid to refuse reasonable compromises, because they would know that if they unduly increased the embarrassment of the Government by increasing the number of evicted tenants, the Government, which disliked nothing so much as embarrassment, would have to take some steps to limit the operations of the evicting landlords. But when those landlords knew that the Government had an easy and expeditious way of getting rid of embarrassment by simple transportation to foreign shores, they would at once hold out for the exaction of the utmost farthing of arrears, and the utmost letter of their bond, and Her Majesty's Government would be able to meet the remonstrances of the Irish Representatives by saying—"If there are a large number of evictions, we, at all events, are graciously providing for the evicted tenants in Manitoba, Van Dieman's Land, and other salubrious localities in which the discontented Irish tenantry will not be subject to the evils of English legislation." The Amendment supplied a most useful and, indeed, an infallible test as to the real design of the Government. The noble Lord who moved it said, very reasonably, that if the Government proposal was really intended to solace, and to carry off, and to better the state of numbers of poor farmers in Ireland who could not have their condition bettered in any other way, the proper persons to carry out the benevolent intentions of the Government were the Boards of Guardians, local representative bodies, possessing local information, knowing which were the poorest and the hopelessly bad cases of those who could not be got to live in comfort and prosperity at home, and knowing the families whose only chance consisted in deportation from their native land. But the Chief Secretary had at once risen to let the Irish Members know, what they had suspected previously, that it was not the hopelessly bad cases for which there was no other outlook than emigration which were really meant to be operated upon by this beneficent measure of the Government. It was the voters of Ireland whom Her Majesty's Government really wished to clear out, the men who returned Nationalist Members, instead of Whigs, to sit at the back of the Ministry.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is travelling beyond the limits of the Amendment.

MR. O'DONNELL: I am referring to what was said by the Chief Secretary. Their cardinal point is that they will deport the Irish voters.

THE CHAIRMAN: I have already explained that it is not in Order to discuss that point.

MR. O'DONNELL: May I ask whether it was in Order for the Chief Secretary to do so? [Cries of "Name, name!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member defies the authority of the Chair, he knows what consequences will follow.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he was about to ask the Chairman a question on a point of Order. He was sorry, however, he was not allowed to state it. In proceeding with his argument, he would observe the Boards of Guardians were specially calculated to exercise a useful restraining influence on the operations of the Government. Though there were ex-officio Guardians, the majority of the Boards were elected, and elected by the very classes who would be benefited or injured by the operation of this emigration proposal. They possessed the local information, the time, and the capacity to deal with the question; they had financial responsibilities, and they were, in short, precisely the best persons in the present state of the law to carry out an emigration proposal for the real benefit of the people. As to the proposal to put the working of the Emigration Clause in the hands of the Land Commission, it was only necessary to point out that that Land Commission was a central body. On what or whose information was it to act? Were they not to act upon local advice at all? Were secret circulars to be sent down asking for information to be supplied secretly to the Government with regard to the disposition of the people to emigrate or not? Was it the magistracy or was it the constabulary which was to set in motion the Land Commission and the Government scheme of emigration entirely in the dark? The Chief Secretary had said that if the emigrants landed on foreign shores under the auspices of the Board of Guardians, they would be regarded as paupers. But what sort of an argument was that to address to the Committee? Was it not notorious that Her Majesty's Government were proposing to ship off Irish paupers "anywhere, anywhere out of" its jurisdiction? Did not everybody know, whether in Canada, the United States, or elsewhere, that it was the people of the Irish nation who had been reduced to extreme want and distress who were to be shipped away under this emigration scheme? What was the good of pretending to conceal, or of hoping to conceal, that every man who went out under these circumstances would go out branded with the British brand of pauperism? The Chief Secretary, in saying that he hoped to save these emigrants from the brand of pauperism by deporting them from this country under the auspices of some other body than the Board of Guardians, simply showed that he had a higher opinion of the obedience of his majority than he had of the reasonableness or of the common sense of the House. The men who would go out from Ireland in this manner would land on a foreign shore with the brand of pauperism. If that was their object, if the Government wished to begin by branding the men, they would do better by giving up this emigration proposal entirely, and allowing the men to stay at home. To a certain extent, he would accept the representations of the Government that there was a very great difference between beginning life as a pauper in a foreign land and finding a new start among one's own countrymen at home. If the Government declined absolutely to accept every reasonable guidance of the local representatives of the class specially affected, they would only convey the idea to that class that they were too ready to receive—that they were anxious unrestrained to have the carrying out of this emigration scheme. He had not heard from the Government one word of the slightest intention that they would accept any restraint or guidance. Now, considering that the operation of their proposal was certainly likely to go on for a considerable space of time, it was too much to ask the Committee to give into the hands of the Government a blind authority, uncontrolled, to do what they like after their own fashion. The Government, in the person of the Chief Secretary, said—"We want carte blanche to deport as many Irish families as we think ought to be deported." Such a power should not be granted to the best-meaning Minister; he would refuse it to an Irish Chief Secretary for Ireland as he would to an English Chief Secretary for Ireland. The best-meaning of central authorities must be radically incapable of making a judicious choice of local subjects for emigration without the assistance of the local authority. In their own interest, the Government ought to desire to have their authority shared; and they should accept, if not the precise words of the noble Lord (Lord Randolph Churchill), some Amendment instituting some local check on the administration of this emigration scheme, and the exercise of central discretion. He was very much inclined to amend the Amendment by providing that Boards of Guardians should hold special meetings, and constitute themselves after a special manner, in order to take into consideration proposals for emigration. He should, in fact, provide that at these special meetings of the Boards of Guardians no member of the Board should sit, act, or vote, except those elected. He thought if the noble Lord would consent to that amending of his Amendment by eliminating from the Board all ex officio Guardians who were more or less belonging to the landlord class, or in many cases interested in the expatriation of the people, then there would be a number of local bodies approaching as nearly as possible to the character of fairly elected representatives of the popular wishes. The Government lamented the unfortunate circumstances that had prevented them introducing a system of county government in Ireland. Now, here was an opportunity of providing an organization in the interval which would carry out some of the purposes of local government in a most important matter. If the Government would consent to this, he was sure that they would find co-operation from five-sixths of the Irish Representatives. In this way the intentions of the Government and the wants of the people would coincide, and harmony would take the place of discord between the central authority and the people. It would work thus. The Land Commission would be authorized to apply a sum of money to the emigration of necessitous persons in certain counties; they would consult a special meeting ad hoc of a Board of Guardians, from which the ex officio element had been eliminated, as to local wishes and the number of bond fide poor people who were willing to emigrate; then at once the Government would be able to clear the Irish soil of encumbrances that would cease to be encumbrances elsewhere, and the fears of the Irish people of wholesale deportation would be removed, because, while, on the one hand, the Government offered all due facilities for the removal of the necessitous poor, on the other hand, the local Guardians would act as a check whenever it seemed that a scheme for the relief of the poor was degenerating into a scheme for the deportation of the population. He would not move the Amendment just at present, as he would hope to hear that the suggestion was favourably considered—in the first place, by the noble Lord, to whom it was only due that he should have the opportunity of dealing with it; and, above all, by the Government, who had the means of giving effect to the suggestion. He must emphatically object to the view of the Chief Secretary that the central authority should have this power, unchecked by any safeguard whatever; and he generally supported the proposition of the noble Lord that Boards of Guardians, as representing the wants and wishes of localities, should have the necessary consultative voice in the arrangements. But he reserved to himself the liberty of proposing an Amendment on the Amendment, to provide that Boards of Guardians, for the purpose of carrying out this emigration proposal, should consist exclusively of elected members, and that landlords and land agents should not take part in the proceedings when such proposals were under consideration.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would at once answer the appeal which had been made to him. He could not agree with the proposal of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill); but he admitted there was one strong point in the recommendation which was sustained by the precedents in which Parliament had vested authority in Boards of Guardians. But that principle had been deliberately departed from in the proposal in the Bill. Then, when he looked at this Amendment from another point of view, he found that the hon Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell), in his anxiety to forward the progress of the Bill, proposed that the Government should forego the desirable means of management they had made; secondly, that they should introduce the Board of Guardians; and, thirdly, as Boards of Guardians had an unsatisfactory constitution, that they should reform the constitution of Boards of Guardians. Incidents, these, to forward the progress of the Land Bill! He (Mr. Gladstone) had listened to the discussion which the noble Lord was quite entitled to raise, and which had been carried on for a considerable length of time, and which had received but a very moderate amount of support from Irish Members, and he could not help hoping that the Committee was now in a condition to dispose of the Amendment. He quite admitted the fairness and legitimacy of the discussion, and the weight due to the consideration that Parliament had made use of this instrumentality before; but it was quite clear, for various reasons he would not now go over, that the Government could not consent to the substitution of Boards of Guardians for the agency they contemplated. He was afraid that if there was only one objection to the proposal—and it was far from being the only one—it was this, that it would attach more or less the suspicion or idea of pauperism to the people emigrated—that it was sending paupers away. This would fatally embarrass the action of the authorities under the clause, and create an impression on the other side of the Atlantic which would be fatal to the prospects of those persons whom the noble Lord, with perfect sincerity, sought to benefit.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not think that the Government of the country to which the emigrants were sent had a right to insist that they should get only healthy and strong persons without any mixture of others. The idea was preposterous that none but parties thoroughly able to work should be sent away at the expense of the State, leaving the old and infirm behind. He thought in cases of this sort the interests of the locality from which the people went should be consulted; but the proposal seemed to be that these Companies should be allowed to draw away the strong and young who would support their aged and infirm relatives, and that was a proposition that seemed to come with an exceedingly bad grace from a British Minister having the interest and welfare of the community in view. The remarks of the hon. Member for King's County, that the Boards of Guardians contained a mixture of ex officio members, of course had weight with them, and he did not mean to say they were a perfectly representative body; but they were less objectionable, from his point of view, than the body the Government proposed to administer the provisions of this Bill. Although, as the hon. Baronet said, only half of the Guardians were elected, it was known at the same time that the selected Guardians, as a rule, attended to their duties with greater regularity, and what they might lose in social position they gained in the influence that always attached to those who were zealous in the discharge of their duties. Those of the Committee who were not Irishmen should know the manner in which the election of Guardians was conducted. It was not by means of the ballot, but by means of voting papers; so the landlords really did exercise considerable influence on the result. Besides, the voting power of the ratepayers was not one vote for each ratepayer, but according to the amount of the valuation; so, in point of fact, the Boards of Guardians were not at all a democratic body, as a rule, and they would not be at all likely to act in a manner very much in opposition to what might be supposed the general ideas of landlords, being largely representatives of the higher rank of rate-payers. If the Commission could not attend to the work of reclamation, he did not see how they could attend to the operation of this clause, and which would require a knowledge of details not likely to be possessed by the Land Commission.

Question put, "That the words 'or persons, or body of persons having authority,' stand part of the Clause."

Question put,

The Committee divided:—Ayes 266; Noes 19: Majority 247.—(Div. List, No. 303.)

Amendment proposed,

In page 18, line 14, to leave out the words "on behalf of the Dominion of Canada or any province thereof, or."—(Mr. William Edward Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

MR. BIGGAR said, this Amendment was only in appearance a concession to Irish public opinion. Even if the Amendment was carried, the other parts of the clause would make it quite as mischievous as though it was passed in its original form. What he would wish to see was the insertion of words which would specially except the Dominion of Canada from the provisions of the Bill, and by that means give a guarantee to the unfortunate people who were, practically, to be sent to penal servitude that they should not be sent to a climate that was perfectly unsuitable for them. In his view, the Land Commission and the Treasury ought not to be allowed to enter into contracts with the Government of any country in reference to this matter whose climate was not compatible with the health of people who had been reared in Ireland.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member was discussing an Amendment which was not on the Paper, and was therefore out of Order.

MR. HEALY said, he had on the Paper an Amendment for the insertion, after the word "the," of the words "United States of America" in this particular part of the clause, and he therefore wished to know what would be the position of his Amendment if that of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary was now passed?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Gentleman would have an opportunity later of moving his Amendment.

MR. DAWSON said, considerable difficulty would be removed if the right hon. Gentleman would state that the effect of the clause would not be to prevent the sending of emigrants to the United States.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the inquiry of the hon. Member would be met by the later words in the clause, which were to this effect—

"Or on behalf of any public company or other public body with whose constitution and survey the Land Commission may be satisfied."

MR. WARTON said, he regretted that the Government had allowed themselves to be influenced by the unworthy pressure which had been brought to bear in order to induce them to except the Dominion of Canada from the operation of the Bill.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, rising to Order, asked the Chairman whether the hon. Member was in Order in saying that pressure, no matter from whatever quarter of the House it came, was unworthy?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he did not regard the expression of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport as un-Parliamentary.

MR. WARTON, resuming, said, that Canada was one of the most loyal among England's Colonies, and he should therefore have thought Irish Members would have felt grateful for the generous assistance which the Canadians had given to Irish fisheries and towards the relief of distress in Ireland. He could not help repeating the expression of his regret that a graceful and merited compliment to Canada was about to be struck out of the Bill.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, he was grateful to Canada for her very practical sympathy with Irish suffering; but, at the same time, he must be allowed to say that he had no desire to see or to hear of the bones of his unfortunate fellow-countrymen being committed to the snows of that Colony. The clause, as it stood, was practically one for deporting the Irish people to Canada, and to nowhere else.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he regarded the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman as purely illusory, and for this reason—

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman reported Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES (IRELAND).

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he wished to take that opportunity of stating that he had placed on the Table the clauses which he intended to propose with regard to labourers' cottages.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 14th July, 1881.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Land Law (Ireland) [135]—R.P.

QUESTIONS.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND) ACT, 1870—THE BESSBOROUGH COMMISSION—THE REPORT AND EVIDENCE.

SIR WILLIAM PALLISER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can say why the dates of all the "Statements in reply to or in explanation of Evidence" published along with the Report of the Bessborough Commission, and amounting to 385 separate statements, have been withheld; and, whether the Committee signed their Report without having seen or studied this rebutting evidence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, his only means of obtaining information to answer the Question had been to apply to the Secretary to the Commission, and probably the House would wish him to read that gentleman's reply. It was as follows:—

"The principal Report of the Commissioners bears date January 4, 1881. After that date no material alteration was made in it and the date was not altered. It was, however, again considered supplementarily, and separate Reports of the dissenting Commissioners were added to it on January 10. By that time, all the oral and the great bulk of the written statements in reply to, or in explanation of, evidence affecting individuals had been received and considered. The majority had been received and considered by January 4th. The time for receiving such statements was, however, extended for some weeks in order that full opportunity might be given as promised for replies. Many statements were accordingly received subsequently, and were printed by direction of the Commissioners, some of them as late as March."

It is invidious to speak of the dates of those statements as having been withheld. The statements were mostly embodied in, or inclosed in, letters to the Commissioners. The dates of those letters, together with any other matter not forming part of the actual statement, were, in the ordinary course, deleted, and the actual statements were copied and sent to the press.

MR. TOTTENHAM: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that rebutting evidence was received up to March?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I cannot say. I have read the answer as I received it.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—DISPOSAL OF PETTY SESSIONS' FINES FOR DRUNKENNESS AT TULLAMORE.

MR. MOLLOY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the fines imposed and levied at Petty Sessions, in cases of drunkenness occurring within the municipal boundary of Tullamore, are now paid into the Fines and Penalties Office; whether such payments should not, under the provisions of "The Towns Improvement (Ireland) Act, 1854," and the 30th section of the Licensing Act of 1874, be paid to the Town Commissioners of Tullamore; and, whether, if that be so, he will cause the necessary instructions to be given for that purpose?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that under the Acts referred to in the Question of the hon. and learned Member, one-half only of the fines in question were payable to the Town Commissioners, and he believed they were so paid at present.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—THE POST OFFICE, DONEYCARNEY, CO. MEATH.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, If it is true he has refused to allow a post office for Doneycarney and Mornington, county

Meath, because the postmaster asked so high a salary as £1 a quarter, or £4 a year; and if he can state the salary Her Majesty's Government were willing to pay?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, that some time since he received a Report that it would be desirable on public grounds to open a Money Order Office and Post Office Savings Bank at Mornington; and, considering the great advantage it would be to the people of the district, he gave his consent. When the matter became known to the postmaster, having other business to attend to, he at once absolutely refused to conduct the business of the Post Office Savings Bank and the Money Order Office. The postmaster was pressed to do so, but still refused. It was not a question of salary. Under these circumstances, thinking it very undesirable that the inhabitants of the district generally should be deprived of the advantage of having a Post Office Savings Bank and Money Order Office, and seeing no other alternative, he accepted the postmaster's resignation, and he hoped that before long he would be able to put a suitable person in his place. At any rate, he would do his best to prevent the inhabitants of the district losing the advantage of a Money Order Office and Savings Bank.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: The right hon. Gentleman has apparently misconceived my Question. He has not answered the Question on the Paper; but he has answered one which I did not put. I asked if the Government refused to pay the postmaster so high a salary as £4 a-year, and I will add this—did they not offer him £3 instead of £4?

MR. FAWCETT: It will be in the recollection of the House that I explained, on Monday last, that the pay of these small sub-postmasters was partly dependent on salary, and partly on the amount of the Savings Bank and Money Order business transacted. It is estimated that when the Savings Bank and Money Order Office is opened, the emoluments of the postmaster at this place will be more than doubled. This was pointed out to the postmaster, and he still refused to carry on the office if he had to conduct a Savings Bank and Money Order business; and, so far as I can discover, the question of salary had nothing whatever to do with it. He absolutely refused to be worried with the new business.

MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: I must ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is or is not the fact that the postmaster was offered £3 when he asked £4?

MR. FAWCETT: No. What I understand is this—it was not, as I have twice before said, a question as to salary, but of the postmaster absolutely refusing to do this additional work. I understand that he has offered to carry on the Post Office without a Savings Bank or Money Order Office, if we will pay him £4. [MR. A. M. SULLIVAN: Hear, hear!] Yes; but I am so anxious that the public should have the advantages of a Savings Bank and Money Order Office in this place, that if he had offered to do the other work for nothing, or to pay the Department for doing it, I would not let him do it if the public were in consequence deprived of these additional advantages.

STATE OF IRELAND—REFUSAL TO SERVE LIQUOR.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has ascertained that the statement of Mr. Brown, of Newbridge, that his reason for refusing to serve John Costello with liquor on the 6th June was "because he was drunk" was untrue, and whether Costello was not perfectly sober; whether he has ascertained that the publican took away the liquor and threw it on the ground, on hearing that it was for Costello, who had just returned from driving police and prisoners; and, whether the Government approve of and intend to support the action of General Frazer in putting this public house out of bounds?

MR. CHILDERS: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that I have no intention to interfere with the decision of Sir Thomas Steele in this matter. I have read the statements on record, and I am satisfied that Costello was sober, and that Mr. Brown refused to supply him with beer because he had been employed by the police.

METALLIFEROUS MINES—INSPECTORS' REPORTS, 1880.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a paragraph in the Report of the Inspectors of the Metalliferous Mines of Cornwall and Dorsetshire, at page 543 of the Inspectors of Mines Reports for 1880, which runs as follows:—

"On looking down the list of fines, one cannot help being struck by the fact that most of them are absurdly small. The fact is, a very large number of the magistrates are interested directly or indirectly in mining. Many of them are owners of mining property, and have been troubled by repeated notices to fence dangerous abandoned shafts, and have been thereby put to considerable expense; some, indeed, have been prosecuted for neglecting to attend to these notices; others are shareholders in mines in the district, and, as such, are not disposed to look favourably upon Government restrictions, which they think may interfere with their profits. If the offences had been punished with greater severity, mine agents would have attended to the provisions of the Act with much more diligence. I am convinced that this mistaken leniency on the part of the magistrates leads to a delay in carrying out all the provisions of the Act, and thereby tends to keep up the death-rate from accidents;"

and, whether he will bring in a Bill this Session to prohibit magistrates who may have a direct or indirect connection with metal mines from sitting on the bench, or in any way by their presence taking part in such mining cases?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the allegation by the Inspectors that the magistrates, having an interest in mines, inflicted inadequate fines, so as to lead to the non-enforcement of the law, was a very serious one. In the case of the coal mines, that was obviated by an enactment that persons interested at all in mines should not act as magistrates in the case. In the case of the metalliferous mines there was no similar enactment, and that, he was informed, was done deliberately, because it was considered that in Cornwall and other like places, where metalliferous mines abound, it would have been almost impossible to have found any magistrates who were not interested, because it was so common there to have small shares in various mines. But, of course, when that was allowed, it was assumed that the magistrates having such an interest would not allow that interest to interfere with the administration of the law; and, if it was true that that was the case, no doubt, some remedy would be found for it. He should hope that the hon. Member's Question, having called attention to this very serious matter, might tend to cure it; if not, of course, some serious remedy could be applied to it. In answer to the latter part of the Question, he was afraid the present state of Public Business did not afford very favourable hope of introducing a Bill on this or any other subject this Session.

MR. MACDONALD suggested that a Circular of warning might be sent to the magistrates of Cornwall from the Home Office, as had been done in other instances with good effect.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE DOWN CONSERVATIVE FLUTE BAND.

LORD ARTHUR HILL asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at Petty Sessions in Downpatrick on 30th June last, when certain members of the Down Conservative Flute Band were prosecuted by the police, and the cases sent forward to the assizes; whether the offence alleged was, that they had played, as they had been in the habit of doing, in the public streets; whether it was given in evidence that the tunes played were not party tunes, but were "Annie Laurie," "The Girl I Left Behind Me," "God Bless the Prince of Wales," and "God Save the Queen;" whether it is illegal to play such tunes in the public streets; whether it was not further given in evidence that their conduct was orderly and peaceable, that they were attacked by stone throwing and did not retaliate; whether, under such circumstances, it was not the duty of the police to protect them when attacked, and whether their assailants should have been prosecuted; and, whether he will direct the prosecution against the members of the band to be abandoned?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW): Sir, my attention has been called to the prosecution referred to by the noble Lord. I am informed that the musicians mentioned are members of the "Downpatrick Orange Flute Band," and are charged with the offence known as "unlawful assembly." They appear to have played the tunes mentioned in the Question, which in itself would be perfectly innocent; but the charge is that they played through a part of the town where their music, if not so meant, was, at all events, more than likely to be regarded as a defiance and thus to cause a breach of the peace such as actually occurred.

Downpatrick, as the noble Lord is doubtless aware, contains an Orange or Protestant quarter and a Catholic quarter; and I am informed that whenever the band of one quarter plays, in however orderly a manner, through the streets of the other, it is accepted as a challenge, and disorder generally ensues. This, as might have been expected, occurred on the present occasion. Fourteen of the Orangemen, believed by the magistrates to have thus provoked a breach of the peace, and also two of their assailants, have been sent for trial at the Assizes, and I must say that at present I see no reason for directing an abandonment of the prosecution.

MR. PARNELL asked whether there was any disorder on the occasion?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. LAW), in reply, said, that there was.

THE NATIONAL GALLERY—ADMISSION OF ARTISTS ON WEDNESDAYS—DEPOSITING STICKS AND UMBRELLAS.

MR. COOPE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether he will take steps to secure to artists further facilities, by granting them permission to copy the paintings in the National Gallery on Wednesday, the public being admitted as at present on that day, and without the payment of a fee; whether he would require the enforcement of the existing rule requiring visitors to deposit their sticks and umbrellas on entering, a system which has been relaxed by the authorities of the South Kensington Museum and of the Royal Academy; and, whether he will deem it necessary to enforce this inconvenient regulation in the South Kensington Museum?

MR. SHAW LEFÈVRE: Sir, I must remind the hon. Member that the details of management of the National Gallery are confided to the Trustees and Directors of the Gallery, and I have no power to interfere with their management in such matters. I have, however, communicated with the Trustees on the subject, and have been informed that they are unanimously of opinion that they cannot accede to the suggestions of the hon. Member. With respect to the first, they say that to admit copyers to the Gallery on Wednesday would materially interfere with the right and enjoyment of the public; and with respect to the other, they say that their own past experience has been that there would be danger to the pictures if people were allowed to bring their sticks and umbrellas into the Gallery. Two of their pictures were seriously damaged when at Marlborough House in this respect.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE NEW WARRANT—PURCHASE CAPTAINS.

Mr. H. TOLLEMACHE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will consider the advisability of granting to Purchase Captains in the Army a step of Brevet Rank on the occasion of the issue of the New Warrant, so as to avoid their supersession in Army Rank by a great number of Non-Purchase Captains now their juniors?

Mr. CHILDERS: Sir, if I understand the object of the hon. Member's Question it is that, there having been admittedly under the regimental system great inequality in promotion, especially from lieutenant to captain, he wishes me to redress this inequality, so far as Army rank is concerned, in favour of Purchase captains. This proposal has been carefully considered, and I regret that it is quite out of my power to adopt it. It would create a very dangerous precedent, and would perpetuate on a large scale the evil of brevet promotion other than for distinguished service.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE MILITIA AND THE LINE.

Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that when Militia Regiments form battalions with Line Corps, the latter have two lieutenant-colonels, one commanding, four majors, and a proportionate number of captains and subaltern officers, whereas the Militia battalions have only one lieutenant-colonel and one major; and, whether he will allow to the Militia Corps the same advantages with regard to promotion that the Line Corps have by increasing the number of Militia officers?

Mr. CHILDERS: May I suggest, Sir, to the hon. Member that, before he puts a Question on the Paper, already very crowded, he should inquire whether it has been already answered? As a matter of fact, this Question has been twice answered, on the 3rd and 13th of June.

Mr. Shaw Lefevre

SOUTH AFRICA—NATAL—PROMISED LIBERATION OF LANGALIBALELE.

Mr. GEORGE PALMER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether Her Majesty's Government have yet fixed any time for the liberation of Langalibalele, the Natal Zulu Chief, in accordance with the intimation which the Earl of Kimberley made to a deputation from the Aborigines' Protection Society in May 1880?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that Lord Kimberley asked him to answer the Question. Since the occurrence of the deputation, the Basuto War had taken place, and it would be impossible, in the present condition of the country, to release Langalibalele. Beyond that, a very strong opinion against his liberation had been expressed by the Legislative Council of Natal; and, under those circumstances, Lord Kimberley was unable to indicate a time when he should be released. It would, however, take place as soon as it could be done with safety.

DOMINION OF CANADA—ALLEGED COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can lay upon the Table the text of the communication made to the Canadian Government by the French Consul at Quebec inviting Canada to join in a Commercial Treaty, and also Copies of the Correspondence that has taken place on the subject with the French Government?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have been informed that the communication is question was not made by the French Consul General, but by his predecessor, in a private letter written after he had ceased to have any official character, and without any authority from the French Government.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE ROYAL ARTILLERY—SEIZURES FOR RENT.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is true that a number of men belonging to the Royal Artillery (stationed at Limerick) acted in the capacity of bailiffs or drovers on the 23rd ultimo, by driving the cattle of Mr. Patrick Browne (seized for rent) from the Railway station at Limerick to the pound in that city; and, if so, if he approves of the Artillerymen being called on to discharge such a duty?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir. I called for a Report on the subject of the hon. Member's Question, and I am satisfied that Major Goodeve, who commanded the military on the occasion, exercised a wise discretion in acting as he did.

NAVY—H.M.S. "POLYPHEMUS."

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that in a recent trial of the "Polyphemus" it was found impossible to maintain the required air pressure in the stokehole; and, if so, whether it is true that the cause was traced to the leakage of the bulkheads, which are supposed to be capable of resisting water pressure; and, if true, who is responsible for such defective workmanship?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, on the preliminary trial of the air-fans in the stokehole of the Polyphemus by the contractors for the engines, it was found impossible to maintain the required air-pressure at the commencement of the trial. It is not the case that the cause was traced to the leakage of the water-tight bulkheads, which are capable of resisting any water-pressure to which they will be subjected; but there were a few bolt holes in the bunker bulkheads in connection with a considerable amount of work not yet completed. These small holes, which previous to the trial were considered by the contractors as unobjectionable, had been left open; but when they were plugged up the required pressure was obtained and maintained during the rest of the trial.

NAVY—H.M.S. "MUTINE" AND "ESPIEGLE."

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Copies of the Reports of the trial of the centrifugal pumps in Her Majesty's Ships "Mutine" and "Espiegle," with the Letter on the subject from the chief engineer of the first-named ship; and, whether he will give the Copy of a Telegram from the Admiral Superintendent of Devonport Dockyard to the Dockyard

Officers and Captains of Steam Reserves in that port, with reference to the defect discovered in the shell room of the "Mutine" when commencing to store gun cotton and live shell on 26th May last?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, while the Mutine was being fitted the chief engineer reported that on letting water into the ship for the purpose of testing the performance of the centrifugal pumps, it was found that some water was leaking from one compartment to another. The fact was that the compartments had not been completed, and the superintendent gave orders that the pumps were not again to be tested until the bulkheads were in a finished state. I may say, further, that in composite vessels like the Mutine—that is to say, vessels with an iron skeleton frame with the wood bolted on to it, the wood must and will shrink to a slight extent until the inside has been well wetted, and the bulkheads cannot be perfectly water-tight, though sufficiently so for the safety of the ship. The telegram alluded to in the second part of the Question was simply an order from the Admiral Superintendent in his office at Devonport to the officers in Keyham Yard to examine and make good a defect reported in the shell-room light box of the Mutine. The defect was reported to the Admiralty, and as, under the system pursued at the Dockyard, all work, good and bad, can be traced, the foreman of shipwrights and two leading men were punished for passing imperfect work. I may say that, in the case of both shipwrights and fitters, the authorities have occasionally to animadvert upon imperfect work, but very seldom, considering the great amount that is done in establishments where, as in our Home Yards, 16,000 artificers and labourers are employed, and upwards of £1,000,000 a-year is paid in wages.

NAVY—THE FRENCH AND ENGLISH FLEETS IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If it is correctly stated that the French fleet operating on the coast of Northern Africa consists of ten ironclads, seven of the first rank and three of the second rank; and, if he will state what number of ironclads are now in the Mediterranean under the orders of Sir B. Seymour?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, there have been three French iron-clads on the coast of Northern Africa, which, from the latest advices, we have reason to believe have now been supplemented by the Toulon squadron of six other vessels. This would make nine in all, of which six rank as first-class ships. But there are first-class iron-clads and first-class iron-clads, and the six armoured ships under the command of Sir Beauchamp Seymour form a fleet which, for fighting efficiency, is quite worthy even for England to show in the Mediterranean. I wish this Question had not been asked; but since it has been asked, I must remind the right hon. and gallant Member that the whole commissioned iron-clad fleet of the French, with the exception of one vessel, is in the Mediterranean at this moment, while we have in European waters the four iron-clads of the Channel Squadron and the nine Coast-guard ships, of which eight are at present in the Baltic.

ASHANTEE—PAYMENT OF THE WAR INDEMNITY BY THE KING.

MR. HEALY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Since this Country is at peace with the King of Ashantee, why a large fine of gold dust was recently exacted from this potentate; what this fine represents; whether it is war indemnity; whether it is the price of this Country keeping the peace towards him; on what principle the amount of indemnity was fixed; and, whether the Home Government was consulted before the gold dust was demanded from Ashantee?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the gold dust received from the King of Ashantee was not exacted as a fine or a war indemnity, but was offered by him as a token of submission, and accepted as a partial set-off against the expenses incurred by the Colony in making preparations to resist the invasion of the protected States, which he threatened, if a political refugee were not given up to him. The Home Government were not consulted in the matter.

MR. HEALY asked whether it was not a fact that the King denied the sending of a threatening letter?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that he had that morning read through the Papers, and the answer he had given was in accordance with the view he derived from reading them. Although it was true that the King had stated that it was not his intention to attack the Colony, yet, at the same time, he had placed a large force upon the Frontier, and it was generally believed he was going to make an attack on tribes under our protection.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN asked on what pretence the Gold Axe of the King was taken from him and brought to England?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he answered that Question before.

THE ROYAL UNIVERSITY OF IRELAND —SCHEME OF THE SENATE.

MR. DAWSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to the fact that, in the scheme for the Royal University of Ireland, no provision is made for the granting of a special diploma in the branch of the medical profession dealing with diseases of the eye; and, whether such an omission shall be filled up?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the scheme had been laid on the Table. On looking into it, he found it contained special recommendations to students to attend lectures on diseases of the eye and ear, and other special subjects in medicine and surgery. As to granting a diploma, it lay with the Senate, and not with the Government, to grant diplomas for such subjects.

MR. DAWSON said, that he asked the Question at the instance of leading oculists and aurists in Dublin, who were surprised that no such diplomas were offered. If no diplomas were given, the culture of those branches of medical and surgical science would not be secured.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE CITY OF WATERFORD.

MR. R. POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to a speech made at a meeting of the Town Council of Waterford by the Mayor of that city, in which the Chief Magistrate said—

“That by the action of the Government in prescribing the city business relations and the ratepayers were injuriously affected, and the general trade damaged;”

and, if he would state if any person had been arrested in Waterford since it has been declared a prescribed district?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had seen the report in The Waterford Daily Mail of the speech made by the Mayor of Waterford; and he did not appear to have stated, with regard to the prescribing of the city and county of Waterford, that it had injuriously affected the business relations of the ratepayers. What he stated was that, in his opinion, the action of the Government might have that effect. No person had been arrested in the City of Waterford since it was prescribed.

MR. LEAMY asked whether, since no person had been arrested, the right hon. Gentleman still considered it necessary that Waterford City should be prescribed?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did. He thought it likely that prescribing the city had made arrests unnecessary.

MR. LEAMY asked if the right hon. Gentleman had inquired into the circumstances of the arrest of Mr. J. T. Power, who had been arrested under the Coercion Act?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had examined into the alleged grounds of arrest, and satisfied himself on the point.

LUNATIC ASYLUMS (IRELAND)—ANNUAL REPORT OF THE INSPECTORS.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware of the fact that the annual Report of the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums is only issued as a "short delivery Paper;" and, whether, looking to the great importance of the subject, he will take steps to have it issued in future as a "full delivery Paper?"

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he dared say the hon. Member was aware that the authorities of the House exercised discretion as to whether Reports should be sent round to every hon. Member, or whether they should be merely printed for hon. Members who applied for them, the latter course being taken in connection with Reports not of general interest. The annual Report of the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums seemed to have been treated in the latter way; but the hon. Member, or any other hon.

Member, could get copies of it on application being made.

FRANCE—THE NEW GENERAL TARIFF—THE JOINT COMMISSION.

MR. BROADHURST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether equal facilities were given to the workmen and the employers to place their views on the Tariff question before the Joint Commission which recently sat at the Foreign Office to inquire into that subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Joint Anglo-French Commission, in consequence of objection raised by the French Commissioners, did not receive directly representations from deputations of trades in the United Kingdom. These representations were, therefore, received by the Royal Commissioners, and by them placed before the French Commissioners. All those who desired to submit their views with regard to the proposed conventional Tariff were heard, the same facilities being given to all, whether workmen or masters; and, in fact, some of the most valuable speeches were made by those who represented the workmen. I need not point it out, however, for my hon. Friend is fully aware of the fact, that the matter in question is one in which the interests of the employers and employed is not divergent, but identical.

ARMY—THE ARMY HOSPITAL CORPS.

MR. ARTHUR MOORE asked the Secretary of State for War, If it is true that the titles of the officers of the Army Hospital Corps have been changed from those of Lieutenant and Captain of Orderlies to that of Hospital Quartermaster; whether he is aware that this new designation is distasteful to the officers of the Army Hospital Corps; and, whether representations have been made to the Director General of the Army Medical Department to the effect that this change of designation would lower the social and military status of the officers concerned, and would render it more difficult for them to enforce obedience from their subordinates?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; under the Warrant of the 14th of August, 1877, the discipline of the Army Hospital Corps was transferred from the captains and lieutenants of orderlies to the medical officers, leaving to the former the purely quartermaster duties of equipment and supply only. Under the new Warrant of this year, the emoluments and prospects of these officers have been considerably improved by putting them on the same footing as Line quartermasters, and the opportunity has been taken to discontinue their inappropriate titles, and give them that which is the proper description of their appointments. They will also receive honorary military rank, which is really better, so far as their social and military status is concerned, than the relative rank they formerly had. Their present titles will not unfavourably affect any authority they have in the hospitals. -

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PERSONS CONFINED UNDER THE ACT IN LIMERICK GAOL.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he is aware that the suspects in Limerick Gaol, numbering some fifty, are divided into two batches, and that the gentlemen in one batch are not allowed intercourse or correspondence with those in the other; whether it has his approval; whether Coercion prisoners in Limerick are mixed with ordinary prisoners; whether, if it be alleged that the exercise ground is not large enough for all the Coercion prisoners in Limerick, he will give orders to better regulate the number of suspects sent thither; whether it is true that the governor of Limerick Gaol stopped a letter sent by Mr. O'Mahony, P.L.G., one of the gentlemen confined there, addressed to Mr. Hodnett, another prisoner, because the latter was styled "Chairman of the Ballydehob Board of Guardians, and President of the Land League;" whether he approves of this stoppage; whether a Report was made by the governor thereupon, as provided by Rule 14 of the Lord Lieutenant's Regulations; whether Coercion prisoners are disentitled the use of all titles of courtesy; and, if so, whether the letters "M.P." are objected to by the prison authorities in the case of an imprisoned Member of Parliament; and, whether he will give instructions to the prison authorities to avoid needless irritation to prisoners by the suppression of letters on trivial grounds?

Mr. Childers

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that there were two different wings in Limerick prison, each of them containing 30 cells, and with suitable exercise yard and association room. In one wing 29 Coercion prisoners were detained, and in the other 21. The Governor of the gaol should be allowed his discretion as to the intercourse or communication allowed between the prisoners; and he exercised what appeared to him (Mr. W. E. Forster) a wise discretion when he declined to allow all the Coercion prisoners to associate in one yard, as it would lead to overcrowding and bad sanitary results. The prisoners in Limerick gaol, confined under the Protection Act, were not mixed with the ordinary prisoners, and the yards in which they were exercised were believed to be large enough for a larger number of prisoners than were at present confined in the gaol. As to the question regarding letters, it was true that the Governor had stopped a letter addressed to Mr. O'Mahony, one of the prisoners, by Mr. Hodnett, another prisoner; but the reason why this letter was stopped was not because it was addressed to Mr. O'Mahony as Chairman of the Ballydehob Board of Guardians and President of the Land League. In the event of a letter being stopped under circumstances that were thought to constitute a grievance, the practice was, under Rule 14, that the prisoner concerned should make a representation to the Government; but, in this instance, no representation of this kind had been made, and, therefore, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) had not seen the letter. Prisoners confined under the Coercion Act ought not to be, and were not, disentitled to be addressed by the ordinary titles of courtesy. The title of "M.P.," "T.C.," "P.L.G.," or any other which might apply to them, as in the case of Mr. Dillon, was not objected to.

MR. HEALY asked, whether the Governor of the gaol was entitled to refuse prisoners in one division of the prison to see prisoners in the other division; and, whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not himself stated, when the Protection Bill was under discussion, that all the prisoners in one gaol should have intercourse with one another?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not recollect having made any such promise as that indicated; but he thought the hon. Member must see that if there were two recreation grounds and two association halls, and if one wing was too small for all prisoners, it could not be a good arrangement to have the prisoners altogether.

MR. HEALY: Suppose there is a father and a son, or two brothers, in the same gaol, have they option, if they choose, to be confined in the same prison, or part of the prison?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is putting a hypothetical Question, and I am bound to say that if the House is to allow hypothetical Questions to be put, there would be no end to them.

MR. HEALY then gave Notice that on to-morrow he would ask, whether there was any objection to allowing any prisoner so desiring it to be transferred from one wing of Limerick Gaol to another?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had no objection to state at once that they could not give prisoners any such choice. He believed there was no case of a father and son imprisoned. There was one case of brothers; but he did not believe they were separated.

MR. HEALY subsequently asked the right hon. Gentleman, whether he adhered to the statement made earlier in the evening, that he knew of no case in which a father and son had both been arrested under the Coercion Act; and, whether it was not the fact that such a case had occurred at Mitchelstown—Messrs. Mannix, father and son, being both arrested?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am glad the hon. Member has asked the Question. Since I answered his previous Question I have recollected that there was such a case.

MR. HEALY: Are the father and son kept separate?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: The hon. Member had better give Notice of the Question. I am not sure whether they are both in the same prison or not.

POOR ALLOTMENTS MANAGEMENT ACT, 1873—ALLOTMENT COMMITTEES.

MR. HOLLOND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, What is the amount of security required by the Inclosure Commissioners before they entertain any application for the appointment of an Allotment Committee under section 9 of "The Poor Allotments Management Act, 1873;" and, whether any such Committee has been appointed by the Inclosure Commissioners in accordance with the above Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, there was no fixed amount of security required. The amount was estimated only as to the probable sum required to cover expenses. There had been only three applications made to the Commissioners under the Act. In two of these cases they had no jurisdiction; and in the third—the parish of Waterbeach—they stated that they would hold an inquiry on receiving £30 as security for costs; but the applicant did not proceed with the matter.

POST OFFICE—TRANSFERRED TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

MR. DILLWYN asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the telegraph clerks who were transferred from the late Companies to the Government service in 1870 are eligible for transfer to the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, when a member of the permanent Civil Service is nominated to a situation in it out of the ordinary course of his promotion, he requires a fresh certificate from the Civil Service Commissioners, who may dispense with examination, wholly or partially, and may grant their certificate of qualification upon evidence satisfactory to them that he possesses the requisite knowledge and ability, and is duly qualified in respect of age, health, and character. The statute under which telegraphists were transferred to the Government made them members of the permanent Civil Service. If, therefore, any such telegraphist is nominated for transfer to a situation not in the ordinary course of his promotion—for instance, to one in the Inland Revenue or Customs—he is eligible on the same terms as other Civil servants.

SPAIN—COMMERCIAL TREATY.

MR. JACKSON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it is true, as stated in the "Standard" of Wednesday, July 13, that communications have been going on for some time between the Governments of England and Spain, which will probably result in the conclusion of a satisfactory Treaty of Commerce between the two Countries; and, if so, if he will give the House some information as to the provisions of such Treaty.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, communications have for some time past been taking place between the two Governments with the view to the conclusion of a Commercial Treaty between England and Spain. Formal negotiations, however, have not yet been commenced, as an understanding has not yet been arrived at with respect to the bases of the negotiations.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—QUARTERMASTERS.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK (for Colonel ALEXANDER) asked the Secretary of State for War, When Quartermasters who have completed ten years' service as such will be gazetted to the rank of Captain?

MR. CHILDERS, in reply, said, that the officers in question would be gazetted to the rank of Captain as soon as the Reports upon them were received and considered.

SEEDS ACT, 1880—POSTPONEMENT OF SPECIAL RATE.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the resolutions passed by the boards of guardians in Mayo in reference to the inability of poor farmers indebted for seed to pay the seed rate; and, if he will state what are the intentions of the Government on the subject?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had received several resolutions from Boards of Guardians in Mayo and other parts of Ireland with reference to the inability of poor farmers to pay the instalments of the seed loan. Independent of these resolutions, the Local Government Board were carefully looking into the matter, and he should to-day give Notice of a short Bill enabling the Board in certain cases to allow a postponement to be made.

FRANCE—COMMERCIAL TREATY—THE "TARIFF A DISCUTER."

MR. W. H. SMITH (for Viscount SANDON) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can hold out any
